He, too, was wasted to a shadow, and was ghastly white. He looked more misshapen, more shrunken, more deformed than ever, as—with eyes full of lurid fire, and a smile of exultation which was almost a grin—he watched the erection of the scaffold, and clutched, in his long bony fingers, money, which he meant to give the carpenters for drink, if he could find an opportunity of approaching them.

From that gibbet, which stood out so black and grim against the rosy and golden light of a spring morning, Natt Stone turned to watch the rays that gleamed through the little grated window above the Debtors'-door. He knew that door was also the door of the kitchen, and that all condemned criminals pass through that kitchen to the place of execution; and, in his vindictive and almost insane delight, he rejoiced to think that they were probably hanging that place with black, and fitting it for the funeral procession of his sister's murderer. He delighted to see the light dance on the metal of the tools the carpenters were using, and on the black posts of the gibbet itself. Streams of people, of all ranks and ages, and of both sexes, were pouring in. If at four o'clock there were such numbers, what would it be by eight!

But Ben Darrell's trial had excited an immense amount of public attention and interest; wife-beating and wife-murder were the prevailing crimes of the day. The Legislature had resolved to make examples of all men who murdered the beings they had sworn to love and cherish. There were circumstances, too, that gave a hue of romance to this case. The devotion of the wife—the love and revenge of her brother—the newspaper accounts of their early love—her youth, beauty—her clinging tenderness, and his cruelty and ill-usage—the fact that no food of any kind had been found in her stomach at the post-mortem examination, and of her yet refusing to leave him and go with her children to enjoy competence without him,—all these, and countless other details, had given an immense interest to this case, and rendered Ben Darrell an object of the execration and detestation of the mob—of the female portion of it especially.

An unusual number of women had assembled, feeling a sort of personal gratification in the extinction of such a husband.

CHAPTER LXIII.

Suck, baby! suck! Mother's love grows by giving!
Drain the sweet founts that only thrive by wasting!
Black manhood comes, when riotous, guilty living
Hands thee the cup that shall be death in tasting!
Kiss, baby! kiss! Mother's lips shine in kisses!
Press those sweet lips that give and take a blessing!
Black manhood comes, when riotous, guilty biases
Tender thee the kiss that poisons 'mid caressing!
Cling, baby! cling! Mother's love loves such forces!
Strain the sweet neck that bends still to thy clinging!
Black manhood comes, when riotous, guilty courses
Leave thee a spectacle in the rude air swinging!

CHARLES LAMB.

JEM GOODMAN was obliged to shake the wretched Ben before he could wake him; he was in such a sweet sleep—he was dreaming such blissful dreams. And when he was awake, and sat up bolt upright in his bed, it was some time before he could realise to himself where he was, or what was going to happen.

He did so at last, as his eye fell on the turnkeys and the barred windows; and the colour, which in sleep had returned to his cheek, faded away, and left it ghastly white.

He smelt some salts Jem had brought with him, and rallying a little, asked the hour.

It was half-past four.

"Three hours and a half," he said, "and then the agonies of death! And then, perhaps, I too, as the preacher said, may be, like the penitent thief on the cross, with Him in Paradise. Oh, Mr. Goodman, I hope I may be supported by the arm of faith! I hope I shall die game; and not go to—to the scaffold like one who thinks there ain't no life but that he's obliged to give up. I've one wish very strong on me, Mr. Goodman, and that's to shake hands with Natt Stone before I dies. I knows he's done his wust—I knows that but for him I'd may be have got off! But he's her brother; and I'd like to tell him, with my last breath, I never meant to kill her—never knowed I'd killed her. I'd like to ax his pardon, and give him mine—to forgive, as I hope to be forgiven."

Jem Goodman, moved by these words, accompanied as they were by tears, rose, and went in search of Natt Stone. He found him still watching the gibbet, and the gathering masses of people, to whom a hanging was a festival.

"Tell him," said Natt, in reply to Jem Goodman's entreaties and arguments, "that, were I to live a thousand years, I'd never forgive him; and that had he even a thousand lives, he'd deserve to lose them all. Tell him, I should think I had consented to my darling's murder, if I shook the cruel, coward hand, red with her blood—tell him, that he has made the whole world a desert and a howling wilderness to me, and that I live only to see his vile carcass swinging in the air, and his body cut down and buried in a quick-lime grave—tell him, he has cursed me, and I curse him."

Jem Goodman, seeing nothing could be done with a man whose passionate revenge bordered on insanity, exclaimed, "You call yourself a Christian, Natt Stone, and yet you will not forgive a dying man. What if you were to be called, sudden-like, to your last account? How could you expect to be forgiven when you have refused to fulfil the conditions on which alone a sinner can hope for pardon—'forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those that trespass against us?'"

"Don't talk to me, man!" cried Natt, with a wild fire in his eye, and a hoarse scream in his voice; "or if you want Scripture, look out all the texts against murder. Yell see there what murderers are fit for, from Cain who killed his brother, down to the brute, Ben Darrell, who killed his wife—my Esther—my darling! but who's to swing for it in"—and he looked at his watch, pointing with his lean finger the while to the hands—"three hours sixteen minutes and a half. I only live to see him swinging, and I wouldn't touch the cruel, mean hand, red with my blessed darling sister's blood, no, not to go straight to heaven out of the fiery furnace burning here," and he pressed his slim, long, claw-like fingers on his misshapen but dastard breast!

"Ben Darrell is better off than thee, man," said Jem Goodman. "He has sinned grievously, but he has fervently repented. His state is better than thine."

Natt Stone laughed wildly—hoarsely—bitterly, and sidled quickly off.

Jem Goodman paused for a moment. "It is not yet five," he said, "and there may be time. If the Home Secretary had but done as I so implored him, and put into her Majesty's hand that letter poor Ben wrote me, and which, both at the inquest and the trial, almost turned the tide in his favour—who can tell? If the Queen were but to read that letter herself, her quick perceptions aiding her kind womanly heart would make her respite Ben. May be there's that one chance left, but then there's one too that I may be too late. What, if I should miss the time, would be Ben Darrell's feelings, if he thought I forsook him at the last moment!"

Jem Goodman thought deeply for a moment, with clasped hands and upraised eyes—perhaps he prayed! Suddenly he hailed a Hansom cab that passed at that moment, having just deposited some young fools, who wished to see a man hanged, because to them it would be something new, and everything with them was becoming old before its time—weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable (themselves included).

Jem promised the cabman double pay to drive with double speed to the private residence of the Home Secretary.

Fate, fortune, or rather Providence, seemed to favour Jem Goodman on his errand of mercy. Just as his cab drove up to the gate of the lordly residence of the Home Secretary, he himself was handing out his lady wife and fair daughter, all three just returned from one of the most brilliant balls ever given even here by a French ambassador. Jem saw the morning light dazzle the dull, sleepy, tired eyes of the elder lady, and fall on the brilliants, which being cold, hard stones, gave back ray for ray, even at that hour; and then it searched out the hollows of the prematurely pale cheeks of the young votary of pleasure, who seemed drooping and faded as the bouquet she held in her fevered, languid hand, while with the other she tossed back the now unveiled tresses of her flaxen hair. It lighted, too, the broad, benevolent, and thoughtful brow of the Home Secretary. Jem, bold in his cause, respectfully accosted the great man, who instantly recognised in Jem one who had headed a deputation on a former occasion, and whom he had twice honoured with an interview relative to Ben Darrell.

He led the way at once to his library. What passed there we cannot here divulge, but in a few minutes after, the carriage was ordered round again, and the Home Secretary, requesting Jem Goodman to dismiss his cab, and to step in before him, gave an order to his coachman, and sprang into the carriage, saying, "Cheer up, good man, good Samaritan! There's hope yet, from what you say of the man and from his conduct in prison, of the truth of his continued assertions that he did not mean to kill his wife. I begin to think with you. The Queen is an early riser. The day has already begun for her."

"God bless her!" murmured Jem. "Bless her for the good example, too little followed, which she sets in that, as in everything else, to all the female world."

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. II.

"ARE you," I asked, "a conchologist, Wilton?"

"Perhaps I may be regarded as one," he replied;

"but, mind you, with a difference."

"Why, what can the difference be?"

"It is this: some people are entirely absorbed in collecting shells; while I want to gather all the information I can as to their inhabitants. I know a gentleman who had spent a large sum of money, and that carefully too, on specimens of such dwellings, but had you asked him to describe the structures, habits, and instincts of any former occupants, he would have been seriously at fault."

"Well, then, I am satisfied that yours is the wiser course; and you would, by the way, furnish another example of your habitual kindness, if you would favour me with some scraps of your knowledge on shells and their inhabitants."

"Most cheerfully," said Wilton. "I was visiting the Channel Islands, and as there are two large oyster-banks, one off Guernsey, the other off Jersey, belonging to an immense region of these creatures which extends along the coast of Norway, I determined to see if, having often eaten oysters without thinking about them, I could calmly and carefully think about them without eating them."

"Naturalist-like, my friend," I replied; "and so, doubtless, you formed an intimate acquaintance with these delicate and dainty shell-fish."

"Shell-fish!" shouted Wilton; "why a fish has a skeleton, it swims by its fins, and works its tail as a rudder; and an oyster has no skeleton, no fins, no tail; how then can it be a fish? What comparison can you find between an oyster and a turbot, a salmon, or a sole?"

"Clearly," I answered, "there is no resemblance between them; but in windows and in shop-fronts where oysters, as well as crabs and lobsters, are sold, you will see in large letters the words 'SHELL-FISH'; and, if I am not greatly mistaken, you will find the term still in many volumes of Natural History."

"That only shows," said Wilton, "that the 'purveyors' and the men of science are so far alike in fault; the latter being the greater transgressors. I could recommend them a far better course than the one they so commonly take, and that would be the using of the plainest as well as the most accurate names for plants and animals. The other day I passed through the gardens of the Royal Botanical Society, and every name I saw there was the scientific one, which very few out of the multitude who go there can possibly understand; and yet some of these very men who directed it should be so will speak of an oyster as a shell-fish. Three cheers, I say, for the man, whoever he may be, whether his name be tailed, or tailless, standing all alone, or having appended to it the initials of learned and scientific societies—who will tell us precisely what a thing is, and in the simplest form that language allows."

"What, then," I asked, "is an oyster?"

"I need not tell you," replied Wilton, "that the Latin word mollis means soft; as then there are a great many soft-bodied creatures, naturalists very properly class them altogether as mollusca; and, consequently, each one is a mollusc. Now a mollusc may be nude and shell-less, such as the common slug, the Eolis of the ocean, and many more; if its shell consists of one piece, it is called a uni-valve; if it has two pieces, it is called a bi-valve; if it has more than two, it is called a multi-valve. An oyster, therefore, is, properly speaking, a bi-valved mollusc. Still further, it is commonly associated with a river: with the Mersey, which rises in Yorkshire from different sources, in Clough Moss and Holme Moss; the Swale, which divides the Isle of Sheppey from the rest of Kent; and the Colne, which flows in the neighbourhood of Colchester. But no river on the face of the earth provides for the production of this delicacy; it is, undoubtedly, of marine origin. So liable, however, are the distinctive marks of these creatures to change, and thence to form individual varieties, that it is extremely difficult to establish any brief description of the ostrea edulis, the edible oyster. Not merely have the oysters of different coasts their peculiarities, but every bay, estuary, harbour, or space in the sea, has its local vicissitudes as to the supplies of food, depth of water, currents, tides, and other influential causes, all of which manifestly affect the figure or the shell of this species of oyster."

"I suppose, however," I suggested, "there is a general agreement as to structure and habits."

"There is," said Wilton; "in these respects only, oysters are all alike. If one of them be microscopically examined, it will be found as perfect as the elephant, the camel, or the giraffe; discovering no deficiency and no redundancy. It has a mouth with no kind of teeth, but bordered by four thin lips ranged on the two sides of the orifice; a stomach, surrounded by the liver; a heart, consisting of an auricle and a ventricle, by which a complete circulation is maintained of a white, or bluish white blood; breathing organs, most exquisitely constructed, serving also the purpose of bringing nutriment to the oyster; a mantle, which wraps up all these organs as an outer skin; and a strong muscle, called the adductor, because it instantly closes the shell whenever it is desirable."

"I confess," said I, "I could never have imagined what you have now described. But, then, how is the shell produced?"

"Every oyster, though so minute at first, that a million or two of them would only occupy a single square inch, is born with a shell. It grows, however, so rapidly that on the third day it is a quarter of an inch in width, and in three months it is as large as a shilling; the shell must therefore be enlarged in exact proportion to the expansion of the creature. A shell, be it observed, is formed of two substances: one is animal, the other is mineral. The former resembles in its chemical properties albumen, a substance so called from the Latin for the white of an egg, in which it exists abundantly, and in its purest natural state—or gelatine, the name of which is taken from the word to congeal, to freeze, and is applied to a concrete substance, transparent, and soluble in water. If a shell or a piece of one be placed in a glass vessel and diluted nitric acid be thrown in, a soft, floating substance will soon be apparent, consisting of net-like membranes. Here, then, is the basis of the shell; it became what it was by having mineral particles interspersed throughout, so as to become of a hard and stony character. It is the mantle, or outer covering of the oyster, that secretes and combines these two substances—the animal and the mineral. Réaumur, the celebrated French naturalist, cut a piece out of a snail's shell, and passed a piece of leather through the opening, that it might lie underneath the broken edges, and, therefore, between the snail's body and his shell. What, then, was the result? The side of the leather that lay upon the shell continued as it was; while the side of the leather that lay upon the snail's body was covered with calcareous matter. Two facts were consequently placed beyond all doubt: one was that the shell did nothing to repair itself; the other was that the materials for repairing it were yielded by the snail. The oyster, similarly endowed, gives to the valves of its shell successive edgings of membrane, which, secreting carbonate of lime, speedily becoming hard, is converted into a shelly layer; the process being repeated at intervals, every newly-formed layer enlarges the diameter of the shell; and thus the shell corresponds in its increase with the growth of the tenant."

"Thank you, Wilton," said I. "I should never have imagined that there was so much that is curious in connection with an oyster; and I heartily congratulate you on the success of your Jersey studies."

"We are yet far," he replied, "from exhausting the present subject. Perfect adjustment is everywhere apparent, and that, too, in every successive stage of the oyster's growth. As one example, the two valves of the shell are not loose, like the plate that holds the bachelor's solitary muffin, and the one a-top to preserve its warmth! nor are they like the paper covers of a book, which are torn off by a slight wrench; on the contrary, they are united at the back by an artificially-constructed hinge-joint. In a pair of fresh oyster-shells, weighing 3,488 grains, the entire spring of the hinge weighed three grains and a half; and its elastic parts, when placed in the centre of the flat valve, was equal to the pressure of three pounds fifteen ounces avoirdupois. How firmly it unites the shells is evident from the experiments of the Hon. Robert Boyle. He put an oyster into a very small receiver of an air-pump, and kept it in long enough, he says, 'to have killed successively three or four birds or beasts, &c., but it was not thereby killed,' nor for aught he could perceive, considerably disturbed; only, at each suck, he saw that the air it contained escaped at the edge. About twenty-four hours after he found that this one, with another placed in the receiver at the same time, was alive. On another occasion he put an oyster into a phial full of water before he placed it in the receiver, that the motion of the bubbles expected from the oyster might be seen more distinctly; yet this oyster proved so strong as to keep itself close shut, and repressed the eruption of the bubbles. The adaptation of the adductor muscle supplies another instance of perfect adjustment during the successive stages of an oyster's growth."

"Is the oyster fit to be eaten when it is mature?" I asked.

"It is not," replied my friend. "Were the rock-oyster taken from its bed—were its shells separated, and were the little creature they contained dragged from his house, you would pronounce it, on being tasted, not very agreeable. The quality of the oyster depends greatly on the nature of the bed of the sea at the point where the bank lies. Where the ground is calcareous, oysters are tender and friable; where it is hard, they are more solid and heavy; where the channel is marly or clayey, they are softer and contain more animal gluten; and on a slimy bank they are more rich and oily. And in this there is no mystery."

Organs of the oyster:—(a), the mouth; (b), the lips; (c, c), the mantle; (d), the stomach; (e), the intestines; (f), its extremity; (g), part of the liver; (h), the heart; (i), the adductor muscle; (j), the margin of the breathing organs; (k), the right lobe of the mantle; (n, n, o, o), the vessels which distribute themselves through the mantle; (m), the large canal receiving the vessels of the breathing organs.

In calcareous ground the food of the oyster will be largely mixed with calcareous matter, which will go to swell the shell without increasing the bulk of the body. But such will not be the case when the oyster rests on a hard rock; the food not being calcareous will make the creature plumper, while the shell will be proportionately thin. 'Native' oysters (the best, you well know) are all reared in artificial beds; the rock-oysters, in an early stage of their being, are therefore brought to them. Such beds are said to have been commenced in England about the year 1700, by the Essex and Kent Company of Dredgers, for keeping up a supply for the London markets, and they have been continued to the present day."

"True," said I; "and such beds are to be met with in various other places of Great Britain."

"They are," said Wilton. "Bishop Spratt—as to knowledge, by the way, rather a whale than a sprat—proposed the study of oyster-beds as well worthy the sages, who, under the guidance of his co-bishop, Wilkins, laid the foundation-stones of the Royal Society. 'Though the British oysters,' he says, 'have been famous in the world ever since the island was discovered, yet the skill how to order them aright has been so little considered among ourselves that we see at this day it is confined (the bishop evidently alludes to Essex) to some narrow creeks of a single county.' Now don't you feel a rising and kindling respect for a man who, two hundred years ago, had sufficient sagacity to perceive the value of skill in ordering things aright? What but this has been the means of raising Britain to its present eminence? And onward she will go in the physical, mental, and moral improvement of her people, just in proportion as she attains and employs skill in ordering things aright. If I were a schoolboy, I'd throw up my cap and shout, 'Honour to the memory of Bishop Spratt!' His remarks, doubtless, led to oyster-beds receiving attention never before paid them; and, consequently, to the great increase of the property of their owners. You might as well think of leaving land unvisited and untouched as an oyster-bed to itself; and as the agriculturist knows full well, that to have a succession of crops, he must put into the soil what he takes out in grain, so the owner of an oyster-bed will be careful that it is duly replenished. As, too, the farmer roots up his thistles and keeps up his fences, that the cattle may not invade his wheat-fields, so he who has oyster-beds will do all he can to keep his 'natives' free from the plants and animals by which they would otherwise be infested, particularly in the spring. If carefully kept, a farm, like an oyster-bed, will last long; but if neglected, it will soon be buried in sand, only to be reclaimed at a proportionate expense. Often have I thought what a scene of pure animal enjoyment is an oyster-bed! The creatures congregated there may seem dormant, yet all the functions of vitality are highly pleasurable. The world beyond—its cares and joys—its storms and calms—its volcanoes of passion and its lake-like repose, are all indifferent to that oyster-world! To each oyster (how unlike ourselves!) epicurism is absolutely lawful; his neighbour has on him no claim for sympathy or service; yet that little heart beats pleasantly, sending the vital current to the utmost extremity of the minutest vessel; while the mighty ocean and the river, too, are subservient to its joys."

"That, I should say, Wilton, is not merely imaginary, but true; excuse the interruption, which I could not prevent."

Again he proceeded:—"It has of late years been considered no compliment to say of a youth or a man that he is green, of which the history of the notorious Mr. Verdant Green, the very embodying of a raw, rash, and therefore luckless wight, is a memorable example. And yet, as some persons have a penchant for green gooseberries on their way to be red; and others a liking for green pickles, heedless of the verdigris that makes them so; so many in this land, as well as across the Channel, have preferred to all others the flavour of green oysters. In France special effort has been made to supply this so-called delicacy: a small reservoir being chosen, and the sea water admitted into it being allowed to remain there until the stones with which it was paved have become green. Bishop Spratt describes the same course as taken in his time. The oysters, still deposited in beds in the river Blackwater, at Mersea and at Tollesbury, have a deeper colour than those which are placed in the Colne; and some years ago, a demand being made by some Dutch merchants for green oysters, effort was made here also to produce them, but the demand has gradually declined. I question if you could now find in England a green oyster."

"I, at least, sustain no loss," I added.

"Nor I," said Wilton. "Oysters, whether obtained from the open sea or artificial beds, are taken, you are doubtless aware, by means of dredges. It is an old saying that oysters should only be eaten when there is an r in the month. This arises from old and still existing acts of parliament. One of these I will 'do' out of old into modern English: 'Also be it required of those that drag for oysters and mussels out of season, that it is (to be understood) restrained from the beginning of the month of May until the day of the exaltation of the holy cross, that is to say, the 14th of September.' Bishop Spratt says: 'There are great penalties by the Admiralty Court laid upon those that fish out of those grounds which the court appoints, or that destroy the cultch, or that take any oysters that are not of size.' And in the reigns of Georges III. and IV. various acts were passed for the better preservation of oyster-beds, and prevention of trespass upon them. To dredge in an oyster-bed unlawfully or wilfully is to be guilty of a misdemeanour, punishable by a fine not exceeding £20, or imprisonment for three calendar months. Not only are artificial oyster-beds claimed as private property, but many in the open sea, on various parts of our coast. On the south coast, however, 'summer oysters' may be procured so delicate in flavour that, to use the words of Christopher North, 'they are worthy to be lapped from the briny board by the lambent tongue of Neptune himself.' Some oysters grow to an extraordinary size. Thus we have heard of their shells being used as vessels for holy-water. Mr. Thompson, a naturalist, also states that he selected four large oysters from about 500 taken from the beds in Belfast Bay, where they lie at a depth from 12 to 25 fathoms, and that on two being weighed before opened each one weighed a pound and a half; the third, one pound and three-quarters; and the fourth, two pounds, imperial weight. The two largest oysters, on being taken from their shells, weighed each an ounce and a half; and the others somewhat less. The shells were in length from five and a half to six and a half inches; and in depth, with the valve closed, two and a half inches."

"To calculate the number of oysters taken," I remarked, "must be simply impossible."

"It is," said Wilton. "It is stated by Dr. Knapp that the number procured annually from the Norman coast for the use of the Channel Islands and English markets, cannot be less than eight hundred thousand tubs, each tub containing two English bushels; and in some years three times that quantity is believed to be procured from those banks during the season. As many as three hundred cutters have been employed in dredging. Milne Edwards and Andouin state that during the year 1828 the total number dredged on the French bank of this region was about fifty-two millions. These French oyster banks, they say, yield a produce valued at from eight hundred thousand to nine hundred thousand francs a year. Oysters, which are still sold out of the smacks at Billingsgate, may also be obtained at Hungerford. The real 'Miltons' and the 'Colchesters' are among the most expensive kinds. The costermongers buy oysters of 'a good middling quality.' At the commencement of the season the bushel, more or less heaped up, costs 14s.; the general price is 9s. or 10s.; but they have been 16s. or 18s. In 1848 very large-shelled oysters, the animals being very small, were brought in from the Sussex coast, and had an enormous sale in Thames-street and near the Borough-market. These 'scuttle-mouths,' as they were called, were usually thrown down in a yard, had a few pails of water dashed over them, and were then placed on a barrow or conveyed to a stall. But some of the better class of dealers laid down their oysters carefully, and gave them oatmeal to fatten on. The number of oysters sold by the costermongers amounts to 124,000,000 a year. These at four a penny would realise the large sum of £129,650. We may, therefore, safely assume that £125,000 is spent yearly in oysters in the streets of London."

LINES FOR MUSIC.

Ah, tell me not that other eyes
Are half so fair as thine;
Though some are bluer than the skies,
And some through blackness shine.

I've seen them flash like meteor's ray,
And melt in softness clear;
But soon their beauty fades away—
Thine, thine alone are dear.

Thine eyes emit a purer light—
A brighter, softer beam
Than e'er again can greet my sight
In daylight or in dream.

To me they're sweetest when they rise
And smile with love on mine—
Then tell me not that other eyes
Are half so fair as thine.

The Matron.

NO. XXIX.

I SPOKE in the last chapter of poisons in plants and berries; but there are other poisons equally to be dreaded. I mean those that lurk in the air. All classes of society are exposed to the danger of the poison communicated by close, unwholesome air. Then comes the question, what makes air close and unwholesome?

In the first place, its having been breathed by animals, whether men or brutes; in the second, its being fraught with the fumes of any decaying substances. I can fancy I hear some of my readers exclaim, "Well, if we've nothing else, we've always plenty of fresh air; so we've no reason to fear poison in this respect." But the question is, have you plenty of air? I think I can prove to you that your conclusion may be founded on an error, and that you do not know how much air is necessary for every human being, nor the immense quantity that every human being renders unfit for breathing. Every single person, no matter who, a king in his robes, or a beggar in his rags, spoils a gallon of air every minute. If a person were shut up in a small room, from which the access of fresh air was excluded, he would die in a few hours, without taking any other poison than the air which he had himself rendered deadly by breathing it.

There are a great many people, and perhaps yourself among the number, who very often have not enough air for the preservation of health. If the room in which you sleep is low and small, you should beware of closely shutting the door and the window, for, by so doing, you soon render the air oppressive and unwholesome. If, on rising, you throw open the window, you are struck with the contrast, and charmed with the sweetness of the morning breeze; but the air which you and your children breathe ought always to be sweet, and when it is habitually otherwise, all kinds of illnesses are the consequence. Perhaps you will reply, I have an old father living with me; he suffers from rheumatism, and he dreads every breath of air. Now, I say to your father, that impure air is as dangerous for him as it is for you, and that it is likely to increase the pain of his rheumatism by increasing the fever, to which pain always gives rise. Still I greatly disapprove of people's sitting in chilling draughts. All I wish to impress upon you is, the necessity of a free current of air in your sitting and sleeping apartments, in order to protect you from the danger of breathing poisonous air, viz., that which has already been inhaled. And attention to this point, in the present warm weather, is much more important than when cold renders fires necessary, for fires make a current of air for themselves, and though they consume a great deal of air, they are the means of purifying the remainder for human beings.

In India, necessity has been the mother of invention, and by means of great fans our countrymen are kept cool. These fans are nothing more than broad and stiff canvas hung up near the ceiling, and made to flap backwards and forwards constantly, by being pulled by ropes. In books that treat of the Indian mode of life, you find this fan called a punka. In our climate this contrivance is not necessary, but it is necessary that we should constantly make for the air a passage in and out. The result of my study of this important subject is, that I am enabled to suggest to you three different ways for ventilating rooms that are too close. First, I shall speak of the sleeping apartment, but I may as well observe, that in warm, still summer weather, the window may be left partly open during the whole night, for even if some damps should arise, they are wholesome compared to the danger of spoilt air; but for the autumn, spring, and winter, the following plan may be carried out with great advantage.

Take a large gimlet, and with it make a row of holes through the upper part of the window-frame in your bed-room. Let them be just above the glass. To prevent the rain from running in, you should slope them downwards; and you might have in readiness a few little pegs of wood, to stop some of these holes, in case the wind from outside should blow too violently. Supposing you have no chimney in your room, you should make corresponding holes in the door; for this principle should be impressed on your mind, that a free current of air is necessary, and for this there must be a passage out as well as a passage in.

Another plan is to take out a pane of glass from the window, and to put in its place a plate of zinc, pierced with holes. The zinc you can buy cheap at any ironmonger's. When you have done this, the chimney or the door, left a little open, will secure proper ventilation. The third plan is rather more complicated, and it is attended with some expense. However, it is effectual, and as CASSELL'S FAMILY PAPER is read by high and low, rich and poor, some of my readers may think fit to adopt it.

Have a pipe of pierced or perforated zinc entirely across the house, just under the ceiling, and let it pass through the walls into the open air. Close with a plug the end of the pipe exposed to the wind that happens to be prevalent, leaving a free passage for the escape of heated air through the other end. Make also holes through the door, near the bottom, so that they may allow as much room for the current of air as the bore of the zinc pipe. Such precautions as these would obviate the great danger of breathing spoilt air; but they would do little good to those who allow decayed substances to accumulate round their dwellings. These substances necessarily infect the air; and how are you to continue in health if the very air you breathe is poison? Therefore pigsties, manure-heaps, and stagnant water, must be removed from the immediate vicinity of your dwelling—that is, if you wish to preserve yourselves and children from wasting sickness or suddenly fatal disease; in fact, from such epidemics as, in former times, took the shape of plagues, and, in our day, have re-appeared in the almost equally dreaded form of cholera.

Small Charge.

DURING an election a candidate called upon a tradesman and solicited his vote. "I would rather vote for old Nick than for you," was the reply. "But in case your friend should not come forward," said the candidate, "might I then count upon your assistance?"

"We must confess the faults of our favourite, in order to obtain credit to our praises of his excellences." "Well, Charley," said a gentleman to one of our Ragged-school shoe-black brigade, "how do you get along these hard times?" "Why, sir, I contrive to rub on."

A SHOEMAKER, for the purpose of eclipsing an opponent, who lived opposite to him, put over his door the well-known motto of "Mens conscia recti" (a mind conscious of rectitude). His adversary, to outdo him, placed a bill in his window with these words: "Mens and Women's conscia recti!"

DISTRESSING KINDNESS.—A sheriff's officer is a man who never leaves another in distress.

AN UNKIND REMARK.—With many women, going to church is little better than looking into a bonnet shop.

Love without money has been compared to a pair of shiny-leather boots without soles.

An innocent young sportsman, in order to shoot a squirrel on the top of a tree, climbed another close by; and on being asked the reason of so foolish a freak, said: "That he didn't want to strain the gun by a long shot."

GREAT powers and natural gifts do not bring privileges to their possessor, so much as they bring duties.

"No man in the nation is more indebted to the people than I am," said an old office-holder. "Indeed, sir, how much of their money have you taken?"

A CONCEPT of knowledge is the greatest enemy of knowledge, and the greatest argument of ignorance.

It is one main point of happiness that he that is happy doth know and judge himself to be so. The knowledge and consideration of it is the fruition of it. "Good morning, Patrick; slippery this morning." "Slippery! and he jabsers it's nothing else, yer honor: upon my word, I slipped down three times without getting up once."

DESPOTISM can no more exist in a nation until the liberty of the press is destroyed than the night can happen before the sun is set.

SOMEBODY says that the oldest husbandry he knows of is the marrying of a widower in clover with a woman in weeds.

It is dangerous to take liberties with great men, unless we know them thoroughly. The keeper will hardly put his head into the lion's mouth upon a short acquaintance.

NOTHING is so difficult as the apparent ease of a clear and glowing style. Those graces, which, from their presumed facility, encourage all to attempt an imitation of them, are usually the most inimitable.

MERIAM, the philosopher, calculates the whole depth of all the rain and snow (if melted) which has fallen within thirty-two years at about one hundred and fifteen feet. BLACK.

White to move, and checkmate in three moves.

Problem No. 56. By WILLIAM GREENWOOD, Sutton Mill.

BLACK.

White to move, and checkmate in four moves.

J. P. COURTNEY.—We regret the occurrence of the error to which you refer, but it was certainly due to the illegibility of your manuscript.

K. PILLING.—Your question was replied to in our 29th number.

T. BROWN.—In reply to your first move in Problem No. 49, Black would play K takes R, where then would be the mate? In Problem No. 50, K takes P is an effectual rejoinder to Kt to Q B 7.

C. B. AND E. B.—If, in Problem No. 41, Black plays R to Q Kt sq, the reply is obviously Q to Q B 6 (mate). You have failed in solving Problem No. 46.

F. CALLIS.—We have to thank you for your suggestion with regard to the juveniles. You have correctly solved Problem Nos. 45 and 46.

J. H. COOKE.—The Problem with which you have favoured us is much below our standard. Forms on which you can submit your Problems will be sent to you on your favouring us with your address on a stamped envelope.

R. W. S.—A Pawn on Black's K R 7 would render the Problem sound; but the position would not be sufficiently interesting for publication.

G. TURNER.—If a piece or Pawn be misplaced at the beginning of the game, either player may insist upon the mistake being rectified, if he discover it before playing his 4th move, but not afterwards.

Our Editorial Table.

A MOTHER, A CLERK IN THE CITY, AN INHABITANT OF PIMLICO, A STUDENT AT KING'S COLLEGE.—We will endeavour to answer your questions satisfactorily. In the first place, the water of the River Thames is more foul than it used to be, on account of the increase in the number of the sewers emptied into it. The difficulty of maintaining our river in a cleanly state is partly owing to its being a tidal river. The filth that it carries away when it ebbs, it brings back to us when it flows. It is on the Corporation of London that devolves the duty of cleansing the Thames; but the responsibility of this important task has been shifted from one party to another until it seems to be no one's duty, though every inhabitant of the metropolis is in danger from its being neglected. Several measures of remedy have been proposed; one of these is to erect a wall on either side of the stream, and thus to prevent the accumulation of decaying substances on the shore. Another is to construct intercepting tunnels, into which all the sewers shall be emptied, and which, carried as far as the Essex Coast, are to empty themselves into the sea. A third is to deodorise all the sewers. What we should do in the meantime, to avert infection, is to attend to the greatest cleanliness in our homes and persons, to purify, by means of a little chloride of lime, placed in a saucer, or some other vessel, the air of rooms immediately exposed to the breeze from the river, and to avoid approaching the said river before breakfast. It is while fasting that we are in the greatest danger from infection. Meetings also should be convened, and every constitutional means adopted to urge those in authority to take active measures for purifying the river.

A RECLUSE.—"A Recluse" wishes for particulars about Cherbourg. It is a fortified city and seaport of France, on the northern coast of the department of La Manche, and it is one of the principal stations of the navy. Cherbourg is 190 miles from Paris, and it is exactly opposite the Isle of Wight. According to Froissart, it was founded by Cæsar when he invaded Gaul. In 1418 this city was besieged by the English, to whom, after three months' resistance, it surrendered; but in 1450 it was retaken by Charles VII., who finally expelled the English from the coasts of Normandy. Cherbourg contains a population of about 15,000. The houses are of stone and roofed with slate, of which there are several quarries in the neighbourhood. The streets are narrow, gloomy, irregular, and uncleanly; but one important thing connected with Cherbourg is its great digue, or break-water, and the excavated dock for the navy. The latter was made by the first Napoleon, and it is scooped out of the earth and solid rock, a little to the west of the city. At low water it has a depth of twenty-five feet, and it is capable of holding sixty ships of the line. This port has also a commercial dock, distinct from that of the navy. The great interest we now feel in everything connected with Cherbourg is on account of the recent fortifications, calculated rather to facilitate aggression than to afford defence. Independent of this, Cherbourg is the terminus of the principal railways of France, and its gigantic armies could be concentrated at Cherbourg, and embarked in an incredibly short space of time.

A YOUTH.—You wish to know why the days in July and August are termed dog-days. They derive this name from Sirius, or Canicula, in English the dog-star. This star, according to our almanacs, rises on the third of July, and sets about the end of August, when the dog days terminate. It seems that the ancients suffered very severely during the dog days. Authors, quoting from the ancients, express themselves thus:—"On the day the dog-star rises in the morning, the sea boils, wine turns sour, dogs begin to grow mad, the bile increases and irritates, and all animals grow mad." The Romans sacrificed a brown dog every year to Canicula, at his first rising, to appease his rage. We do not exactly sacrifice dogs, but we tie them up or muzzle them, lest they should bite those around them, and thus communicate the dreadful madness to which they are particularly liable in the heat of the dog-days. An amusing "jeu d'esprit" was elicited some years ago by the edict of a certain mayor, who ordered the tying up of all dogs. It ran thus:—

"Good mister mayor,
All dogs declare
The beam of justice falters;
To miss the puppies sure she's blind,
And only dogs are now consigned
To muzzles or to halters."

The best way to prevent madness in dogs is to supply them plentifully with water in which a small piece of stone sulphur has been placed, and to prevent their being exposed to the sun's rays.

EFFIE.—The potato disease is not a new malady, nor is it confined to the potato. It is a curious fact that in the Annual Register for 1805, there is an article attributing the potato disease to the aphid—an insect invisible from its minuteness. It is stated that "in some years the aphides are so numerous as to cause almost a total failure of the hop and potato plantations, in other years the peas are equally injured, while exotics raised in stoves and greenhouses are frequently destroyed by the depredations of these insects."

A SOLDIER'S BRIDE.—In spite of the dreadful mortality in the army caused by recent neglect and mismanagement, the mode of life of a soldier should (with proper attention from authorities) be quite as favourable to longevity as that of a sailor. Sir Henry Hallford, in 1837, had in the returns of the establishments of Greenwich and Chelsea hospitals, the former of which (Greenwich) had 2,710 pensioners, the latter (Chelsea) only 508. Now it was stated to Sir Henry, that of 2,710, several had reached the age of 80, and even of 90 years, but very rarely indeed 100. Whereas at Chelsea, containing only 500, scarcely a year passed in which some one does not die at 100. The erection of barracks built with a view to health, has been lately mooted in parliament. When this project is carried into execution we trust we shall hear no more heartrending accounts of regiments decimated by disease in times of peace.

T. H. R.—Apply to the Secretary at the Admiralty.—A paraclete is, properly, a comforter; one called to aid, or support, or solace; hence, the term is applied to the Holy Spirit.—The terms "Iambic," "Trocheic," &c., relate to poetic measures. Iambic pertains to the iambus, a poetic foot, consisting of two syllables, a short one followed by a long one. The Trocheic consists of a long and a short. The most common form of the Trocheic is that which is composed of a perfect dimeter, followed by a dimeter wanting the last half foot: such as—

"Färe thee wëll, and if för ëvër,
Still för ëvër färe thee wëll;
Eë'n though unförforgiving, nëvër
Gäinst thee shall my heart rëbël."

BELLE, W. H.—Lord Nelson was born at Thorpe, in Norfolk, September 29, 1758, and died on the 21st of October, in consequence of a wound from a musket-ball, received in the battle at Trafalgar.—"Cassell's Illustrated History of England" may be obtained in weekly numbers, one penny each.

N. ANDREWS must not allow the bad habit of which he complains to master him. He must blot out "cannot" from his vocabulary.

A TEASED ONE.—It is decidedly wrong for you, or any one, to tell your friends that "you shall be glad to see them at any time," and then tell your servant to say "you are not at home whenever they call."

T. C. S.—You tell us you have thought of writing to the young lady you love, stating all particulars, and you add you are certain she would refuse you! Then do not write. It is a bad thing to be mortified by a rejection, and you, who have your business to attend to, should not be kept in painful suspense. Act like a man, make up your mind, and propose to some young woman whose parents approve of you. By taking a decisive step, you do what is most beneficial for yourself, and also for the daughter of your former master.

R. M.—The curling fluid you are so anxious to procure is easily made. In one ounce of olive oil, melt a bit of white beeswax about the size of a pea, add a couple of drops of otto of roses, and use the fluid as you would hair-oil.

ERNEST.—The publicity given to every event partly accounts for the existence of a fashion in horrible crimes. The reading of dreadful deeds excites in morbid and wicked minds the idea of imitating these crimes, but then in such minds the original suggestions would have been equally criminal; and publicity, while it makes crimes known, puts the unwary on their guard and leads to measures of punishment and prevention. An unshackled press is not only the basis of constitutional liberty but the means of redress for all social evils.

Z. Z.—You use the old verb "to hob nob" incorrectly. It should be employed in a jocular manner, to ask a person whether he will have a glass of something or not. "Hob nob" appears to be derived from the Saxon habben, "to have" and nabben, "not to have."

ALICE.—In the first case you mention, the mere removal of the hat, without shaking hands, would have been more correct. In the second, we consider that you and your sister had a claim on the gentleman for a safe escort home.

AN ANXIOUS ONE.—The last plague that visited London was in the year 1665, and occurred in the reign of Charles II. People who catch this disease sometimes die in a moment, as if they had been struck down by a blow. Hence it is termed the plague, from a Greek word that signifies to strike. At the time of this awful visitation, London was one of the dirtiest cities in the whole world. It is now one of the most cleanly, and, as the purification of the Thames may be said to be resolved upon, we think an "Anxious One" may dismiss her fears.

MABEL L.—"Mabel L." who is engaged to one gentleman, inquires whether, in his absence, she is at liberty to accept the escort of another from a party or a lecture. There is no objection to "Mabel's" accepting the escort of a respectable acquaintance, but should he display any lover-like attention it will be her duty immediately to repulse him.

AN INVALID.—Why don't you tell your doctor the real cause of your indisposition at once? If you cannot confide such matters to him you ought not to employ him.

BILLY BARBER.—If the wife dies first, her property, unless entailed, otherwise settled, or consisting of freehold land, goes to her husband; if the husband dies first, the wife will take half of the personality, if there is no issue of the marriage, and a third of the revenue of the freehold estates; if both husband and wife die, it goes to the nearest relation—that is, supposing no will to have been made, disposing otherwise of the property.

FLAMINIUS.—The French word prestige signifies, literally, "illusion," or "charm." It is more commonly used metaphorically, as when we say, "Such a one will lose his prestige;" that is, he will cease to possess that charm which caused so many to behold him with admiration, &c.

C. VAVASSOUR.—We have before stated that, in consequence of the numerous accidents which have happened from the use of detonating balls, we decline giving directions for the manufacture of them.

MISS MINNIE.—"Miss Minnie" is going to the "Polytechnic Institution" when she visits London, during the summer vacation. She wishes us to tell her the meaning of the word "Polytechnic." The meaning of this word is as follows:—"denoting or comprehending many arts."

LILLIAN STANHOPE.—There is no etiquette to regulate precedence in speaking. Let the individual who first thinks of something to say start the conversation.

COUNT D'ORSAY writes to ask where he is to place commas, full stops, &c., in the address of a letter. He will find clear and ample directions for correct punctuation in "Cassell's Educational Course," Vol. II., "The English Language, in its Elements and Forms."

LAURA, WHISKERS, RUSTICA, ZELPH, VIOLET.—We approve of your resolution. An interesting book is an appropriate present for a youth of sixteen.—Moderate friction and cold water should be applied to the head, on rising in the morning; but, in giving this advice, a good state of general health is taken for granted.—When the visitor has introduced her friend to the lady of the house, it is for the latter to introduce the said friend to the members of her family who subsequently enter. If ladies accost you while walking with your brother, he should raise his hat, whether they are known to him or not. In a ball-room, and elsewhere, it is the lady's duty first to recognise the gentleman.—We perceive little proof of inspiration in your sister's lines. However, the following part of her poem is to the point:—

"But I hope when this you see,
You will write a note to me."

—From your letter, we are led to consider you a sensible, well disposed young person; and we think, if you stated your acquirements, by advertisement, in an influential journal, you might procure a situation as companion to an elderly lady, or as governess to very young children. If you are quite inexperienced, you might do well to state that for the first year no salary would be required.

AGGIE.—We refer "Aggie" to the answer just given to "Violet."

SHAMROCK.—An undue proportion of lime in the system is the cause of premature gray hair. You should carefully avoid hard water, either for drinking pure, or when converted into tea, coffee, or soup. We give you this advice because hard water is always strongly impregnated with lime. You may soften water by boiling it. Let it become cold, and then use it as a beverage.

A YOUTH OF SEVENTEEN.—The origin of the game of cricket is disputed. In its infant state, it is not unlikely it was the old game, club and ball. M. Bonstetten, of Berne, considers it originally an Icelandic game; but there is little doubt that it is a gradual improvement of club and ball—for the old bat, as seen in the picture of the Pavilion in Lord's ground, has the bend of the club.

WOULD-BE.—Mr. J. F. Smith's tale, "Smiles and Tears," commenced in No. 1 of the new series; and the tale, "Hope Evermore; or, Something to Do," in No. 16.

SIGMA.—The best glue, that used by cabinet-makers for their finest work, is that made in thin transparent cakes, commonly called Dutch glue. Great care must be taken in making the joints of the wood true, and in freeing them from every particle of dust or grit.

A YOUNG COACHMAN.—To clean white boot tops, dissolve one ounce of oxalic acid in a pint of soft water, and keep it in a bottle well corked. Dip a soft sponge into the mixture to clean the tops with, and if any spots do not disappear, rub them with a little fine Bath brickdust. Sponge the tops afterwards with clean water. When dry, polish with a soft brush, or a piece of flannel. For brown tops, take a pint of skimmed milk, half an ounce of spirits of salts, half an ounce of spirits of red lavender, one ounce of gum arabic, and the juice of two lemons. Mix well, and keep it in a bottle closely corked. Rub the tops with a sponge dipped in this mixture, and when dry polish as before directed.

H. J. K. W.—We greatly prefer the old and well understood English word receipt to the Latin word recipe, which is understood but by few.—The servants of naval and military men alone are entitled to the cockade.

GALUS.—You may obtain the cost of a galvanic machine from any maker of scientific apparatus.

FAIRPLAY.—The hours during which you are required to work for your master must be determined by the rule of the trade to which you are apprenticed.

PURNELL'S THIRD GRACE.—Prince Frederick William of Prussia is a member of the Lutheran Church.

LORD OF THE ISLES.—The patches of burnt grass on the railway cuttings, are occasioned by the showers of sparks falling from the funnels.—A jack is a young pike.

C. DOUGLAS.—You should have written to the journal from which you quote.

RUFUS.—The salary of the Premier is £5,000.

FISHERMAN.—Roach caught in winter, or in the cooler months, are the best.

A STUDENT.—"Tu quoque" means "thou also."

KEMO KIMO.—We are obliged by your scraps, but we cannot avail ourselves of them.

JOHN MAYER.—You will find directions for making ice-cream in No. 31, page 80.

P. K. C.—From a very early period the summer solstice was celebrated with peculiar ceremonies, amongst which the kindling of fires formed a conspicuous feature. These were called bon-fires, and were a sign of goodwill amongst neighbours. In an old metrical description of the customs common on the midsummer festival, we read—

Then doth the joyful feast of John
The Baptist take his turn,
When bon-fires great with lofty flame
In every town do burn.

They were a part of the heathen customs which celebrated the summer solstice. They were intended to do honour to the feasts of John the Baptist. They were regarded as being conducive to health. They were chosen as the place where old quarrels might be made up, and new friendships formed.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

Ha! blessed sleep! 'tis the gifted spell
To wake in shadows scenes remembered well,
To set the chain'd imagination free
And paint in rainbow-hues what'er might be.
Visions of heaven, with thoughts of earth combine,
And frame a whole—half human, half divine.

AUTHOR'S SCRAP-BOOK.

WORN by the excitement of the day, and still more so by the reaction which followed on the retreat of the enemy, Lillian, Lady Bell, and Rose, having assisted Doctor Burke and his courageous little wife in attending on the wounded soldiers, were about to quit the scene of their charitable labours to snatch a few hours' repose.

As they passed before the pallets of the sufferers, many a half-uttered groan of anguish was suppressed or changed to blessings on their heads. Stern, rough men had felt the hallowing influence of woman's presence and woman's sympathy.

Just as the wife of Mark Rayner reached the door of the temporary hospital, she heard her name pronounced in a tone of mingled energy and despair. It proceeded from her husband's old companion, Sanders, who was dangerously, if not mortally wounded, for, in addition to a fearful gash on the sword-arm, a musket-ball had penetrated his lungs, and the internal hemorrhage threatened suffocation.

"Don't leave me, Rose," he murmured, as she bent over him; "don't leave me in this horrid place to die alone."

"I will but speak a few words with my lady," replied the kind-hearted woman—forgetting, at the sight of his ghastly features and the agony which distorted them, her own dislike to him, and the evil influence he had exercised over Mark—"and then return."

"Don't be long, or—or——"

The fit of coughing which followed, and the rising of the blood in his throat, prevented Sanders from completing the sentence, but the threatening expression of his eyes explained the rest.

In a few minutes Rose returned and seated herself at the side of his pallet. The dying man grasped her hand convulsively, as if to prevent her quitting him.

"You can do him no good," observed the doctor "by remaining here, and had better follow your mistress. The toil of the day has fatigued you enough already."

"I must have some one to watch by me," said Sanders, speaking with difficulty. "I am choking—choking——"

"One of your comrades can do that."

"I'll have Rose—no one but Rose—or——she knows what I mean. You may stare," added the wounded soldier, "but I am under no command now. I am dying—I feel that I am—I know it."

AN ADVENTURE IN THE JUNGLE

"Permit me to remain, sir," whispered the woman; "I have a motive."

"Be it as you please," answered Burke; "but I fear that you are taxing yourself beyond your strength."

"You hear what the doctor says," observed Rose, soothingly; "release my hand—you hurt me; besides, I can then attend to you much better."

"And you will not quit me?"

"No; I promise."

Sanders slowly relaxed his grasp, observing, as he did so, that he could trust her word, for she always spoke the truth.

"Would I had done the same!" he added, in a scarcely audible tone; "would I had done the same!"

In the hope of lessening the sufferings of the dying man, his self-constituted nurse directed one of the hospital orderlies to bring her a truss or two of rice straw, and an additional blanket; with these she contrived to make the hard pallet on which he had been placed a little more comfortable; but what afforded him most relief was the propping up of his head and chest. The blood no longer threatened to choke him.

"I can breathe better now," he murmured. "Thank you—thank you!"

For some time the speaker appeared buried in profound reflection; and Rose, trusting that a sense of the errors of his past life, and the awful account he must soon give before the judgment seat on high, occupied his thoughts, knelt by his side, and in a low, gentle tone began to pray.

There was little eloquence, and still less learning in her supplications; but they were sincere and fervent, strong in their very weakness, and beautiful in their simple, unaffected piety. Such prayers, we are taught, find acceptance more readily than those clothed in the grandeur of high-sounding phrase.

God loves simplicity, and inclines the ear to the heart, not the words of those who address him.

At the sound of her voice the dying man became restless again, and made a faint sign with his hand for her to cease.

"Don't pray," he muttered, "don't pray; it's of no use; there is no forgiveness for a wretch like me."

"There is forgiveness for all," answered the woman, meekly, "who ask it in a humble spirit, and with a contrite heart."

"Ah! but you don't know."

"What?"

"Nothing! nothing!"

Here Sanders pressed his lips firmly together, as if to prevent the words which hovered on them from escaping.

Having in her simple prayer spoken of the mercy which the justly offended Creator shows to true repentance, Rose next touched upon the terror of His judgments on the hardened sinner.

The sufferer, as he listened to her, forgot the agony of his wounds—they were lost in the yet deeper pangs of an awakened conscience.

"Shall I read to you?" asked the wife of Mark Rayner, at the same time opening her pocket bible.

"Not from that book! not from that!" cried Sanders; "it bears witness, terrible witness against me. I will confess all," he added, with a sudden effort; "where is your husband?"

"You know that he is absent on the forlorn hope of conveying tidings of our position to General Anson. I shall never see him again," she added, with a burst of sorrow.

"Gone!" said the dying man; "dead, perhaps—well, well, it could do him no good now."

And he relapsed into his former moody silence.

A hope of she knew not what—a sudden light—flashed upon the devoted Rose.

"Sanders," she exclaimed, kneeling by the side of his pallet, "if you have anything to confess which may clear my husband of the horrid charge which hangs over him, which has driven us both to crime, exiled us from our native country, do not bear the secret with you to the grave. We were children together," she added, "our parents lie side by side in the village churchyard where we have so often played together. Feel for my agony—for Mark's despair."

Tears interrupted her words,—she could make no further appeal, but remained with streaming eyes fixed imploringly on those of the dying man.

"What good will it do to confess," replied the man, "since you will never see Mark again?"

"It will clear his good name," sobbed the wife.

"And blacken mine," added Sanders, bitterly.

"No, no, they think badly enough of me at St. Faith's already."

It was in vain that Rose entreated him to relent,—the fit of shortlived repentance had passed away.

Dr. Burke, who had overheard every word that passed, now approached the bedside of the patient, and placed his finger upon his pulse.

"Sanders," he said, "you have but half an hour to live."

The words were coldly but impressively uttered, and fell upon the ears of the murderer of poor Springthorpe with terrible distinctness.

"It is but a brief space of time," continued the speaker, "to make your peace on high, to atone the errors of a misspent life. Let me warn you not to trifle with it. The judgment which follows death is far more terrible than death itself."

Then fell upon the soul of the guilty man a darkness far more appalling than the shadow of the valley of death—the darkness of despair. Grasping the hand of Rose, he entreated her, with frantic vehemence, to pray for him, then tried to recollect his childhood's prayer.

"I cannot pray," he groaned—"words are denied me."

"And will be till you have made atonement," observed the doctor; "worm—atom—dust, thou canst not wrestle with thy Maker."

"I will confess!" shrieked the affrighted wretch. "I am going: the blood is rising to my throat again. Mark is innocent of the life of Springthorpe: mine was the hand that fired the fatal shot."

The devoted, long-enduring wife sank upon her knees in a transport of joy and gratitude.

"Now the secret is out," added the dying man, "don't leave me—pray with me."

"How came a leaf from the Bible Lady Boothroyd had given me to be used as wadding to your gun?" gently inquired Rose.

"Raise me up," said Sanders, faintly. "I may as well tell you everything. You recollect," he added, after his request had been complied with, "that I called at your cottage on New Year's eve?"

"Perfectly well."

"And that you called Mark into your chamber to persuade him not to leave the house with me? That ruffled me. Well, whilst you were speaking with him—I guessed what you were saying—a queer thought came over me. The Evil One put it into my head, I suppose. I saw your Bible lying on the drawers—tore a leaf out of it, and charged my gun."

"That fatal leaf," said Rose, "placed my husband and myself in the power of Lady Boothroyd—compelled us to consent to—"

"Steal Lillian," observed the man. "I know that, too; for I listened at your cottage window, and overheard her threats when she called. After you and your husband had quitted St. Faith's," he continued, speaking with increased difficulty, "I could not rest. I fancied every one in the place regarded me suspiciously, so I started for London. The little money I took with me was soon spent; then I enlisted, and—but you know the rest."

So important did this confession appear to Dr. Burke, that he at once reduced it to writing; and, sending for the officer of the guard, caused Sanders to sign it in his presence.

A feeling of calm content and deep thankfulness fell on the heart of the long-suffering wife. The husband of her youth—the being whom she had clung to with woman's faith and love—was cleared of the crime which drove him into exile, and free to revisit once more his native land—to walk erect before his fellow men, nor fear the eye of justice should discover the brand of Cain upon his brow. True, he might not live to return to her, for a thousand perils threatened him in the task he had undertaken; but past mercies bade her look hopefully to the future, and even should he fall, his memory would remain to her, pure from the stain of blood.

In the midst of her triumph, the grateful woman did not forget the dying sinner by whose side she had promised to remain. Rose prayed with him to the last, and when the spirit fled to its account, a heartfelt prayer for forgiveness accompanied it to the mercy-seat.

It is now time that we return to Lady Bell and Lillian, who had long since retired to the sanctuary, where, overcome with fatigue and excitement, a sweet sleep, accompanied by yet sweeter dreams, came over them; each dream of the being dearest to her heart; the wife—of the gallant soldier whom Providence had preserved to her; the fair girl—of him to whom she had given her faith, whose manly love was destined to prove the light of her existence.

Little did the orphan imagine when she laid her head upon her pillow, and sank to rest in that unhallowed spot, how terrible would prove her waking hour.

Lady Bell and her adopted child had been sleeping for some time, when a light vapour rose through the perforated stones of the altar, and gradually filled the whole apartment. It evidently possessed some narcotic quality, for as it spread, the breath of both became deeper. At last the statue of the goddess slowly moved aside, and the chief Brahmin, followed by two attendants of the temple, emerged from the secret staircase.

The two latter were armed with long knives. Nadir alone was defenceless; his sacerdotal rank prohibited the shedding of blood by his own hands, although he might sanction and even command it in others.

"They sleep," said the old man; "the drug hath wrought its purpose. Raise the girl, and bear her to the cavern."

So profound were their slumbers, that neither Lillian nor her protectress felt the rude hands of the midnight ruffians untwine the arms in which they enfolded each other, and it was well they did not, or the lives of both might have been the sacrifice.

Folding the unconscious Lillian in a shawl they had brought with them for the purpose, the two servitors bore her silently towards the altar, and finally disappeared with her through the aperture.

The chief Brahmin looked cautiously round him before retreating, and perceived that the gates of the sanctuary were barred on the inside. With a stealthy step he crept towards them, and drew back the bolt, then retreated by the same path his victim had been conveyed.

"Mariatele," he murmured, as he descended the steps, "hath enabled her minister to redeem his promise."

In a few seconds the statue of the goddess resumed its accustomed place upon the altar, and not a trace of the nocturnal visitors remained.

When Lady Bell awoke, at a late hour in the morning, she naturally felt surprised at the absence of her adopted child; but, finding the gates of the sanctuary unbarred, concluded that the fair girl, unwilling to disturb her, had quitted the sanctuary to visit the wounded men in the hospital alone. Thither she directed her steps, and her first inquiries were for Lillian.

Neither the doctor nor his wife had seen her.

A vague uneasiness, but unaccompanied by a suspicion of treachery, came over her, and, calling Rose to accompany her, she proceeded to seek for her through the temple.

As the search proved fruitless, the feeling of uneasiness changed to alarm, and alarm to terror. Not a trace of the lost one could be discovered.

"Gone!" exclaimed the unhappy woman, as she read in the agitated features of her husband that he, too, had been unsuccessful. "My child has been carried from me."

"Do not alarm yourself needlessly, Bell," replied Sir Charles, assuming a confidence he was far from feeling; "every nook shall be explored."

Major Plinlimmon and the rest of the officers who were un wounded, were roused, and all joined eagerly in seeking the lost girl. Not a nook or cell within the building was left unexplored. Even the wells were examined, to ascertain if she had fallen into one of them; but, we need not say, with the same result.

Men and officers looked inquiringly in each others' faces, as if there to read a clue to the mystery. The feeling of security had vanished; it was evident there was either a traitor amongst them, or that the enemy possessed some means of access to the temple known only to themselves.

The baronet and his wife were bewildered with despair.

"Poor Richard!" murmured the former; "who shall tell him this?"

At the name of his friend, Fred Wharton, who had been one of the most active in the search, could not suppress a groan of anguish.

"There must be treason somewhere," he exclaimed, passionately.

"I will answer for the men as for myself," observed the major. "There is not one of them but would have risked his life a hundred times in her defence. Can't make it out; the mystery is inexplicable."

"You promised, Wharton," said Lady Bell, clasping the young soldier convulsively by the arm, "you pledged your honour that neither Lillian nor myself living should fall into the hands of our enemies. Forgive me," she added, seeing how deeply her words had pained him; "I am unjust—sorrow has made me; but you will save her—will you not save her?"

"I would give my life to redeem or to avenge her," replied the cornet, energetically. "A moment—only a moment to collect my thoughts," he added. "You both returned at the same hour last night?"

"We did."

"And slept within the sanctuary?"

"Yes."

"Were the gates barred as usual?"
 "I closed and fastened them myself," replied her ladyship, "but on my waking found them open."
 "Then Lillian must have withdrawn the bolt," observed Sir Charles, "and some infernal treachery has been used to lure her from the temple."

By mutual consent the speakers now proceeded to the spot where the lost one had slept. Vainly they examined the walls and pavement of the recess. Not the slightest appearance of any other entrance than the usual one could be discovered. The altar and statue underwent the same scrutiny. Both appeared carved from a single stone, and their enormous weight disarmed suspicion.

"Lost!" murmured Lady Bell, throwing herself, with a passionate burst of grief, into the arms of her husband, "lost to us for ever!"

"I will not believe it," exclaimed Fred Wharton: "to do so were to doubt the justice of that Providence which watches over the innocent and good. A secret conviction assures me that Lillian will be restored to us, unharmed and pure as her own unsullied thoughts."

Sir Charles Fourreau shook his head mournfully. He could not share the enthusiastic confidence of the young soldier.

The mysterious disappearance of one so generally beloved, dimmed the joy of the hardly won victory. Not a soldier of the gallant and devoted band but regretted the loss, and sympathised with the sorrow of their commander and his noble-hearted wife, who mourned for the hapless girl as deeply as if she had been the offspring of their blood, instead of the child of their adoption.

Poor Rose shared in their affliction. It was a sad blow to her, at the very moment, too, when Providence seemed to have dispelled the cloud which had so long dimmed her happiness. Fortunately, that strong feeling of religion which in every trouble had been her stay, sustained and enabled her to impart consolation where it was most needed.

As for Major Plinlimmon, his wrath knew no bounds. At one moment he suspected the fidelity of his men; the next, declared his firm, unshakable conviction in their loyalty, and promised more rewards than his patrimony twice told could pay, for the recovery of his favourite Lillian.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

You may as well go stand upon the beach,
 And bid the main flood bate her usual height;
 You may as well use questions with the wolf,
 Why he hath made the ewe bleat for the lamb;
 You may as well forbid the mountain pines
 To wag their tall tops, and to make no noise,
 When they are fretted with the gusts of heaven;
 You may as well do anything most hard,
 As seek to soften that—(than which what's harder?)
 His cruel heart. SHAKESPEARE.

WHEN Lillian recovered from the lethargic slumber in which the cunning device of Nadir had thrown her, she found herself a prisoner in a small square cell cut in the solid rock, and lit only by a brazen lamp, suspended by a chain from the arched roof. Her first impression was that she had fallen into a hideous dream; and she closed her eyes again, trusting that on re-opening them it would disperse—that she would find herself in the sanctuary by the side of her adopted mother, whose name she gently murmured.

Involuntarily she stretched forth her arms from the pallet upon which the priests had placed her; but the grasp of affection did not encounter hers. With a cry of terror she started to her feet.

"Where am I?" cried the agitated girl, looking wildly round her. "This is no dream, but reality—hideous reality. What has happened,—am I in a tomb or prison?"

Twice she repeated the word "prison" to herself. Then, pressing her hands upon her burning brow, exclaimed, "For what am I reserved?"

With frantic eagerness she sprang towards the door. It proved too strongly barred to yield to her weak efforts, whilst the rock-sculptured walls of her prison cell echoed back her cries, as if in mockery of her vain attempts to force an egress from it.

Exhausted with her efforts, the hapless prisoner cast herself despairingly upon her pallet, where she remained buried in hopeless grief.

Suddenly she heard her name pronounced; and, raising her head from its sad pillow, beheld the Hindoo banker, no longer clad in the sober garb he had worn in Calcutta, but dressed like an Eastern prince, his belt and armlets glittering with gems.

"Lillian," repeated the traitor.

The sound of his voice convinced her she was not mistaken. Half mad with joy at beholding one whom she had known in happier times, who had frequently been a guest at the house of Sir Charles, she threw herself at his feet, and implored him to save her.

"You will conduct me from this hideous place," she cried, "and restore me to my friends. You are too good, too generous to wage war against the happiness of a feeble girl. You will save me; will you not save me?"

"Your liberty," replied Al Moorad, "depends upon yourself."

There was something in the look which accompanied his words which caused the captive to retreat from him.

"On one condition," he added, "you shall be free this instant."

In a mournful tone Lillian repeated the word "condition."

"I love you," continued the artful villain; "not with the sickly, puny passion which Europe's sons term love, but with the ardour of the East. Consent to be mine and life shall seem a golden holiday—a summer's dream. The wealth of Asia shall deck your matchless form; your every wish be anticipated. More, for your sake, I will forego the vow of hatred I have sworn against the Christian spoilers of my country, and use my influence to preserve your friends."

"Thou knowest that I love another," answered the maiden; "that my plighted troth is his."

The Hindoo regarded her with a cynical smile.

"Besides," she added, speaking yet more earnestly, "our faiths are different—I am a Christian, thou art an idolater."

"We can overleap that barrier," observed Al Moorad, attempting to take her hand. "A love like mine mocks at such vain distinctions."

"Love!" exclaimed the terrified girl, in mournful accents; "true love is not a selfish passion; it seeks not happiness at the expense of another's misery. What have I done?—how offended thee, that thou shouldst pass like a dark shadow between me and the sun of my existence? It is true that I am in thy power," she added; "but that, if thou hast one spark of manhood left, will be my protection and safety. I have friends who will ransom me richly."

"The wealth of Ind," replied her oppressor, "would not redeem thee. One smile from those sweet lips is far more precious to me than all the treasures of ravaged India. I need not the gold of the English."

"Fear their vengeance, then," said Lillian, trying to assume a courage she was far from feeling. "The rajah has already been defeated in his attack upon the temple."

"Still thou art in my power," observed the banker, "in a spot where the invader's foot hath never trod." "My countrymen may find me, even here; and if living, release—if dead, avenge."

"Girl," replied the banker, "I would fain owe the happiness I seek to thy own consent. Al Moorad is not the least distinguished or the poorest of his race. Conform to the faith of India's gods, who have proved their superiority in the downfall of the Christians, the dispersion of their power, and I will wed thee according to the rights of Brahma."

"Deny my God!" exclaimed the captive, indignantly; "efface the baptismal seal of regeneration from my brow—become the scorn and pity of all who love me? never—never! Death were a thousand times more preferable. But you are not serious; such fearful words can only be meant as a trial of my constancy and faith."

"Death!" repeated the Hindoo; "I almost believe that thou wouldst brave it; but there are trials which precede it."

The licentious look of the speaker explained his meaning more fully than his words.

"Kill me," answered Lillian, "and I will pardon thee."

"Men do not slay the thing they love," said Al Moorad. "Thy life is far more precious to me than even the triumph of my race. I will not act ungenerously. Four-and-twenty hours I give thee to reflect upon my offer, then—"

"Have pity on my tears—my agony!" interrupted the unhappy girl, fearful lest her ears should be polluted by a menace in words which would stain her cheek with shame;—"have pity on me and let me die!"

"Have I not suffered, too," retorted the Indian, "and had my agonies?—seen thee leaning on another's arm—gazing with love-lit eyes upon his features—drinking with willing ears the music of his flattering tongue—and veiled my feelings beneath a smile, even whilst my heart dropped blood?"

At this allusion to her lover and the happy hours she had passed with him, Lillian yielded to her tears, the sight of which excited the jealous passion of her persecutor almost to madness. In his rage he would have clasped her in his loathsome embrace, had not the frantic shrieks of the hapless girl appalled him.

"I will not break faith with thee," he said;—"the delay I promised shall be kept inviolate: use it wisely for reflection."

So saying he hurried from the cell, the door of which he fastened carefully after him.

Completely crushed by the agonies she had endured, and the terrors of her situation, his captive sank fainting on the floor of her prison, and insensibility released her for a while from the consciousness of her misery.

As Al Moorad threaded the narrow, winding passage which led to that part of the cavern temple occupied by the chief Brahmin and the priests, he fancied that he discerned in the gloom the slight figure of the sycee retreating before him. If so, the boy must have been watching his interview with Lillian; and he at once imparted his suspicions to Nadir.

The old man listened incredulously.

"A lover's jealousy," he replied; "Hirim is powerless to protect her."

"But he may betray the secret entrance to her friends," urged the banker.

"When he knows its mystery," said the hoary Brahmin, impatiently. "Your imagination must have deceived you," he added, "for a hundred eyes are on him, and as many arms ready to immolate him at the first sign of treachery. Trust to the experience of age: it will not deceive thee."

"You do not know his cunning," observed his confederate.

"I know his faith," retorted the priest. "He betrayed the master whom he loved, rather than the project that accident had revealed to him; urge me upon this theme no further."

"But what if I obtain proof of his treason?"

The eyes of the Brahmin flashed with a momentary fire, which proved that the snows of age had not subdued the fiercer passions of his nature, but merely changed the objects which excited them. If love and its thousand sympathies were extinct within his heart, ambition and priestly intolerance reigned in their place with equal sway.

"I will offer him," he exclaimed, "with Kehoda and the Christian Caleb, a sacrifice to the outraged goddess; but it must be proved," he added, resuming his wonted calmness—"proved to the evidence of ear and sight, probability and reason; my confidence is yet unshaken in him. He sought me willingly—"

"That might hide a purpose," observed Al Moorad. "Confessed that he had overheard our plan of poisoning the Englishman Tyrrell by the ministry of Hassan, that he would have saved him could he have done so without denouncing the chief of his faith, and implored me, as he could not remain and see his master die, to receive him in the temple."

"And you believed him?"

"Yes; for the fool is honest. It was not his fault that the Englishman escaped the effects of the poisoned root, or that our agent perished to conceal our share in the attempt."

Little did the speakers imagine that every word they uttered was overheard by the party most interested in their conversation. At the door of the cell the sycee lay crouched, his ear close to the ground to catch the sound of their voices. When the Brahmin declared his horrible resolution of sacrificing him to Mariatele with his other victims, in the event of his proving treacherous, a thrill of terror ran through his frame, accompanied by a pang of remorse at the recollection of his weakness in abandoning to his fate the master who had been so kind to him. But the feeling soon gave place to joy, on learning that their machinations had failed—that the sahib Tyrrell lived; and he crept stealthily from the spot, fearing to risk detection.

It would be difficult to say what resolution animated him; certain it was that since he had been an inmate of the temple his faith in the sanctity of Nadir and the priests had been considerably shaken, if not altogether destroyed.

He had been admitted behind the veil, and had contemplated the pollution of the sanctuary.

CHAPTER LXXV.

O grief beyond all other griefs! when fate
 First leaves the young heart lone and desolate
 In the wide world, without that only tie
 For which it wish'd to live, or fear'd to die.

MOORE.

LITTLE did our hero imagine that at the very moment when fortune seemed disposed to crown with success the enterprise which brought him to India, danger in its most appalling form threatened the fair girl whose image haunted alike his dreams and waking hours, whose life was henceforth so entwined with his, that, like twin roses on one stem, they must either sweetly bloom or fade together.

Such is the destiny of all true passions, of love, conceived in purity and truth, and nurtured by mutual sympathies.

The confession of Sanford, that he had been urged by the jealous promptings of Mr. Chutnee to undertake the criminal enterprise which had terminated so fatally to himself, was an embarrassing one. Not on the merchant's account—there was little desire to spare him—but on Zamora's, whose proud and sensitive nature Richard well knew would be doubly wounded by the exposure of her husband's unjust suspicions, and by her name being brought in question as the cause of it.

In India, from the very luxuriance of the soil, the ranker the weed the swifter its growth. An observation which applies to moral as well as vegetable ones; for in no country does that foulest of all weeds, scandal, take deeper root or propagate itself more quickly. A few hours suffice to ripen a word, uttered in levity or malice, into a suspicion—a suspicion into an assertion—and a reputation withers as rapidly as a flower.

It was decided that Lieutenant Marsh and our hero should wait on Mr. Chutnee before giving their evidence at the inquiry which the magistrates were about to hold, touching the death of the confidential clerk, lest, as the former shrewdly observed, the insane jealousy he had conceived of our hero might induce him to throw obstacles in the way of the examination of Sanford's papers, upon which so much depended.

Having come to this conclusion, they started at an early hour for the residence of the merchant, whom they found seated at the breakfast-table with his wife. He had heard of the fatal result of the scheme which he had been weak enough to sanction, if not to plan, and a shade of mingled displeasure and uneasiness clouded his naturally sombre features. The lady appeared cold and reserved.

The English mail had just arrived, and a packet of letters from his correspondents in London lay unopened on the table before him.

"Strange," he said, as he turned them listlessly over; "here is a letter for you."

"From England?"

"Yes."

"Who can have written to me?" exclaimed Zamora, in a tone of surprise. "I have no living relatives or friends there."

"Sealed with black, too," observed her husband, examining it suspiciously.

Had he been alone, the probabilities are that the vague, restless jealousy which haunted him might have prompted him to open the letter; that not being the case, he handed it to her with an air of affected confidence. He forgot the adage that "our old sins are sure to find us."

As Mrs. Chutnee perused it, her husband watched, with secret uneasiness, every movement and expression of her features, in the hope of obtaining some clue to the contents. Suddenly her countenance flushed, and then became exceedingly pale.

"No ill tidings?" he asked, unable any longer to conceal his anxiety.

"Most painful ones," replied his wife, with a sigh.

"Indeed!"

To the great annoyance of the gentleman, she placed the letter in her bosom.

"If there is any point on which my advice or assistance—" observed the merchant.

"Neither," interrupted Zamora, whose eyes by this time were filled with tears.

The jealousy, suspicion, and anger of her husband had reached their culminating point, and he could no longer restrain his impatience.

"I must insist," he said, "upon reading that letter."

"It will afford you but little pleasure," answered the lady, with a bitter smile. After an instant's reflection, she added, "Although I deny the right of a husband to pry into his wife's correspondence, on one condition, Herbert, you shall."

"Name your condition, madam," muttered Mr. Chutnee, impatiently.

"That you answer me one question."

"Willingly."

"Did you ever, previous to or since our marriage, receive a letter from my aunt, Margaret Esmond? I am answered," she continued, after a pause—"answered by the blush which proves you are still sensible to the shame of a mean, unworthy action. Why were the letters of my only relative—and that relative a woman, too—kept from me? what a cold, ungrateful being she must have thought me!"

"It was wrong," said the abashed and detected man.

"Say despicable," replied his wife, without being in the slightest degree moved by his humiliation. "How vile! how utterly vile does your conduct appear, now that the mask of deceit has fallen. For years I was taught to believe myself a friendless orphan, the dependent of your charity, and I loved you for your benevolence; little dreaming that your selfish arts deprived me of the affection and knowledge of one whose heart yearned with affection for her sister's child; who dying, forgave her seeming ingratitude, and left her the heiress of her fortune. There is the letter, Herbert," she added; "I will not break my promise."

She drew it from her bosom and placed it upon the table as she concluded her cold and cutting reproaches. The merchant caught it up and read it eagerly; it was from the lawyer of the deceased lady, informing Mrs. Chutnee that her aunt, who, from the fact of no reply ever having been received to the numerous letters she had sent, long believed her dead, having accidentally heard both of her existence and marriage, had by her last will and testament bequeathed her entire fortune—

"To and for her sole use and enjoyment."

He dropped the letter with a deep-drawn sigh; the deceit of years was exposed. The bequest came too late to prevent the sacrifice of Zamora to the selfish passion which he mis-named love, but it rendered her no longer dependent on him.

"You will not leave me!" he exclaimed, in a tone of voice so humble and subdued, it showed how completely he was crushed. "I cannot have many years to live."

"Not whilst you respect the conditions under which I consented to remain beneath your roof," coldly answered his wife. "Attempt to break them," she added, "and I sail for England by the first vessel."

At this moment one of the servants announced the visit of Lieutenant Marsh and Mr. Tyrrell. The hour was so unusual for a call, either of ceremony or business, that the merchant felt uneasy. With the consciousness of guilt he foresaw a painful if not humiliating scene.

"I will see the gentlemen in the library," he said.

"And why not here?" observed Zamora, whose glance detected his confusion; "they are neither of them strangers."

"In the library!" repeated Mr. Chutnee, still more emphatically, trusting to carry his point by a show of determination he was very far from feeling.

His wife, with womanly tact, did not choose to press her wish in the presence of a servant, neither did she think fit to relinquish it, but simply directed the man to inform the visitors that she desired to see them before they quitted the house.

The domestic salaamed and withdrew.

"You tried me hard," said the merchant, fixing his eyes upon her resentfully.

"We have both been tried, Herbert," she replied.

"You consider yourself free then to act as you please?"

"Free as the bird," exclaimed Zamora, "who finds the chain which bound it is of thread, not iron. In daring to suspect me," she added, "you first weakened the tie which united us, and the discovery of the baseness of the means by which you led me to suppose myself the friendless object of your bounty, and worked on my gratitude to marry you, has destroyed the affection I once felt—for despite the disparity of our years, I loved you, loved you for the warm heart and generous feelings so cleverly assumed."

"And now?"

"Ask me not what my present feelings are. I tremble to analyse them. One thing alone is clear to me—that in ceasing to respect my husband, I have not ceased to respect myself."

When Mr. Chutnee met his visitors in the library, he tried to receive them with an appearance of cordiality, but the effort was so evidently strained, that neither of them were deceived by it.

The lieutenant at once proceeded to explain the purport of their visit.

"You have doubtless heard," he said, "of the attempt to plunder the house of my young friend here, and the death of one of the robbers?"

The merchant repeated the words "death" and "robbers." In his confusion he scarcely knew what to say.

"The unfortunate man," added our hero, "proves to be your clerk, Mr. Sanford."

"Impossible!" ejaculated his confederate.

"Who, before breathing his last, made a full confession," resumed the old soldier, "and gave into the hands of Mr. Tyrrell the key of a desk containing his private papers, which papers are of importance to the future prospects, I may say happiness, of my friend."

"I cannot give them up," exclaimed Mr. Chutnee, hastily, for he felt a secret satisfaction in thwarting the interests of one whom he regarded as the cause of his domestic unhappiness. "Mr. Tyrrell is neither the executor nor heir of the deceased."

"In that case it will be my painful duty," observed the lieutenant, "to make public the assertion of the dying man—that he was urged by you to undertake the criminal enterprise in which he met his death."

"By me!—ridiculous! What motive?"

"Ask your own heart," interrupted Richard, "and you will find an answer in the unjust suspicions which have poisoned its better feelings and wronged the purity it should have trusted. My happiness—the fame of one most dear to me—depend upon the possession of those papers. You surely cannot be so cruel and unjust as to withhold them from me."

"I am not to be taught my duty," said the merchant, coldly.

"I am afraid you will never feel it, Herbert," said his wife, who at the same moment entered the apartment. "You see to what degradation you have reduced me. I have overheard every word that has transpired."

Her husband bit his lips with mortification.

"You must give up the papers," added the speaker.

"Never," said Mr. Chutnee, sullenly.

Zamora turned from him with an expression of pain and disappointment.

"The world has read you a strange lesson, Richard," she observed, "since you landed in Calcutta. You little thought that I should ever condescend to act the eavesdropper, or my husband the thief."

"Thief, madam!" exclaimed the merchant, indignantly.

"How else do you designate those who rob, or league with robbers?" demanded the lady, coldly.

"But I am tired of this wretched warfare. Lieutenant Marsh, when does the next vessel sail for England?"

"In fifteen days."

"I shall sail with it," said Mrs. Chutnee, firmly.

"My presence shall not be made the excuse of crime or injustice."

This last threat prevailed, and her husband at once consented to give up the papers, which consisted of the letters of Carus Kearny; and amongst others one in the handwriting of our hero's grandmother, addressed to Mr. Bently, with the following superscription:—

"To be read only by my husband, in the event of my death."

Although the unscrupulous hand of Sanford had violated the injunction, and broken the seal, Richard religiously respected it.

Placing all the correspondence in an envelope, he carefully sealed and committed it to the charge of his friend and guardian.

"You will be the bearer of it to England," he said.

"And you?"

"Will follow Lillian," replied our hero. "I have paid my debt to duty, although the struggle has been a severe one, and love now asserts its claims."

"You hear!" said Mrs. Chutnee, addressing her husband; "the imaginary rival you have thought fit to be jealous of is at least a noble one, and worthy a woman's heart."

"I cannot argue the point with you, Richard," observed his friend; "for feeling, if not reason, tells me you are right; but I must accompany you in the search. We either return to England together," he added, "or leave our bones in India."

As neither argument nor entreaty could shake the speaker's resolution, the packet was despatched through the usual channel to Mr. Bently; and the next day the hero of our tale, accompanied by Jack Manders and his guardian, well armed and mounted, started from Calcutta, all three wearing the costume of the native travellers.

There was but little difficulty in following the route which the regiment had taken; and for several days the party pursued their way unmolested.

The first adventure which befel them occurred in a jungle, where Richard, whose impatience generally led him in advance of his companions, unexpectedly found himself face to face with one of those ferocious monsters, the scourge of India—a royal tiger. So absorbed was he in his reveries, that it was only by the sudden terror of his horse, which refused to proceed, that our hero was made aware of his danger. The half-famished brute was already prepared to make its deadly spring, when Jack, perceiving his master's peril, levelled his rifle and fired.

The bullet wounded the animal slightly in the neck. Enraged with the pain, it paused for an instant; then crouched again, lashing its sides furiously with its tail.

"Fly!" shouted the lieutenant, who by this time had joined them.

At that same instant a shot was fired from the jungle, and the ball entered the monster's brain.

The three travellers looked around, wondering from whence the timely aid had come, and discovered a wretched, gaunt, half-starved-looking man, in the dress of a fakir, making his way through the underwood.

Tyrrell expressed his gratitude in Hindustani. To his astonishment, his preserver replied to him in English.

"Is it possible that you have forgotten me?" he said. "But I ought not to be surprised at it: the mother who bore me, and the wife who loved me would scarcely recognise me now."

Suddenly our hero grasped his arm, and pronounced the name of "Mark Rayner."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SMALL SAVINGS.

WHAT shall I do with my money? is an important question; but, like Mrs. Glass's celebrated receipt for cooking a hare—namely, first to catch the animal—it is necessary first of all to have money before you ask, What shall I do with it?

Money is not to be despised. The wise man says it "answereth all things;" and it is not money, but the inordinate love of gain which is emphatically declared in the Scripture to be the "root of all evil." Money properly used can give comfort to yourself and happiness to others; it can make you respectable and respected; it can gain for you an honourable and independent position, and can secure leisure and purchase recreation when they are most needed. How are you to get money? how are you to build a barrier between yourself and poverty? how are you to obtain a position of independence? Wishing and waiting will never win wealth. You must not wait for a prize in the world's lottery; you may search the lists daily, and never find yourself "nearest of kin" to Ceresus; you may look in vain for a nabob uncle with a liver as yellow as his guineas; you may sigh away your life in the aspiration for some grand speculation which shall suddenly elevate you to the pinnacle of fortune. The plain fact is, you must save.

Fortunes grow. There are plenty of men ready to stand forth and to tell us how they once started in the world with only a few halfpence in their pockets, but how, by steady industry, careful management, and unwavering perseverance, they have attained rank and fortune.

There is a truth of universal application in the simple words "Gather up the fragments." Be frugal; don't waste; save, save, save. A penny saved is a penny earned. An old horsehoe was the making of Samuel Budget's fortune. Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves. Be neither a miser nor a prodigal, but let nothing be lost.

Savings' banks have created during the period which has elapsed since their establishment, habits of forethought and economy—a frame of mind disposed to regard a future and substantial advantage, rather than the indulgence of a momentary gratification. The temptations to dissipation and extravagance everywhere present themselves in a great city, and its population should therefore be armed with an additional degree of prudence. The advantages held out by savings' banks, have induced thousands of young persons to lay by sums which would otherwise have been imperceptibly wasted, and thus the foundation has been laid for future opulence.

Only a penny! a penny a week is four and fourpence a year; a penny a day is £1 10s. 5d. a year—pence make shillings, shillings pounds; guineas are gregarious. They are sure to flock together; when one pound is saved, it is a nest-egg for a fortune.

Money is power. Money makes money. Those who have little can get more; the difficulty lies in getting the little. What we say is, "Save." Do not idly waste your money on things you do not want. Odd pence of themselves will do but little; but odd pence multiplied by odd pence change into ringing silver; and by the true alchemy of provident habits are transmuted to gold.

Savings' banks are often the means of moral reform. They cause the future to predominate over the present, and raise men in the scale of social being. However neglected a man may have been, however debased by vicious tastes, self-respect may be made to return, hope may look forward to a brighter future, and the day when the first few pence were laid by, when self-indulgence was for the first time conquered, will be marked as a red letter day in his Calendar.

And then savings' banks help to secure domestic comfort. The faithful endeavour to discharge one social duty gradually leads to the discharge of all. In the home that was once a dreary, cold, uncomfortable place, where everything went awry, and where nothing seemed in its proper place or wore a tidy look, but where now confusion is cleared up, and everything orderly and neat, we may trace the effects of those savings which made the first impression and roused the first desire for independence.

Great things can be done with little means if we only strive to do them. Fortunes grow as well as everything else. Stones upon stone the pyramids were raised. Not by sudden impulse, but by laborious and constant application the learned man attains knowledge; and just so the thrifty man, the steady, thoughtful worker saves penny after penny, shilling after shilling, pound after pound, that he may at length obtain Honest Independence.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XIII.

"GEORGE," said Robert to his friend, at their next meeting, "you remarked the other day, that there were a great many words in the French language exactly like, or very similar to the corresponding words in our language. I should so like to hear a little more on this subject, for I am sure it would help me wonderfully in finding words to express myself in the courteous manner you so strongly recommend."

"I am quite sure it would do so," answered George, "and, therefore, the first part of this lesson shall be given to observations on these resemblances. I have already told you that words ending in tion are, generally speaking, the same in both languages, and this is also the case with words ending in ble, ce, de, ge, ne, and ent. You shall make a little table illustrating this observation. The following words have the same letters in both languages, as have also many others with the same final syllable:—

- 1.—ble. Table, insensible, noble, capable.
- 2.—ce. Prudence, force, place, eminence.*
- 3.—de. Grade, préluce, servitude.
- 4.—ge. Large, charge, passage.
- 5.—ne. Famine, scène, doctrine.
- 6.—ent. Content, éminent, prudent.

"And now," added George, "I will give you another rule that will help you to furnish yourself with more French words. Observe that any of our words with the following terminations may be made into French words with very slight alterations. You shall make another little table of these alterations."

Words in	or change into	our	as actor	acteur
"	our	"	our	colours
"	ous	"	eux	dangerous
"	ty	"	té	vanity
"	cy	"	ce	clémency
"	ory	"	oire	conservatory
"	ary	"	aire	militaire

"I shall give you a few more rules of this kind; and if you are very attentive they will help you to several thousand French words."

"Oh, that is encouragement," said Robert, joyfully; "you may safely reckon on my attention. Do you recollect that for to-day's vocabulary you said I should learn some idioms about weather, and the weather is so constant a topic of conversation, I should like to express myself correctly about it."

"Then if that is the case, Robert," replied his friend, "always recollect when speaking of the weather, to use the verb to make instead of the verb to be. You shall see this illustrated directly; and we will talk of the weather and all its variations, and we must treat of it in the present, past, and future. Thus, 'Il fait beau temps, il a fait beau temps, il fera beau temps;' in English, 'It is, has been, or will be fine weather.'"[†]

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
It is cold.	Il fait froid.
It has been cold.	Il a fait froid.
It will be cold.	Il fera froid.
It is warm.	Il fait chaud.
It has been warm.	Il a fait chaud.
It will be warm.	Il fera chaud.
It is raining.	Il pleut.‡
It has rained.	Il a plu.
It will rain.	Il pleuvra.

* Observe we say many words with these endings are the same in both languages. It must not be supposed that all are the same; and of course the French pronunciation must be given to them as carefully as if they were entirely different to our corresponding words.

† For bad weather substitute the word mauvais, bad, for beau, fine.

‡ It is not necessary to use the verb faire with pleuvoir, to rain, or neiger, to snow.

It is windy.
It has been windy.
It will be windy.
It is snowing.
It has been snowing.
It will snow.

Il fait du vent.
Il a fait du vent.
Il fera du vent.
Il neige.
Il a neigé.
Il neigera.

"The verb faire is not generally applied to geler, to freeze, nor to geler, to hail; therefore we render it freezes, it has frozen, or it will freeze by il gèle, il a gelé, il gèlera, and it hails, it has hailed, or it will hail by il grêle, il a grêlé, il grêlera.

"Your exercise to-day will be on the gender of substantives, and you will write it ill or well accordingly as you remember or forget the following rules. Of course you recollect that everything animate and inanimate is either masculine or feminine, in the French language.

"The first rule is that nouns ending in a consonant are masculine when they have any other final than a, eur, and ion, to which must be added son, preceded by a vowel. This rule includes thousands of words, and it has no exception but the following words, thirty-one in number, which are feminine:—

"Chair, flesh; brebis, sheep; boisson, drink; chanson, song; clef, key; cour, court; cuisse, spoon; cuisson, baking; dent, tooth; dot, portion; façon, making; faim, hunger; fin, end; fois, once; forêt, forest; hart, halter; leçon, lesson; main, hand; maman, mamma; mer, sea; mort, death; moisson, harvest; mousson, monsoon; nef, body of the church; nuît, night; part, part; rançon, ransom; soif, thirst; souris, mouse; tour, tower; vis, screw.

"The second rule is that all adjectives and verbs substantively used are masculine, whatever be their termination. All trees are also of the masculine gender."

EXERCISE.

CORRIGE.

1. Voilà une souris. 2. Le rire est propre à l'homme. 3. La fraîcheur du teint indique la santé. 4. Il a eu un accès. 5. Un coup de soleil est dangereux. 6. Un souvenir vient souvent d'un souvenir. 7. J'ai vu la nef. 8. Voilà un chêne magnifique. 9. Un brave est admiré des dames. 10. La fin tout se sait. 11. Donnez-moi une longue leçon. 12. La façon d'une robe est très importante. 19. Ne dites rien. 20. Voici le tabouret. 21. La nuit est très longue.

"And now I hope to hear something about the locomotive," remarked the pupil.

"True," said George; "it was the subject of conversation in the last dialogue; but you must not expect many details. You would find the sentences too difficult to commit to memory. Besides, you must first learn to talk well on common subjects. I wish you to know how to ask for everything you are likely to want; to be able to reciprocate civilities, and to answer unhesitatingly the questions that French men are sure to put about the French language—how long you have learnt it—how you like it—what difficulties you find in it. However, I shall not altogether disappoint you about the locomotive, and now I start with it."

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

In the first place, a locomotive is an engine with four or six wheels.	D'abord, une locomotive c'est une machine à quatre ou à six roues.

did not know. Besides the wheels, the locomotive has a fire-place, a chimney, a boiler, and one or more steam cylinders or tubes.

Don't go further yet. Let me think of all these things first. Now I am ready. Tell me all the rest.

Well, the steam cylinders have pistons, or rods. These pistons work the connecting rods. Well, then, these connecting rods communicate their movement to the driving wheels. I thank you a thousand times. Now I understand what a locomotive is. And here we are at the terminus.

How time passes in conversation! The carriages are being opened. Let us get out. Let us see about our luggage.

que vous ne saviez pas. Outre les roues, la locomotive a un foyer, une cheminée, une chaudière, et uno ou deux cylindres à vapeur.

N'allez pas encore plus loin. Permettez-moi de penser un peu à tout cela. A présent je suis prêt. Dites-moi le reste.

Bon, les cylindres à vapeur ont des pistons, ou des bielles. Ces pistons mettent en jeu les bielles. Eh, bien, ces bielles communiquent leur mouvement aux roues.

Je vous remercie mille fois. Je comprends à présent ce que c'est qu'une locomotive. Et nous voici au débarcadere. Quel temps se passa dans la conversation! On ouvre les portières.

Descendons. Allons chercher nos malles.

OF THE SOUND a.

The sound of a, with the circumflex accent (â), is nearly similar to that of the letter a in arm. The circumflex accent is the result of the suppression of the letter s after the vowel, as it was used in the old French orthography in the words asmes, now âmes, paste, now pâte, &c.

The same sound is produced by the union of the two letters ea, and is expressed thus in all the words in which the consonant g, placed before them, should be sounded soft, as we will explain when speaking of this letter; as in the words nous engageâmes, nous partageâmes. Therefore, â and ea, sounding exactly alike, will be marked by the same number (2): as â, ea.

OF THE SOUND, e e.

The letter e, without an accent, is either mute, or corresponds to that of the letter e in the word her.

It is mute at the end of a word, and sometimes at the end of a syllable in the middle of a word; it will then be marked with a cypher over it; as e, in the words âme, pâte, appartement, &c.

It has the sound of e in her at the end of all monosyllables, and sometimes at the end of syllables in the middle of a word, when this letter is sounded at all; it will then be marked with the number (3) over it; as e.

When the letter e is mute, it does not sound at all; as in the words victoire, armée, which are pronounced as if written victoir, armé.

It is mute, when joined to nt, in the third person plural of verbs; as étaient, paraient, aimaient.

It is also mute at the end of words, when followed by the letter s; as victoires, armées.

When the e mute, that is to say, without an accent, is followed by the letter i, it has the same sound as in English in the words appellation, rebel, and will be marked with the number (5) over it, as well as all the sounds which are nearly similar in French.

The sound of e in her is represented by ai in several senses of the verb faire, to make; as, nous faisons, je fais, &c.

Thus the sound marked (3) is produced by the letter e, and by the combination ai.

OF THE SOUND e.

The sound e is similar to that of the English letters ai in the word fail, &c.; as in boné, café, thé.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XII. MECHANICS OF FLUIDS.

BUOYANT ACTION OF LIQUIDS ON IMMERSED SOLIDS.

342. What is the reason that when a stone, or any other body, held in the hand, is entirely immersed in water, it tends downward with less force than before, as if it had lost part of its weight?—The upward pressure of the water on the under part of the stone is greater than the downward pressure on the upper part.

343. The excess of pressure underneath will then tend to support the weight of the body—what is this called?—The buoyant effort of the liquid.

344. What is its amount?—It is equal to the weight of the liquid which the body displaces.

345. What will happen, then, if the liquid is denser and heavier than the body?—The body will rise to the surface, and float with a certain part above the surface.

346. Illustrate by an example.—A cork, if put under water, will rise and float with three quarters of its bulk out of water.

347. A cannon ball, which sinks so readily in water, will float on quicksilver—what is the explanation of this curious fact?—Quicksilver is more than thirteen times heavier than water, and is heavier than iron.

348. Would a cannon ball have any less tendency to sink at the depth of a mile in the ocean than just below the surface?—It would not, unless the water is denser at that great depth. In point of fact its density is only about $\frac{1}{10}$ th greater at that depth.

349. What weight will a floating body, as an empty cask, or a boat bear up without sinking?—The excess of the weight of water that it can displace above its own weight.

350. Suppose a ship is loaded with a cargo weighing 800 tons, how much more water does she displace than when unloaded?—An amount weighing 800 tons. When unloaded, the quantity of water displaced will be equal in weight to the entire weight of the ship.

351. What is the explanation of the fact that iron boats are constructed which draw less water than similar boats built of wood?—The entire weight of the iron boat is less than that of the boat constructed of wood.

352. If an iceberg, of a regular form, is seen at sea floating with 50 feet out of water, what is its depth below the surface of the sea?—270 feet.

WATER WHEELS.

353. By what is the machinery of mills and factories often driven?—By water wheels; the most common forms are represented in Figs. 24, 25, and 26.

354. What is the wheel represented in Fig. 24 called?—An Overshot Wheel. The water shoots over the top into the buckets that are set on the rim.

Fig. 24.

355. What is it that moves the wheel?—The weight of the water in the buckets. The buckets are full on one side of the wheel and empty on the other.

356. What is the wheel shown in Fig. 25 called?—An Undershot Wheel. The water shoots under the wheel, and strikes against the floats at the bottom.

357. Explain Fig. 26.—It represents a wheel intermediate between the other two, called the Breast Wheel.

Fig. 26.

358. Where does the water come on to the wheel?—Somewhere between the top and bottom, frequently about midway.

359. Which is the most efficient of these three wheels?—The overshot wheel.

360. Are there any other forms of water wheel in use?—There are also wheels that whirl around horizontally, called Turbines. (Fig. 27.)

Fig. 27.

361. What may be said of these?—That they are the most efficient form of water wheels, and have lately come into extensive use.

MR. RAREY'S ART OF HORSE TAMING.

THE remarkable success which has attended Mr. Rarey's experiments in horse-taming, has excited considerable curiosity and interest. His first announcements met with a doubtful reception; orthodox old horse-breakers, who knew no other cure for a vicious animal than whip and spur, were unwilling to acknowledge the possibility of any other plan; the majority of people were disposed to regard it as a nine days' wonder, a successful bit of hocus-pocus horse-charming that might be amusing, but could never be useful; there were but few persons who felt any real confidence in the power of the horse-tamer—these, of course, were acquainted with his transatlantic experience, and were prepared, at all events, for an impartial trial. The trial was made in the presence of competent judges and gentlemen whose position and character rendered their testimony of the highest value, and was attended with complete success. Subscription lists were opened under the auspices of Tattersall's, and were rapidly filled up by the titled and the wealthy. Mr. Rarey's reputation spread far and wide. The taming of Cruizer was alone sufficient to establish his fame. Every imaginable plan which fertile invention could devise was confidently put forth as Mr. Rarey's system. The favourite idea for a long time was that he drugged the horses with some agreeable narcotic, the extraordinary influence of which lasted a life-time. Mr. Rarey's plan was boldly announced, as being exhibited every night at a well-known circus, and Mr. Rarey was challenged to deny it if he could. In the meantime the secret had been communicated to a large number of his pupils. These, thoroughly satisfied of the genuineness of his plan, came to his rescue, and a newspaper controversy sprang up. Mr. Rarey became the topic of the day; and the question, "How is it possible for him to accomplish what he does?" was being constantly advanced, but never satisfactorily answered. Such being the case, Mr. Rarey's own actual statements with regard to the plan he adopts, are exceedingly valuable, and we have much gratification in submitting some of these statements to our readers.

First of all, Mr. Rarey founds his theory on these three leading characteristics of the horse. 1st. That he is so constituted by nature that he will not offer resistance to any order which he comprehends, if made consistently with the laws of his nature. 2nd. That he has no consciousness of his strength beyond his experience, and can be managed by our will without the application of force. 3rd. That we can in compliance with the laws of his nature, by which he examines all things new to him, take any object, however frightful, around, over, or on him, that does not inflict pain, without exciting his fear.

We know, from a natural course of reasoning, that there has never been an effect without a cause, and we infer from this that there can be no action, either in animate or inanimate matter, without there first being some cause to produce it. And from this self-evident fact we know that there is some cause for every impulse or movement of either mind or matter, and that this law governs every action or movement of the animal kingdom. Then, according to this theory, there must be some cause before fear can exist; and, if fear exists from the effect of imagination, and not from the infliction of real pain, it can be removed by complying with those laws of nature by which the horse examines an object, and determines upon its innocence or vice.

A log or stump by the road-side may be, in the imagination of the horse, some great beast about to pounce upon him; but after you take him up to it and let him stand by it a little while, and touch it with his nose, and go through his process of examination, he will not care anything more about it. And the same principle and process will have the same effect with any other object, however frightful in appearance, in which there is no harm. Take a boy that has been frightened by a false face, or any other object that he could not comprehend at once; but let him take that face or object in his hands and examine it, and he will not care anything more about it. This is a demonstration of the same principle.

The true philosophy of the taming process consists in the recognition of these facts, and in founding upon them the establishment of a confidence between the man and the horse. The animal must be gently taught that man is his superior, at the same time that he is his friend, and that obedience must be rendered to his will.

With some slight variations in the process, the principle of horse taming is the same in its application to all horses, irrespective of their condition or character. Supposing we are about to practice on an untrained colt, Mr. Rarey tells us we must take with us, when we go into a stable, a long switch whip, with a good silk cracker, so as to make a sharp report, which, if handled with dexterity, and accompanied with a sharp word, will be sufficient to enliven the spirits of any horse. With this whip in our right hand, with the lash pointing backwards, we enter the stable alone. It is a great disadvantage in training a horse to have any one in the stable with us; we should be entirely alone, so as to have nothing to divert the attention of the animal. "When you have entered the stable, stand still, and let your horse look at you a minute or two, and as soon as he is settled in one place, approach him slowly, with both arms stationary, your right hanging by your side, holding the whip as directed, and the left bent at the elbow, with your hand projecting. As you approach him, go not too much towards his head or croup, do not make him move either forward or backward, but keep your horse stationary; if he does move a little either forward or backward, step a little to the right or left very cautiously, this will keep him in one place. As you get very near him, draw a little to his shoulder, and stop a few seconds. If you are in his reach he will turn his head and smell your hand, not that he has any preference for your hand, but because that is projecting, and is the nearest portion of your body to the horse. This all colts will do, and they will smell your naked hand just as quickly as they will anything that you can put in it, and with just as good an effect, however much some men have preached the doctrine of taming horses by giving them the scent of articles from the hand. This is a mistake. As soon as he puts his nose to your hand, caress him, always using a very light, soft hand, merely touching the horse, always rubbing the way the hair lies, so that your hand will pass along as smoothly as possible. As you stand by his side, you may find it more convenient to rub his neck or the side of his head, which will answer the same purpose as rubbing his forehead. Favour every inclination of the horse to smell or touch you with his nose. Always follow each touch or communication of this kind with the most tender and affectionate caresses, accompanied with a kind look, and pleasant word of some sort, such as 'Ho! my little boy!' 'Pretty boy!' 'Nice lady!' or something of that kind, constantly repeating the same words, with the same kind, steady tone of voice; for the horse soon learns to read the expression of the face and voice, and will know as well when fear, love, or anger prevails, as you know your own feelings; two of which, fear and anger, a good horseman should never feel."

This should be continued for some time, but not too long at once. Mr. Rarey possesses personally a peculiar command over horses—a genius for taming them, which students must not attempt to rival. The more haste the less speed is true with respect to horse-taming. Injudicious hurry on our part will considerably delay, even if it does not altogether prevent the success of an experiment. Fondling the horse, caressing him on the forehead with gentleness, and talking to him kindly, gradually win his confidence. Handle his ears but with extreme caution, stroke his neck, pat his back, but on his exhibiting uneasiness return to the forehead, and go over the process again until he will permit you to touch any part of his body or legs without flinching.

Mr. Rarey then proceeds to instruct us how to govern a horse if it be very wild or has a strong vicious habit.

"Take up," he says, "one fore foot, and bend his knee till his hoof is bottom upwards, and nearly touching his body; then slip a loop over his knee, and up until it comes above the pastern joint, to keep it up, being careful to draw the loop together between the hoof and pastern joint with a second strap of some kind, to prevent the loop from slipping down and coming off. This will leave the horse standing on three legs; you can now handle him as you wish, for it is utterly impossible for him to kick in this position. There is something in this operation of taking up one foot that conquers a horse quicker and better than anything else you can do to him. There is no process in the world equal to it to break a kicking horse, for several reasons. First, there is a principle of this kind in the nature of the horse: that by conquering one member you conquer to a great extent the whole horse.

"When you first fasten up a horse's foot he will sometimes become exasperated, and strike with his knee, trying every possible way to get it down; but as he cannot do that, he will soon give up.

"This will conquer him better than anything you could do, and without any possible danger of hurting himself or you either, for you can tie up his foot and sit down and look at him until he gives in. When you find that he is conquered, go to him, let down his foot, rub his leg with your hand, caress him, and let him rest a little; then put it up again. Repeat this a few times, always putting up the same foot, and he will soon learn to travel on three legs, so that you can drive him some distance. As soon as he gets a little used to this way of travelling, put on your harness, and hitch him to a sulky. If he is the worst kicking horse that ever raised a foot, you need not be fearful of his doing any damage while he has one foot up, for he cannot kick, neither can he run fast enough to do any harm. And if he is the wildest horse that ever had harness on, and has run away every time he has been hitched, you can now hitch him in a sulky, and drive him as you please.

"Everything that we want to teach the horse must be commenced in some way to give him an idea of what you want him to do, and then be repeated till he learns it perfectly. To make a horse lie down, bend his left fore leg and slip a loop over it, so that he cannot get it down. Then put a circingle around his body, and fasten one end of a long strap around the other fore leg, just above the hoof. Place the other end under the circingle, so as to keep the strap in the right direction; take a short hold of it with your right hand; stand on the left side of the horse, grasp the bit in your left hand, pull steadily on the strap with your right; bear against his shoulder till you cause him to move. As soon as he lifts his weight, your pulling will raise the other foot, and he will have to come on his knees. Keep the strap tight in your hand, so that he cannot straighten his leg if he rises up. Hold him in this position, and turn his head towards you; bear against his side with your shoulder, not hard, but with a steady, equal pressure, and in about ten minutes he will lie down. As soon as he lies down, he will be completely conquered, and you can handle him as you please. Take off the straps, and straighten out his legs; rub him lightly about the face and neck with your hand the way the hair lies; handle all his legs, and after he has lain ten or twenty minutes, let him get up again. After resting him a short time make him lie down as before. Repeat the operation three or four times, which will be sufficient for one lesson. Give him two lessons a day, and when you have given him four lessons, he will lie down by taking hold of one foot. As soon as he is well broken to lie down in this way, tap him on the opposite leg with a stick when you take hold of his foot, and in a few days he will lie down from the mere motion of the stick. Supposing you wish to make a horse follow you proceed thus:—

"Turn him into a large stable or shed, where there is no chance to get out, with a halter or bridle on. Go to him and soothe him a little, take hold of his halter and turn him towards you, at the same time touching him lightly over the hips with a long whip. Lead him the length of the stable, rubbing him on the neck, and saying in a steady tone of voice as you lead him, 'Come along, boy!' or use his name instead of 'boy,' if you choose. Every time you turn touch him slightly with the whip, to make him step up close to you, and then caress him with your hand. He will soon learn to hurry up to escape the whip and be caressed, and you can make him follow you around without taking hold of the halter. If he should stop and turn from you, give him a few sharp cuts about the hind legs, and he will soon turn his head towards you, when you must always caress him. A few lessons of this kind will make him run after you. In twenty or thirty minutes he will follow you about the stable. No horse should be tamed more than half an hour at a time."

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE.

We have many popular preachers. The various denominations of Christians have their own particular favourites. There are also preachers who are popular with all denominations—who have a reputation which brings together all sorts and conditions of men. Popularity arises from a variety of causes; sometimes from a very illegitimate source—from some oddity of manner, eccentricity of expression, coupled with more impudence than intelligence; but such popularity is difficult to maintain, and can never extend beyond the circles of the uneducated classes.

Now, it has been said that you may get everything better in London than in the country: it has even been hinted that all is a desert beyond Hyde-park-corner. The majority of the best preachers—like the best of everything else—is in the metropolis. These stars rise in country parts, and culminate in London. It is so in all the dissenting denominations, and it is so in the Established Church.

About the Church, however, there has been grievous complaint made that good preachers are scarce. It is not that intelligence or devotion, education or refinement, religion, zeal, or practical philanthropy are wanting, but that tact of adapting the discourses to the minds of those whom they address; to present the truth in a popular and attractive manner—thoughts that pierce and words that burn.

Yet the Church has a goodly number of such preachers, and their success affords encouragement to others. It is evident that their success is not the result of extraordinary genius or of rare endowments, but that it is the consequence of clearness, simplicity, and earnestness. These men have felt the power of what they have to utter; it has affected their own hearts. They declare in the plain vernacular, with no attempt at brilliant oratory, the messages they have to deliver; their appeals, entreaties, encouragements, arguments, are all earnest, and such preaching is sure to tell upon the heart and conscience. Eminent among such preachers is the present Bishop of Carlisle. For years he has been one of the most popular divines in the church; for years he has been working zealously, not only in the pulpit, but in connection with every scheme of Christian usefulness. Commanding in person, graceful in action, with an expressive countenance, and well-attuned voice, he possesses all those outward qualifications which go so far in impressing the minds of an ordinary congregation; while, in addition to these, he has that universal sympathy and Christian benevolence which is sure to find its way to the minds and hearts of his hearers.

The Hon. Henry Montague Villiers is the youngest surviving brother of the Earl of Clarendon. He was born in London in the year 1813, was educated at Westminster, elected to a scholarship at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1834. For some years he held the vicarage of Kenilworth, in Warwickshire. There the simple earnestness which he had always exhibited was more fully developed; and in the discharge of his pastoral duties he won the favour and the confidence of his parishioners. Like Cowper's model preacher, it might be said of him—

"Simple, grave, sincere;
In doctrine uncorrupt; in language plain,
And plain in manner; decent, solemn, chaste,
And natural in gesture; much impressed
Himself, as conscious of his awful charge,
And anxious mainly that the flock he feeds
May feel it too; affectionate in look,
And tender in address, as well becomes
A messenger of grace to guilty man."

At Kenilworth he had opportunity of exercising his active benevolence in many varied ways; in none more interesting or more useful than in the schools connected with the parish.

In 1837, the subject of our sketch entered the "holy estate of matrimony" with a daughter of Mr. Hulton, of Hulton Park, Lancashire. In 1841 he was presented by the Crown to the rectory of St. George's, Bloomsbury. For fifteen years his ministrations in that large and populous parish were attended with eminent success. He was admired and beloved. Acceptable for his plain, straightforward honesty to rich and poor alike, his popularity rapidly extended. His church was filled to overflowing. His active benevolence was shown in the anxiety which he invariably manifested for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the people. Speaking of him while rector of St. George's, the author of the "London Pulpit" says—

"In the Church there is not a man who can read its stately service with more effect. And that service, well read to the hearer in a fitting mood, is a sermon in itself. Nor does Mr. Villiers' merit end here. He is no dull drone when the service is over and the sermon has begun. He does not indulge in a moral essay that can never influence the conscience or fire the heart. On the contrary, he is exceedingly active and energetic in the pulpit. He looks his congregation in the face, he directs his discourse to them. He takes care that not a single word shall lose its aim. His voice is heard distinctly in every part of his crowded and enormous church. The common truths of orthodox Christianity are those which form the staple of his discourses. To convert and to edify are his aim. Philosophy and the world's lore he passes by. His plainness makes him popular. The poorest can understand what he says."

His reputation won favour for him in high places, and the energetic and popular rector was made Canon Residentiary of St. Paul's. On the death of Dr. Percy, in 1856, he was raised to the see of Carlisle. He did not attain this distinction without exciting some captious criticism. It was urged that too great a preference was shown for the "evangelical" above the "high church" party, but the exemplary manner in which Dr. Villiers has fulfilled his duties, and the impartiality of his conduct to the clergymen of his diocese, have disarmed opposition, and have extended the popularity which has distinguished his whole career.

MOUSTIERS.

The little town of Moustiers, about four-and-twenty miles from Digne, stands on the edge of a precipice and at the foot of a very high mountain clothed with verdure and studded with trees. The name of the town appears to have originated in a corruption of the Latin word monasterium; the site, it is said, being formerly occupied by a religious house, founded by the monks of Lérins towards the close of the eleventh century. A chapel, dedicated to Our Lady of Beauveyer, may still be seen between the acclivities of two lofty mountains. To the summit of each of these mountains is attached a strong chain, in the centre of which, immediately over the valley, is a star of five points. This star is introduced in the old escutcheon of Moustiers.

The chain, which was detached from the mountains in 1793, and carried to the chief town of the district, has lately been restored to its old position, as it is an object of great interest to travellers and of pride to the townsfolk, though few people think it worth while to ask anything about its origin, history, or purpose.

An historical memoir of the town of Moustiers was written about 1756, by John Solome, a native of the town, and vicar-general to the Archbishop of Riez. In 1842 the first part of this memoir was printed at Digne; it forms a 12mo pamphlet of fifty-five pages; the second part, printed in 1849, is contained in an 8vo pamphlet of seventy-nine pages, but it has not had an extensive sale.

In this work the curious reader naturally looks for some account of the mysterious chain, but John Solome has but few particulars to furnish.

It is very disagreeable, says he, and very disgraceful to us to be unable to inform our children, or foreign visitors to Moustiers, of the true origin of this iron chain, or even of its exact age.

This chain, attached to the summit of our two mountains, extends from one to the other, a distance of a hundred rods, or following Soleri and Bonche, of two hundred and fifty rods. The chain was formerly composed of different links of iron attached one to the other by rings, while from the centre hung a smaller chain from which was suspended a star of five points, double gilt, and five hand breadths in diameter, according to Bentel, who had it measured when it fell, and of M. Saint-Vint, archbishop of Riez, who had it repaired. The star fell down in 1685, and that fragment of it which is still to be seen is of copper faced with brass.

The chain—according to the traditionary story current in the locality—owes its existence to a vow made by a knight of Rhodes, a native of Moustiers, who was delivered, by the miraculous interference of the Holy Virgin, from Mohammedan captivity. The name of the knight is unknown, the date of the occurrence is uncertain—a very gross piece of negligence on the part of the old historians. Who was this knight? From what noble family did he spring, what noble house did he found, what deeds of valour did he achieve, what sufferings did he undergo; was he in the full glory of his manhood when he pined in the Moorish gaol, or was he stricken in years; how many Moslem skulls had he cracked with his good sword, how many infidel thrusts had he parried with his good shield—who shall say? The author of the pamphlet to which allusion has been made, takes considerable trouble to ascertain the name and fortune of this trusty chevalier. He has done all that man can do to hunt up the antecedents of his hero, and to account for the chain, but his researches have not been successful. Ever and anon he has been attracted by some new light, which he has ardently and enthusiastically followed, but which has turned out to be nothing but an ignis fatuus—a mere literary will-o'-the-wisp. However, M. Abbé La Clue, prior of Moustiers, "had the goodness" to communicate to him, in 1719, an extract from an old book, "belonging to M. Antoine Riquetti, knight, Marquis of Mirabeau, Count of Beaumont, brigadier in the army of the king," &c. &c., which stated that Girard de Riquetti, the Lord of Aighin, presented a silver hand to the church; and that Anne Riquetti, cousin-german to the said Girard, gave "a star to the iron chain between the rocks of Our Lady at Moustiers."

The question of the star and the chain, however, is still involved in mystery. The research of John Solome has been fruitless, he is doubtful all through his book, and hesitating at the very end of it, so that whether the mystery will ever be cleared up is extremely uncertain; but, whether, supposing the chain of evidence to be as clear as the tangible chain itself, any good would come of it, is no less problematical.

Moustiers is delightfully situated in one of the most picturesque parts of the Lower Alps, and, irrespective of legendary interests, is worth a visit from all tourists in search of novelty, or of invalids in the pursuit of health.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXIV.

Can I say, halt! to time?—LOUIS XI.

MEANWHILE time crept, or rather galloped on, and poor Ben Darrell began to wonder why Jem came not. Jem seemed to him, poor wretch, to be his guardian angel. He was talking with the turnkeys, and telling them of Jem Goodman's brotherly love—of his inward peace, and heavenly hopes.

By this time the sound, as of the ocean in its wrath, reached even the interior of the prison.

It was now broad day, and all London, at least all its worst and vilest of both sexes, seemed to have assembled within view of the gibbet. There they were joking, jostling, squabbling, fighting, cursing, swearing; women with young babies in their arms and at their breasts, hastening on to get a nearer view of the gibbet at the risk of their own lives, and those of their "sucking babes." Swarms of juvenile pickpockets were busy at their perilous trade—many were taken in the act by the vigilant police. The Fox, Prigging Peter, and Stunning Steenie had meditated doing a little at their old trade; but luckily for them, Mr. Stephen, apprised of their intention of seeing Ben Darrell hanged, and thinking such ghastly sights much more likely to harden than to soften the heart, had outwitted them. While Potato Heels awaited them with her basket of grub (roasted potatoes, butter, bread, and saveloys), they had been detained till past the usual hour of execution (eight o'clock by St. Sepulchre's church) by Mr. Stephen, who had appointed them to meet him at the ragged school, and had managed to keep them there till he knew all must be over.

Every kind of villain and every species of abandoned women were assembled in the streets near the prison, and a horrible kind of joyousness seemed to agitate the dark waves of this human ocean.

At some of the windows that commanded a near and good view of the gallows, were some young men of fashion and some shameless, overdressed women. These gentlemen and ladies were enjoying "an execution breakfast," and toasting each other in iced champagne, which servants in livery handed to them. All this within sight of that gibbet! Nay, it was the object with them of many a witless joke. The mob was very impatient and in a very ill-humour. The sky was clouding over and rain was beginning to fall. Rain adds greatly to the dreariness of such a scene, and to the ill-temper and ferocity of the crowd.

Within, the culprit was listening to the last pious exhortations of the ordinary. In fervent faith and earnest penitence, only disturbed by the unexplained absence of Jem Goodman, Ben Darrell, at his own request, and for the first time in his life, took the sacrament.

By the advice of the ordinary and the friendly turnkeys, he then drank a cup of tea and ate a bit of bread.

Poor fellow! he had great difficulty in swallowing it—the pattern of the cup was the same as that of the first—and only set he had ever bought when he was newly married, and the recollection of happy breakfasts with his Esther, in the long ago, rushed on his mind, and sent floods of tears from his heart to his eyes. His own situation did not cause those tears, it was not the dread of the now fast approaching doom, it was the memory of Esther and of the long ago.

The turnkeys, who took a great pride in the idea that Ben Darrell would "die game," as they expressed it, were very uneasy at the sight of his tears. They persuaded him to wash them away, and to meet his fate and the dense crowd outside "like a man."

Ben Darrell made a great effort; he asked to be allowed to take leave of the governor and other of the authorities, who had been very kind and merciful to him. This request was complied with; they all shook hands with him; nor was it any disgrace to those manly hearts that their eyes were moist the while.

The hour is near at hand now.

A new—a terrible actor enters on the dread scene. Ben Darrell shuddered.

Even those accustomed to such scenes felt sick and cold, for it was Calcraft who now approached the prisoner.

Oh! the dreadful reality given to the ghastly scene when he proceeded to pinion Ben Darrell, who, though his flesh crept and quivered, and his eyes were distended, his lips white, and his heart beating violently, and a cold sweat breaking out over his whole person, prayed inwardly for strength, and submitted quietly to be pinioned, only saying, "Where is Mr. Goodman? He cannot have forsaken me at my utmost need; and my poor mother—where is she?"

CHAPTER LXV.

"He knew his trade," said his admirers in the crowd, "did Calcraft." Another roar—a howl; hootings, groans, and screams of fainting women. The crowd swaying to and fro; the glazed hats and batons of the policemen shining in the sun like meteors.—CHARLES DICKENS.

As Calcraft passed out at the debtors' door, the deep bell of St. Paul's struck eight, and that of St. Sepulchre began to toll the funeral dirge.

The assembled thousands expecting the prisoner, and at first mistaking Calcraft for Ben Darrell, set up a loud, a deafening shout, or rather howl; and, at the same moment, a tremendous peal of thunder seemed to re-echo that shout.

The sky by this time was densely dark; and clap succeeded clap, and flash after flash lighted the countless eager eyes of the mob, and played on the black gibbet and the stolid face of Calcraft.

The rain poured down in torrents as the ordinary in his black gown came slowly forth, reading the burial service—while still tolled on the funeral bell of St. Sepulchre's.

At last came the criminal himself.

Ben Darrell is face to face with that dense mob; and the yells, groans, howls, and shrieks with which he is greeted send a flush to his pale face, and for a moment draw his thoughts from the cross, and his upturned eyes from heaven.

As usual in an English mob on such an occasion, "Hats off!" was the cry.

Even at that moment he thought of Jem Goodman, and gently said to the ordinary, "Please, your reverence, give a dying man's best thanks and blessing to Jem Goodman, and my love and duty to mother and my little ones."

Probably Ben Darrell's appearance was less revolting than the mob had expected, for there was no second demonstration below; but heaven's artillery was louder than ever; and while Calcraft was fixing the halter round the criminal's neck, there was a clap so tremendous and protracted, that the executioner's hand shook, and every one felt as if the God who speaks in the thunder was angry with what was going on.

It was a most solemn scene. There was a momentary lull while the ordinary read the burial service, and the words, "Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery. He cometh up, and is cut down as a flower; he fleeth as it were a shadow, and never continueth in one stay."

Even at that moment the words brought to Ben Darrell's mind his mother—she of whom he was born, and many little incidents he had been told (as connected with his birth), and at the words "Cut down as a flower," he remembered cowslipped fields and violets, and the gathering them for Esther. And even while these thoughts rushed, against his will, through his mind, Calcraft fixed the rope, and began to draw over the prisoner's face a white night-cap, so thin that the features could be seen through it; but before he went beneath the platform and drew the bolt that sustained the drop, Ben Darrell suddenly begged leave of the ordinary to address a few words to the mob.

"I want to tell them, your reverence," he said, "that it's drink has brought me here."

"Remove the cap," said the ordinary to Calcraft, "and let the prisoner speak." Calcraft obeyed.

In a firm voice, and while the colour rose to his pale, thin, but still handsome face, Ben Darrell, from that dread platform, spoke words that sank into many a guilty heart.

"Men and women," he cried, "before I go to judgment, I wish to tell you what has brought me here!—and I do so that you may all take warning. Drink, strong drink's the cause, which I onst wor a happy, respectable, working man, and the fond husband of the best, dearest, and beautifullest of wives, am here, in a few moments to be hanged by the neck till I am dead, dead, dead! and then cut down and buried in a quick-lime grave, and not to lie by her dear side as we onst, in happier times, looked for with cheerful hopes of being happy in death and in eternity. For wife murder I am to die! I don't deny I killed her; but I done it in liquor! I never meant to do it—I never know'd I'd done it till the next day. I'm no schollard, and I can't speak no grand book words—but I spakes the truth and that's all as can be expected of a man—a dying man—as'll be dead in a few minutes! All you've heard of my having said I'd do for her, ain't nothink to the pint. I say here, as I'll have to say soon before my heavenly Judge, I never meant to kill my blessed Esther—and I wor so drunk I never know'd I'd done it! I says this, fellow-drunkards, male and female, not to excuse myself, but to warn you. I deservs to die—but don't you go the same way and come to the same trouble—dunt'es! I've often been in your place, don't you come to be in moine! I've ris betimes as you done to-day to see a fellow creature hanged—and then I've hurried off to the public and drunk away all that should have kept my wife and family. Don't you do this—as many of you means, perhaps, to do to-day. Give up drinking and you'll never come to die a death like this of shame and agony on a public gallows. So no more at present, but God bless you all—and farewell and amen!"

"I'm ready now, reverend sir," he said to the ordinary; and by this time an almost reverential silence pervaded that late noisy, riotous, and angry multitude, and many women were in tears.

Again Calcraft adjusted the fatal cap, and Ben Darrell murmured to himself—

"Farewell, poor mother! poor bairns! my little Ness and my baby Ben; farewell, Jem Goodman! May the Lord of Mercy take pity on you and on my guilty soul!"

Just at this moment a loud cry of "Respite! respite! Stop! in the Queen's name, stop!" burst on the startled crowd, and on Ben Darrell's ears; and a mounted official cried, in a stentorian voice, holding up his credentials, and his "order of release"—"It is the royal will that the execution be stayed: the sentence is commuted."

Had Jem Goodman prevailed?

That letter, which Ben Darrell's good angel had prompted him to write to Jem Goodman—had it saved his life? Had it carried conviction to the mind and heart of the most merciful, and yet most just, of earthly sovereigns? Was it as her Majesty's Home Secretary had opined? While the daughters of Fashion were sleeping on their beds of down, was the Queen already up and doing? With a rapid, keen perception, had she mastered the truth?

These are things we can only presume to guess at, we have no right to assert them; we only know that commutation of punishment was the result of Jem Goodman's last impassioned appeal to the Home Secretary, to whom he had before pleaded in vain.

The Home Secretary, in such an urgent case, to save time, had been the bearer of the Queen's respite himself; driving Jem Goodman to the spot in his own carriage, as quickly as those fleet horses could speed—full gallop, all the way.

The crowd—always loud and violent in its expressions—hurrah'd and applauded more vehemently than they had yelled and howled. Ben Darrell no sooner understood that his life was spared, and felt Calcraft's hands removing the cap, than the nerve that had hitherto sustained him, and which would have sustained him to the last, gave way at once. A ghastly pallor stole over his face, an icy coldness crept over his whole body.

"I thank thee, Lord of Mercy," burst from his now white lips. "Mother, bairns, Jem—bless you!" and the next moment he fell back in a death-like swoon, and was only saved from a heavy fall by the extended arms of Calcraft.

When Ben Darrell came to himself, he was in the governor's room. He had been so long insensible that those around began to fear he was dead.

His old mother, who had come to take her leave of him (as it seemed too late), was kneeling beside him, weeping passionately; and Jem Goodman was bending tenderly over him.

His sentence was commuted to transportation for life; for Justice has her claims, as well as Mercy.

How often some good angel seems to prompt us to do things from which we anticipate nothing, and which yet may turn the scale in our favour!

Whether the letter Ben Darrell wrote to Jem Goodman convinced his Queen that he loved his wife, and never meant to kill her, and decided her gracious Majesty in favour of a respite—or, rather, a commutation of sentence—we may not decide; but certain it is that the sudden thought that he ought to warn the assembled drunkards of the perils of strong drink, and the few minutes his simple, heart-felt exhortation occupied, gave time for the Home Secretary and Jem Goodman to reach the spot.

When our better angel prompts us to some good deed, let us yield at once to the blessed influence; we know not but that it comes direct from heaven, and may lead to heaven also.

The general feeling among the crowd was one of satisfaction; for there is no dense English crowd where good feeling does not predominate.

And Ben Darrell's awful words had had their influence with many, who went straight to their homes or to their work, instead of rushing to the gin-palaces or low pot-houses.

The fashionable men and their shameless female companions voted the whole thing "a bore," and a "take-in," and "a regular do," and entered their gay carriages, and drove discontentedly away.

But in some hearts there was a lively, a chastened, and a grateful joy. The poor old mother, Jem Goodman, and the rescued Ben Darrell himself,—what words shall tell their gratitude and gladness?—but there is in every human heart an echo to the deep sigh of relief and thankfulness that burst from theirs; and to such hearts, we trust, we address ourselves.

There had been, as usual, many accidents; and one little, deformed man, who had been much excited throughout the whole ghastly scene, and had climbed a lamp-post the better to see the execution, had, when the wretched culprit was respited, fallen from his post with a loud cry of despair, and been taken up dead.

That man was Natt Stone!

CHAPTER LXVI.

A favourite has no friends.—GRAY.
Hope springs eternal in the human breast;
Man never is, but always to be blest.—POPE.

THERE is no earthly bliss without alloy.

Lady Glenlonely recovered from her illness, and arrived in Carlton Terrace in the highest spirits.

From a baronet's wife she had suddenly, and by an incident so unexpected as to savour of romance (if such things did not occasionally occur in real life), obtained an object at one time as little to be hoped for as it was ardently desired.

Lady Pemberton no more—she was now Countess of Glenlonely.

But in the excitement, the engrossing and absorbing vanity of her thoughts and feelings, she had relaxed a good deal in her care of Sultana.

"A favourite has no friends," Sultana had none in either Tarlatan or Townley. Taken up with themselves and with each other (particularly at the station, where Tarlatan had all her own finery and all her lady's to look after, and Townley had to look after Tarlatan), they forgot to watch vigilantly over Sultana.

Sultana was lost—stolen, in all probability,—but lost, stolen, or strayed she certainly was.

This terrible fact was not discovered till they reached home.

Sultana travelled in a basinette, well covered up. It was Tarlatan's duty to look to her every now and then, and administer some refreshment. Tarlatan, Townley, and Sultana were in the second class. The new countess and Gerald St. Maur in the first.

When they arrived at the E—C—Station, Lady Glenlonely (late Pemberton), leaning on Gerald's arm, in passing Tarlatan, and when about to step into her carriage, stopped to peep into the basinette, while Tarlatan carried it; and Sultana gave a low whine of recognition and kissed her ladyship's white and jewelled hand, ungloved on purpose; and that was the last caress!

But it was some time before the countess discovered her loss. She was taken up with herself and Gerald.

Gerald had received Ada's letter; but "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," and he thought, with bounding heart, he might win her yet.

He felt he was not worthy of the Ada she was become; but he thought, too, it was in his power to become worthy of her!

How mean, paltry, and selfish did his own aims, objects, and wishes seem when compared with hers!

But if he could raise his mind, enlarge his sympathies, devote his great talents to great Christian objects; walk side by side with the chosen of his heart along that uphill path that leads at last to heaven, might he not be worthy of her then—at least, might not she think him so? He would try! and first he would get into parliament, and then he would, as Ada had suggested, inscribe on his banner, not No. 1, but No. 1,000,000.

With his position, his family influence, his name, his talents, his scholarship, and his eloquence, what might he not do in parliament, not for himself, but for "the poor?" How much might he not help Ada!

He would make her love him yet; he would make her proud of him; he would make her glad of such a head to guide, such a heart to sympathise with her, such a hand to help her.

And as he took this view of the case, he did not despair.

"She shall be mine, yet," he said to himself, "and proud to be so."

However, he intended Ada to consider that he looked upon her rejection as final, and that he had nothing to do but lament it and submit.

Perhaps he hoped by this delicate and mournful resignation to awaken in her breast a feeling of regret; and certainly when Ada, hastening down to welcome her mother home, heard that he had refused to come in, and had gone away pale and dejected, she did feel a pang at her heart, and a few tears sprang to her eyes.

Lady Glenlonely was so delighted with her Augustus, now he was a peer, that she showed him a tenderness and a sprightly good humour she had scarcely ever exhibited since their marriage, and was delighted to see that "the earl," as she loved to call him, was, owing to Jem Goodman's advice, quite a convalescent. The abstinence he had practised, and the simple, yet excellent system he was going upon had wrought a rapid and marvellous change for the better in his health, appearance, and temper.

"Oh, how well he will look in his coronet and his robes, when he is called upon to wear them, Ada," said her ladyship, kissing his now cool cheek, and throwing her arms round a neck no longer unable to hold up the aching, heavy head; "I declare, I'm quite in love with him again."

"And no longer regret old love?"

"Hush," said the countess; "even when you were a commoner and I had my choice of you all, I fixed on you, so that comes with a very bad grace from you. Oh, by the bye, Ada, ring for Tarlatan; I want Sultana; I wonder she has not brought the sweet pet in. I want papa to see how much the sea air has improved the lovely creature."

"There was room," said the earl.

"Room for what, dear?"

"For improvement," said his lordship.

In answer to the bell which Ada rang, Townley came in.

Townley was very pale and trembling.

"What's the matter, Townley," said the earl.

"I'm sure you look none the better for the sea air. Why, the man's got the ague."

"Are you ill, Townley?" asked Lady Glenlonely.

"No, my lady; only a little upset and overcome."

"Tell Tarlatan to bring Sultana here directly," said Lady Glenlonely; "and, if you feel ill, send for Bolus."

Townley tried to speak, but failed. He gasped, stammered, and hurried out of the room, rushed down into the housekeeper's room, where Tarlatan was in strong hysterics, and exclaimed, "It's no use; I can't tell my lady of her loss; it requires more nerve than I've got. Mr. Puff's the gentleman to do it; his nerve's surpris'n; and, not being my lady's own footman, he don't know what a blow it will be to her."

The bell rang again.

In spite of her assumed unconsciousness Tarlatan heard it, and kicked, and screamed, and stamped, beat her head, and tore her hair more than ever.

Mr. Puff would not be the bearer of the dreadful news; but Pertinette, who, as she was going in a day or two, was not very sorry to annoy, said, "Never put a label on your sex again, gentlemen; we've ten times your pluck, so here goes."

With that, Pertinette caught up the basinette, and repaired to the library.

She put it down at the door, and, taking out her pocket-handkerchief, began to weep.

"What's the matter?" shrieked Lady Glenlonely. "Pertinette, bring the basinette here. Ah! I see it all; she's dead—she's dead!"

"No, my lady," sobbed Pertinette; "would she were dead! it's worse than that."

"Worse! what can be worse?"

"This is worse," said Pertinette, taking up a large stone; "she's been stolen—stolen at the station—stolen while Mr. Townley and Mrs. Tarlatan were counting your ladyship's luggage; and now Townley's gone to bed with the shivers, and Mrs. Tarlatan is in all the hagonies of a hysterical fit."

"My poor Sultana; my dear, dear, lovely, fond, darling Sultana!" said her ladyship, bursting into tears. "What shall I do?"

Lord Glenlonely never could bear to see his wife weep. He rose and went to her, and said, "She's only been stolen, my love, for the reward they know you're sure to offer. You'll have her back, never fear. Ada, write out an advertisement, offering a handsome reward. Let it be put in the papers, and placarded too, particularly at and near the station. Here, give me the pen and ink; I'll do it myself. But don't sob so, my life; you'll quite unman me."

"There may be some hope," said her ladyship, "but I shall not have a moment's peace till I see her again; and I think Townley and Tarlatan so much to blame, I shall dismiss them both."

When Pertinette reported this in the servants' hall, the "historical fit" was renewed, and Townley had another attack of the shivers.

CHAPTER LXVII.

Though human, thou did'st not deceive me;
Though woman, thou didst not forsake;
Though loved, thou forbest to grieve me;
Though slander'd, thou couldst never shake.

Thou trusted—thou didst not disdain me;
Though parted, it was not to fly;
Though watchful, 'twas not to defame me;
Nor mute, that the world might bely.—BYRON.

THE death of Natt Stone made a great difference in the fate and fortunes of little Ness and Baby Ben.

They were his heirs-at-law. It was not owing to any will or wish of his that they inherited his property; he had been entirely engrossed by plans for compassing Ben Darrell's end—he had never thought of his own, but that the farm and all the rest of the property was entailed on the issue of a daughter if the son left none.

The Farm was worth three hundred a year, and might by a newer and more judicious system of farming, drainage, &c., be made much more valuable. Then there was the stock, the furniture, the implements, and besides all this, Natt Stone had two thousand pounds in the funds.

The wretched Ben Darrell is gone out as a convict, and his poor feeble old mother (oh, the mighty power of maternal love!) has, aided by Ellen and Ada, set sail to join him at Sydney. (It was to Sydney convicts were sent a few years ago.)

"He'll be too wretched, young lady," she said to Ada, "if he's alone in a strange country, with the thought of his poor dead wife, and no one to speak to but rogues and ruffians—which, though he's gone out as a convict, he ain't wicked at heart like they—and no creature to know what he really is; he'll find some comfort in his poor old mother, I know; and if he lives, I'm sure he'll be so steady, and do so well (for he swears he'll never touch drink more); he'll be let off, and get his liberty; and then we'll settle by a brook and build a place as much like our old home as may be: for, such a workman as he is, he'll have it up in no time!"

"But, if he does get his liberty for good conduct, wouldn't you like to come back with him?"

"No, miss," said the poor, pale old woman, the hectic flush of pride and shame suffusing her cheeks. "I've always been respected and respectable, and I couldn't live to be pitied and looked down upon, and have Ben pointed at as a man who escaped the gallows, and have what he done, drunk, cast up to him by those who'll hate him for being sober."

"But his children," said Ada, "will he not wish for them?"

"It would be cruel to them, miss; and I hope he'll consider his parting from them as part of his punishment. They, you know, miss, come in to all their uncle's property; and with the property they're to take the name of 'Stone,' and a good thing too, miss. I wish they may never hear their father's name, or suffer, poor innocents, for his crime; and as they've a great property, I dare say the world'll be civil enough to them. And now, miss, I have only to thank you and the other dear ladies for all you've done, and for my passage-money, and all the sight of comforts I takes with me; and if prayers—the prayers of a poor widow—can bring down blessings on your beautiful young heads, you'll be richly blest."

And so, strong in her mother-love, though seventy-six, and till then so feeble, Widow Darrell crossed a hemisphere; and the first face Ben saw when he landed was the face of that devoted mother.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. III.

THE rays of the summer sun had parched the earth. The ponds were empty, the mill-streams dry, and even the river was shrinking into a mere rivulet. The common with its sunburnt herbage invaded the woodland to the very leaves of the trees, and the foliage of those nearest it were beginning to assume the tints of autumn. In vain did the languid spirit seek for solace in its wonted shade; even there was no coolness; but silence reigned, for the voice of every bird was hushed, and as the burning air had drained every nectary of its honey, there was no humming over the drooping flowers. Every one we met was saying, as he wiped his dripping brow: "It is really the hottest day we have had this summer," and well he might, for the earth, when struck by the foot, had a sort of metallic ring, and where we looked for the blue sky, it was a dome of brass.

People inland exclaimed: "How I long for the sea-side!" Yet, even there is no exhilarating breeze. The ocean is still living water, but there is only now and then a gentle ripple, showing a play of delightfully transparent colours; the gurgling among the pebbles is scarcely audible, and a thread of silvery foam marks out where the refreshed land is met by the refreshing waters. Or it may realise that specimen of Crabbe's marine painting:—

"A sandy space
The ebbing tide has left upon its place;
Then just the hot and stony beach above,
Like twinkling streams in bright confusion move
(For, heated thus, the warmer air ascends,
And with the cooler in its face contends).
Then the broad bosom of the ocean keeps
An equal motion; swelling as it sleeps,
Then slowly sinking; curling to the strand,
Faint, lazy waves o'ercreep the ridgy sand,
Or tap the tarry boat with gentle blow,
And back return in silence, smooth and slow.
Ships in the calm seem anchored, for they glide
On the still sea, urged solely by the tide.
Art thou not present this calm scene before,
Where all beside is pebbly length of shore,
And, far as eye can reach, it can discern no more?"

Wilton and I had sought and found the coolest place we could; amusing one another with varied reminiscences, and with imaginings, equally diversified, of what might happen; for though the celebrated Mr. Macawber was always looking for "something to turn up," you and I, gentle reader, occasionally indulge in that inspiring occupation—as you are doubtless disposed most cordially to acknowledge.

A pause at length occurred: when, suddenly remembering our conversation about oysters, I said:

"Do you recollect that the naturalist Wilton promised to tell me something more about shells?"

"Then," replied Wilton, "the naturalist, as you call him, is ready at any moment to fulfil his engagement."

THE CROSS-FISH.

'Rocks, rough with limpets and brown tangle weeds,
Jut here and there; whilst, on the steady cliff,
Its cable sure the crafty mussel spins,
Lashing itself for safety to the rock

Here and there,
Speckled with slaty spots of green, that tell
Where 'neath their emerald fringes cockles hide
Strange shells, the marvel of old ocean's bed,
Are strewn around.'

But, if you ask with Calder Campbell—

'Have they been always here?
Or came they hither from far distant shores,
Unwilling captives of careering waves?'— then 'there's the rub.' Some things I cannot tell you; and about others so much might be said, that, unless we could be together as many weeks as we are likely to be days, a large part must remain untold."

"Alas!" said I, "that so it should be on so many occasions of human life. Where, however, would you now like to begin?"

"With the mollusc," said Wilton, "rather than the shell; as I have a special regard for my friend, and only a subordinate interest in his house. You will observe, it is a very minute creature, for some molluscs are extremely small, and eight hundred and eighty others of a larger size were sent, with their dwellings, a short time ago, in a penny stamped letter from Glasgow to Edinburgh. Yet, however infinitesimal, the little inmate enlarges its house as it suffers a personal expansion, with as much skill as is manifested by the giants of his race. Looking at one of these when shrunk within its shell, you might well deem any animal that could hide itself there as too small and weak to carry about a burden larger and heavier than itself; and that safety might be here advantageously changed for relief from so much heaviness of armour, and from such an impediment to every journey. And yet I could show you that there is, happily, no such exemption. I have a fine specimen of Cassia tuberosa, which measures fully ten inches in length, and upwards of eight in breadth, and another of Strombus gigas, which is nearly a foot in length; and yet, though the weight of the former is four pounds two ounces, and that of the latter four pounds nine ounces, each creature creeps under its load with apparent ease. Nor would you be surprised at this were you to see the latter, for example, actually in motion; for the seeming disproportion between the contained animal and the containing shell would then have disappeared. On issuing from its shell, the animal has grown visibly, has assumed a portlier size, and appears far better fitted than might have been imagined for its enterprise. The body has suddenly become tumid and elastic, the skin and exterior organs stretched and displayed, and the under surface—called the foot—has grown in length and breadth, and, with additional firmness, it has acquired the capability of being directed, bent, and modified in shape to a considerable degree, as the surface of the road to be traversed may require."

"I wonder not now, Wilton," said I, "at the course you have taken, the interest associated with the shell is immensely augmented by the study of the indwellers."

"It is," said Wilton, "and your conviction of it will increase just in proportion as you look into this matter. Every shell is 'precisely adapted to the circumstances in which its inhabitant has to live. Some are so light as to float on the surface of the water, while others, as we have seen, are more compact and ponderous; and in all such instances, the animal matter blends more equally with the earthy particles, and binds them very strongly together. In shells of this kind the carbonate of lime has more or less of a crystalline arrangement; the minute crystals being rhomb-like, having equal sides, and the opposite sides parallel, but the angles unequal or more like prisms, whose bases are any similar plane figures, and whose sides are parallelograms—and even more minute arrangements still may be clearly pointed out. On the outer surface of oyster-shells there are striae, fine thread-like lines or streaks. And on this fact, Lord Brougham and Sir Charles Bell justly remark: 'We should be inclined to say that the earthy matter crystallises, were it not that the striated or fibrous appearance differs in the direction of the fibres in each succession of strata, each layer having the striae composing it parallel to one another, but directed obliquely to the layer previously formed, and the shell exhibiting a strong texture arranged upon well-known mechanical principles.'"

"The increase of shells," I observed, "whatever their structure is, I suppose, in all cases ascribable to the mantle of the occupant?"

"It is," said Wilton. "The mantle of a mollusc is most certainly a wonder-worker. As, too, the new portion of shell is always similar in shape, and takes its form from that part of the mantle which is pushed out, shells must be exceedingly various. The simplest form is that of the limpet; successive edgings accord with its growth, and on the maturity of the limpet its dwelling is complete. But when the mantle is more active on one side of the opening than on the other, we have a spiral shell, in which each successive portion, forming an entire circle, is called a whorl. They are generally found with the whorls turning towards the right, which arises from the left side of the mantle being the more active, as the heart and bloodvessels of the mollusc are on that side; in a few, however, they are on the right side, and then the whorls of the shell are turned to the left. The knobs or spines projecting from shells arise from the mantle altering its form and dividing into thick or slender branches, which form hollow spines, gradually filled up with shelly matter, and eventually becoming solid. Many of these creatures construct a door to their shell; the more solid being fixed to the foot of the creature, and are enlarged in size as the shell is increased."

"The mantle is a real magician," said I, "secreting the living membrane, which, in its turn, not only yields earthy particles, but these of a shape precisely adapted to the end to be secured; and then arranging them in the best possible order. Why, with all due honour to our architects and builders of human kind, they might say to some of these shell-makers, as our old friend Major Dalgetty used to do, 'Permit me to be astonished.'"

"I think so, too," said Wilton; "but even here we must not stop. Wonderful as the mantle is in this power of building, it is no less so in its power of decorating; for the colours of shells are owing to glands placed on the margin of the mantle. An accordance is often observable between the pattern or tracing on the shell, and the colours as arranged on the mantle. Thus, in the Banded Snail, there are just as many coloured spots on the edge of the mantle as there are coloured zones on the shell, and if you remove a part of the shell for experiment, the piece reproduced will be brown exactly opposite the brown brilliancy. Shells, be it remembered, of every shape, density, and colour, from those which are extremely small to such as are large enough to contain holy water—as you have seen, perhaps, in one of the churches of Paris—are all in their increase and decoration the products of this magician-like mantle."

"Have we reached now," said I, "the close of the series of a mollusc's marvels?"

"By no means," said Wilton. "Not long ago Virey wrote, 'the molluscs are the poor and the afflicted among created beings; they seem to ask pity from other animals,'—only to show, however, that he knows nothing about them. They have certainly every power they want. It was long known that slugs and snails were attracted to fresh food; and Cuvier thought that the entire surface of the skin had the power of detecting odours, as if each creature were an animated and independent nose. But it has now been demonstrated that even such humble creatures as sea-slugs have organs of smell elaborately constructed. Strange too as it may seem, the sense most generally possessed by shell-covered creatures is that of hearing, and the ear, moreover, is an exceedingly curious structure, consisting of one or more parts, each supplied with its special auditory nerve. In this little cavity are sparry, crystalline bodies, composed of carbonate of lime, varying in number in different species, but all in constant motion, vibrating backwards and forwards, rotating on their own axis, or rushing with violent motion towards the centre of their prison, whence they are as violently repelled. And then, numbers of molluscs have the power of vision. The common Acallopp has not only eyes, but they are placed in a very extraordinary position, being arranged in shining rows along the borders of the creature's mantle,—as if a man should bear a row of eyes instead of buttons on his coat and vest—a fitting place if, indeed, he were like the Acallopp—without a head."

"Is there now," I asked, "any considerable sale of shells?"

"There is," said Wilton. "Some time ago a small shell was sold, not two inches long, and withal broken and damaged, for the sum of thirty guineas. Shells, such as conches, cowries, and ear-shells—so called from their resemblance to the human ear—are largely imported as parts of cargoes, and are sold to the principal dealers by weight. They vary in price from eight shillings to five pounds per hundredweight. The conches, found only in the West India Islands, are used principally for grotto-work and garden ornaments. The others, chiefly brought from the Indian Ocean and the China Seas, are used for chimney ornaments, and for inlaying the tops of work-tables and other articles of furniture. The shells specially valued are almost invariably small, and of an endless variety of shapes. They are brought from all parts of the world, land as well as sea—lakes, rivers, and oceans alike furnishing speci-part of the mantle, and yellow in the other parts. The brilliancy of the colour of shell depends on the health of the mollusc, and on its food, light, and heat. Those which remain in wood, chalk, or lime have little or no colour, while those which inhabit tropical countries are often remarkable for their beauty and mens to the collection. They are called 'cabinet shells.' Even Australia is continually ransacked for the obtaining of new varieties. 'I have been shown,' says Mr. Mayhew, 'a shell of the snail kind, found in the woods of New Holland, and purchased by a dealer for two pounds, on which he confidently reckoned to make a considerable profit.' I have been informed that there is not a river in England but contains valuable shells; that even in the Thames there are shells worth from ten shillings to one pound each. Although 'cabinet' shells are collected from all parts, yet by far the greater number come from the Indian Ocean. They are generally collected by the natives, who sell them to captains and mates of vessels trading to those parts, and very often to sailors, all of whom frequently speculate to a considerable extent in these things, and have no difficulty in disposing of them as soon as they arrive in this country, for there is not a shell-dealer in London who has not a regular staff of persons stationed at Gravesend to board the home-bound ships at the Nore, and sometimes as far off as the Downs, for the purpose of purchasing shells. It usually happens that when three or four of these persons meet on board the same ship, an animated competition takes place, so that the shells on board are generally bought up long before the ship arrives in London. Many persons from this country go out to various parts of the world for the sole purpose of procuring shells, and they may be found from the Western coast of Africa to the shores of New South Wales, along the Persian Gulf, in Ceylon, the Malaccas, China, and the Islands of the Pacific, where they employ the natives in dredging the bed of the ocean, and are by this means continually adding to the almost innumerable varieties which are already known. The manufacture of shell bracelets is one of the indigenous arts of Bengal, in which the caste of Sankari at Decca excel. The chanks of which they are made are large concave shells, from six to seven inches long, and of a pure white colour. They are imported into Calcutta from Ramnad and South India, opposite to Ceylon, and from the Maldivé Islands."

"I confess," said I, "that I had no idea of such a string of facts being produced in answer to my question. What other topic is there on which you can now enlighten me?"

"I think," said Wilton, "it will suffice for the present to remark, that a very curious chapter of natural history might be written on the enemies of shelled creatures. Among those of oysters, for example, is the race of sea-stars, and of these the cross-fish is especially voracious. The oyster fishermen fancy that the cross-fish loses its rays in consequence of its oyster-hunting propensities; that, insinuating cunningly an arm between the gaping shells, in order to whip out the tempting morsel, it is overmatched by the oyster's instinct; it closes the shell, and holds fast the aggressive ray. What then does the sea-star do? It prefers leaving its ray in the grip of the oyster to a death by so humble a creature; emulating, in fact, the warrior, who, finding 'the struggle vain,' then promptly flung

And safety sought in flight."

Link gives a vignette representing the mode of attack, with the motto, 'Sic struit insidias,' which we may thus English—'Caught in his own trap,' or, in algebraic phrase—'Minus a ray, minus an oyster;' a double loss, like that of the dog carrying a piece of meat over a brook, which you and I read in our childhood, but may not have profited by it as we ought in the days of our 'wisdom-teeth.' Sea-stars may frequently be found feeding on their prey, though unprovided with an oyster knife. They clasp the oyster with their rays, and seem to suck it out of its shell, 'with their mouths pouting out the lobes of the stomach.' They can project the central parts of their stomachs in the manner of a proboscis. In some instances, these creatures seem to act, like poachers, in bands. A naturalist observed on the sea-shore, when the tide, having retired, had left only a few inches of clear water on the sand, numbers of sea-stars rolling about in compact balls, five or six being fastened together by the interlacing of their rays. In the centre of one of these living circles, he saw a large, oyster-looking creature, grasped closely round, the shells were partially open, the mouth of each sea-star was in contact with their edge, while between the shells were inserted bladders, so to speak, some as large as filberts and others the size of peas, through which oozed an acrid fluid, paralysing and killing the oyster, by which the banquet was secured."

"Many thanks, Wilton," said I; "I gratefully accept the triumphs of the sea-star as the finale."

"As you are so thankful," he replied, "you shall have one more fact, as a bonus. There is a sponge-like creature, called the Cliona, provided with little drills, and with these it so riddles the shells of an oyster as often to make a meal of the inmate."

Chemical Experiments.

IRON IN THE BLOOD.

PERHAPS you have been told that iron exists in the blood; not only in the blood is it found, but in the flesh also, and the hair likewise.

I shall describe an experiment now, by which you may demonstrate the existence of iron in any of these things; but you must not imagine I am going to give you a process by which the iron can be obtained bodily, and made evident in its ordinary condition to the eye. That could be done, too; but the operation would be far too difficult for any person save a professed chemist—who, in his turn, would not take the trouble, resting perfectly content with the much simpler operation I am now about to describe.

By way of introduction to our experiment, however, I must explain to you that not always do chemists actually obtain the bodies concerning the presence of which they are assured. Perhaps when they do, it must be considered an exceptional case; at any rate, one may rest quite assured as to the existence of iron anywhere, without giving ourselves the trouble of extracting the iron.

Do you not remember that when, in the prosecution of our dyeing experiments, we desired to make a tint of Prussian blue, we accomplished our desire by bringing yellow prussiate of potash into contact with acetate of iron? Any salt of iron would have done—any ordinary salt, I mean; wherefore, if we can get any material out of blood which, when brought into contact with yellow prussiate of potash, affects the latter blue, the affecting substance necessarily must contain iron. Well, having put a little blood into an earthen crucible—you have not a crucible of platinum or of silver, I suppose; and an iron spoon would confuse the operation—apply heat until all the blood is charred, and nothing more burns away. Next pour the ashes resulting into a clean cup, moisten them with a few drops of pure spirit of salt, then add some pure water—distilled water, I mean—and, lastly, a solution of prussiate of potash. I have not the slightest doubt that a pure blue colour will result, and I know very well that such a result is only compatible with the existence of iron in the material operated upon. The young chemical student cannot generally bring himself to repose faith in these indirect tests of the presence of different bodies. He will not study chemistry very long, however, without feeling assured that such indirect tests are far better than the process of actually getting the substance operated upon.

Having shown you how to demonstrate the presence of iron in the blood by means of yellow prussiate of potash, it may now be added that tincture of gall nuts might have been substituted for yellow prussiate of potash. With tincture of gall nuts, however, we should no longer have had a blue, but a black colour—we should have had veritable writing ink, in point of fact.

Considering that the blood contains iron, it is a remarkable fact that chemists have not yet been able to determine the exact condition in which the iron exists. Inasmuch as the blood is red, and rust of iron is red, people formerly jumped at the conclusion that the redness of blood depended solely on iron. Modern experiment has by no means confirmed that view of the case. Physiologists, at this time, do not venture to express themselves with confidence respecting the cause of blood-redness.

As we set out by demonstrating the existence of one curious substance in the blood, we will finish, if you please, by demonstrating the presence of another, not only in blood, but in wool, feathers, and indeed almost every soft animal body. The substance to which I now advert is brimstone. It exists almost everywhere throughout the animal body. It may be extracted by the accomplished chemist in its own proper form, but we must content ourselves with gaining evidence of its presence in a collateral way, as we were obliged to content ourselves in the case of iron.

We will not operate upon the blood this time, but upon a feather. Having, then, procured a feather, proceed according to the following description:—Obtain a little litharge, which is a preparation of lead, warm it with a little liquor potassæ in a tea-cup, and, having allowed the litharge to subside, pour off the clear liquor into another vessel. If you immerse a feather into this liquid and heat the two, a silver spoon will suffice for the heating, though a glass tube, closed at one end, and known as a test tube, is still better; and, if the feather becomes coloured black, as it assuredly will, undoubted evidence will have been gained of the presence of sulphur in the feather, no other substances, under similar circumstances, being able to give similar appearances.

The Matron.

NO. XIX.

I HAVE been requested to give directions about preserving fruit, and I gladly comply; but I shall be rather concise, as the subject has already been touched upon in a recent number of our paper.

In the last four or five chapters I have addressed myself chiefly to those who wish to make the best of very small means. As they are engaged in a difficult task, I consider they have a great claim on my attention, and even on the subject of preserving I shall think of them first.

The general rule of weighing a pound of loaf sugar to a pound of fruit, would not suit you, who wish to economise every sixpence. You would prefer having your jam of rather an inferior colour, and making it at a cheaper rate.

The fruits which you intend to preserve should always be gathered in dry weather, and they should be used as soon as they are picked. It is a mistake to let them stand and grow stale. For any quantity of fruit, weigh half the quantity of moist sugar, but do not mix it with the fruit until you have first boiled the latter separately, then add the sugar and boil the whole for one hour. Much less boiling is generally prescribed, but it is by sufficient boiling that the jam's fermenting is prevented; and though boiling lessens the quantity, still it is an economical proceeding to boil it thoroughly, because this plan makes it keep. Besides, the more the fruit is boiled, the less sugar is required. I do not mean that you can put less than half a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit, but then that is much less than is used in a common way. The best pan for preserving is one lined with earthenware. Copper pans are dangerous, for the acid of the fruit causes verdigris, if the greatest care is not observed; but with earthenware there is nothing to be feared.

I think it is not generally known that rhubarb, such as is used for tarts, makes an excellent preserve; and as rhubarb is very cheap this is an important thing to know. In making rhubarb jam, weigh the sugar (moist or loaf) as for any summer fruit, viz., half a pound to a pound of rhubarb. Boil the rhubarb for about twenty minutes; throw away the water; add the sugar to the rhubarb, and boil the whole for three quarters of an hour.

Almost all the rules I have given for economical preserving, apply to more expensive jams; but for these loaf sugar, instead of moist, can be used, and choice fruits instead of common ones, but whatever sugar is employed, I must again repeat, it is all important that the fruit should be well boiled.

The old plan of covering jams with paper dipped in brandy is quite unnecessary, for if it is properly, that is, sufficiently boiled, it only requires to be tied down with white paper; and this, in order to protect it from dust rather than with a view to keep it.

Jelly requires an equal weight of sugar; and as both red and black currant jelly are useful in illness, I add a few directions for making them.

It is not necessary to strip the fruit from the stalks for making jelly. Fill a large jar with clean, dry, fresh-gathered currants. Place the jar in a large saucepan of boiling water, on a clear fire. Let the jar remain in the saucepan for half an hour, or until the currants have dissolved into juice. Then pass the contents of the jar through a hair sieve, and to every pint of juice weigh a pound of loaf sugar. Then put juice and sugar into the preserving pan, and, on a moderate fire, simmer the whole until the scum of the sugar rises to the top. This must be removed. You will know when you have boiled the juice and sugar sufficiently, by putting a few drops of the juice to cool on a spoon; if it soon jellies, it is boiled enough, and all you have to do is to pass it through a flannel jelly bag. It should be poured into the glasses or jars in which it is to be kept while yet in a liquid state.

From the preceding remarks and directions, it will be seen that jelly is an expensive article; but those who can afford it, do well to have a little of it in the house for the use of their own families, and for that of any poor neighbour in illness. A spoonful of red currant jelly in water makes a nice cooling drink in fever, and black currant jelly is of great service in some cases of sore throat. Blackberries, apples, oranges, or mulberries—in short any fruit that yields juice plentifully—can be converted into jelly by following the rules given for black and red currant jelly. In the next chapter I shall give a few directions for making pickles in the most inexpensive manner—not that I recommend their constant use, as I am far from considering them wholesome; but in warm weather, when cold meat is sometimes preferred to hot, a little pickle is a pleasant addition, rendering the fat of meat much more palatable.

Small Change.

CALL a lady "a chicken," and ten to one she is angry at you. Tell her she is "no chicken," and twenty to one she is still angrier.

It is a very consolatory reflection that death, whilst putting an end to the enjoyments of some, terminates the sufferings of all. He is a silent, peaceful, benign genius, who rocks our second childhood to sleep in the cradle of the coffin.

"You seem to walk more erect than usual, my friend." "Yes, I have been straightened by circumstances."

A LANDSCAPE is the silent voice of nature, speaking in forms and colours. The artist, who can reduce these vocal visions to painted writing, has a companionship with the outward world, an enjoyment of its beauties, and a consequent sweetness in his communion with the Creator, of the most hallowing description.

A MAN who lighted his cigar with a ballad and had a headache the next day, said he had a singing in his head, and thought it must be the ballad.

In the great struggles of life, men should press ever forward. Those who cherish too much pride of ancestry, lose the race by looking always backwards.

The following colloquy took place between Counsellor Sealingwax and a witness who "would talk back."—"Do I understand you to say, sir, that the prisoner is a thief?" "Yes, sir; 'cause why—she confessed she was." "And you also swear she worked for you after this confession?" "Yes, sir." "Then we are to understand that you employ dishonest people to work for you, even after their rascalities are confessed to you?" "Of course; how else would I get assistance from a lawyer?"

MEN of genius are often dull and heavy in society, as the blazing meteor when it descends to the earth is only a stone.

A VERY famous author, who travelled through the country a few years ago, said in his book, after his return home, that he found only one hotel where he was supplied with enough water to wash himself thoroughly. He must have been a very dirty dog.

So much of our time is preparation, so much is routine, and so much retrospect, that the pith of each man's genius contracts itself to a very few hours.

NEITHER contentment nor discontentment arises from the outward condition, but from the inward disposition.

A BOTHERING fellow, meeting a coal merchant, inquired what a chaldron of coals would come to?—The coal merchant began to consider, and knowing that the question was put to him for mere idle curiosity, deliberately answered, "Sir, if they're well burnt they'll come to ashes."

JERROLD went to a party at which a Mr. Pepper had assembled all his friends. Jerrold said to his host, on entering the room: "My dear Mr. Pepper, how glad you must be to see all your friends mustered!"

He submits himself to be seen through a microscope who suffers himself to be caught in a fit of passion.

IMITATION is the sincerest flattery.

"I BELIEVE that mine will be the fate of Abel," said a wife to her husband, one day. "Why so?" inquired the husband. "Because Abel was killed by a club, and your club will kill me if you continue to go to it every night."

GREAT warriors, like great earthquakes, are mainly remembered for the mischief they have done.

WHY are sheep the most dissipated and unfortunate of animals? Because they gambol in their youth, frequent the turf, are very often blacklegs, and are universally fleeced.

KNIVES never become martyrs for the sake of their opinions, but a great many fools do.

"WHAT would you be, dearest," said Walter to his sweetheart, "if I were to press the seal of love upon those sealing-wax lips?" "I should be stationary."

A CORSET-MAKER advertises that she is selling her stock at a sacrifice. Probably she means of health and life.

RUSHO WIT.—At a north country inn, the boots being called, a shrimp of a lad, in rustic attire, presented himself. "Well, are you the boots?" The youth, supposing, no doubt, that the gentleman was up to a joke, replied, "No! I'm the stockings, sur." The traveller, not exactly pleased with the answer, asked him "what he meant by such a reply?" "Wha," repeated the boy, in a sort of a simple laugh, "I'm the stockings, sur." "Stockings! What do you mean by stockings, you impertinent snapper, you?" "Wha, sur," said the boy, with an unaltered countenance, "I'm under boots, so ha must be stockings, sur."

WATER is a bad thing upon the brain, but a very good one upon the stomach.

ROYAL favourites are often obliged to carry their complaisance further than they meant. They live for their master's pleasure, and they die for his convenience.

GOOD ADVICE.—Be slow in choosing a friend, and slower to change him; courteous to all; intimate with few; slight no man for poverty, nor esteem any one for his wealth.

WOULDEST THOU BE BEAUTIFUL?

WOULDEST thou indeed be beautiful,
Though thou shouldst sacrifice
All other charms more worthy praise
To that one gift of price?

WOULDEST thou indeed be beautiful
When beauty fades so soon?
Beauty is woman's weakest charm,
And nature's poorest boon.

WOULDEST have a cheek of morning hue,
A star-like, beaming eye,
A rosebud lip and ringlets soft?
These change, and fade, and die.

Beauty may win thee, for a day,
The prize of many hearts;
But never will it send for thee
The ties that love imparts.

It will not find a friend more firm,
Or make a heart more true;
Its greatest charm is novelty;
Then give it but its due;

And wish not to be beautiful;
But ask a lasting grace,
Attractions that the angels see
In each sweet, loving face.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

IN order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I., New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

R. L. T.—In answer to our correspondent, "R. L. T.," and to numerous others, who have written to us on the subject of the root and its peculiar effects, mentioned in chapter 62 of "Smiles and Tears," we can only say that the author first heard it described by the wife of one of our Indian judges, who stated that she had witnessed its deadly powers upon a child, placed under the care of a relative of her own. The Brahminical writings are full of descriptions of drugs and poisons still more marvellous. In a romance it is not always possible to separate truth from fiction. The author, who has been consulted on the numerous letters we have received, declares his firm belief in the existence of the root described, and will willingly give the name of his authority to any scientific correspondent who may apply for it, with her address.

X. Y. Z.—"X. Y. Z.," who is at Weymouth, is in great grief, because his visit to the seaside only lasts a week longer. He dreads the idea of coming back to London, where, he says, the prospect never changes, consisting constantly of a row of brick houses; but, thanks to the tides, he says that, at Weymouth, he enjoys, from his bed-room window, an ever changing scene; and he wishes us to tell him something about these wonderful tides. We are most willing to do so. We must, however, begin by observing that it is a question on which doctors disagree; but we may safely state that the grand exciting cause of the tides is the force called attraction, the moon being the chief among the agents through which it acts. The moon, in her orbit, or journey round the earth, souths (as astronomers call it) on every meridian fifty-two minutes later one day than the other. The tides are only created when the moon is about two hours from the meridian. Thus, influenced by the moon, they happen fifty-two minutes later one day than the preceding one. Twice, in every day of twenty-four hours, the water advances and recedes; and thus, at least, one opportunity is given to "X. Y. Z.," and to all who visit the coast, to follow the retiring waves, and examine some portion of the wonders of the sea. But "X. Y. Z.," and all his friends, must beware of being so engrossed in the occupation as to forget that the sea flows as well as ebbs, and that tide and time wait for no man.

CHARLES VERNON.—The marriage in a registrar's office is a civil contract, quite as binding in point of law as marriage in a church. The parties to whom you allude must have been guilty of perjury in the false statements they made as to their age, or the registrar would not have joined them in wedlock. As they were, however, both marriageable, according to the act of parliament, their union cannot now be dissolved, though they are themselves liable to a criminal indictment.

INQUIRER.—The term "blue stocking," applied to certain ladies of literary taste, has been traced to the Society della Calza, formed at Venice in 1400, the members of which, when they met, were distinguished by the colour of their stockings, blue being the colour which particularly prevailed. The title rejected in 1590, crossed the Alps, and found a congenial soil in Parisian society, where it was used as the brand of female pedantry; it then came to England, and for some time marked the vanity of certain female literary coteries.

LEONIDAS.—Water was first conveyed to London by leaden pipes in 1237, during the reign of Henry II. The New River water was brought to London by Sir Hugh Middleton, in 1613. It was conveyed to the streets through wooden pipes, and through small leaden ones to the houses.

FANNY.—You are under a great mistake regarding the antiquity of the Prussian throne. The kingdom of Prussia only dates from 1701. Its first king was Frederick. To him succeeded Frederick II., surnamed the Great, since whom three Frederick Williams have ascended the throne of Prussia. The crown of France is, on the contrary, the most ancient in Europe. If we reckon the Buonaparte Family as a dynasty, we must assign five dynasties to French history. We begin with Clovis, A.D. 481, to Childeric III., 742; the Carolingian, from Pepin, 751, to Louis V., 986; the Capetian, from Hugh Capet, 987, to Charles IV., 1321; the Valois, from Philip VI., 1328, to Henry III., 1574; the Bourbons, from 1589 to 1848. But our readers must bear in mind that the sway of the Bourbons was interrupted by Republican and Imperial rule. In 1789, the French Revolutionists abolished monarchy; in 1804 the first Napoleon was crowned Emperor of France; in 1815 the Bourbons regained the crown, in the person of Louis XVIII., and lost it in that of Louis Philippe, in 1848. On the deposition of the last King of the French, a Republic was proclaimed. This lasted till 1852, when Louis Napoleon (the reigning monarch), nephew of Napoleon I., was elected Emperor of the French, under the title of Napoleon III., the deceased son of the first Emperor being looked upon as Napoleon II.

A BAYLEAF.—True; windows do not seem to come to us from the Latin, Norman, or Saxon language. It is supposed to be taken from the Welsh term, ymyd dor, a door for the wind. A window is still called windor in Lancashire.

OSBERT, MARION, ANXIOUS MARY, PORTEUS, R. P., CECILE.—In Hindostan the accent is on the last syllable. Do not talk of "trusting to fate." Trust in Providence and do your duty, viz., refuse to give your hand to one man while your heart is another's.—We disapprove of spirits of camphor for the complexion. You will find the subject treated in a recent number of our paper.—Apply at respectable shops.—"Cecile" will find sound and suitable advice by attentively perusing "Hopes and Helps for the Young," an article published weekly in this paper.

THE ARCTIC CRUSOE.—Copper is used to alloy gold coin, in order that it may be rendered sufficiently hard to stand the wear to which it is exposed. The amount of copper used in sovereigns is in the proportion of one to twelve. Of this alloy twenty troy pounds are coined into 934 sovereigns and one half-sovereign. The standard silver of our coin is an alloy of eleven ounces, two pennyweights of pure silver, and eighteen pennyweights of copper to the pound troy, and this weight is coined into sixty-six shillings.

B. T. F. C., RENWICK WILLIAMS, BEATRICE ISABEL AGNES SINCLAIR, Y. Y. Y., OCIELLA.—We cannot approve of your acting in defiance of your parents' wishes, besides, we are convinced that by so doing you would bring unhappiness on yourself, and on the young lady. In other respects we do not consider the circumstances you mention as hindrances to a happy union.—At your age indigestion often occasions an irregular circulation of the blood; we can only recommend great attention to your general health.—If you are young yourself, choose the young suitor; if advanced in years, take the old gentleman.—Moles are beauty spots; but even if they were not so, you could not with safety attempt their removal.—All depends on the circumstances of your first suitor. If you are likely to have to wait some years before "he is able to keep you," we advise you, supposing you are not seriously in love with, nor actually engaged to him, to give the decided preference to the man who can marry you immediately. By politely refusing the sweetmeats, you do not commit any breach of etiquette.

A WOULD-BE ACTOR had better think again before he acts. OLD DOG TRAY.—The affinity you name is not one of those forbidden by law.—Undine is pronounced as if spelt, Unden.

JOHAN.—You may obtain a judicial separation, but you are not at liberty to marry again, unless you can prove an act of infidelity. C. K. N.: See No. 25, page 400.—MAJOR HAWLEY: See No. 32, page 96.

T. W. R. should study a more courteous style. Arbroath, a contraction of Aberbrothwick, is the name of a town in Scotland, in the county of Forfar, at the mouth of the rivulet Brothie, from which its name comes. It is 58 miles N. E. of Edinburgh.

A. B. C.—See No. 29, page 48. NEMO.—Times of starting and fares vary so frequently, that you had better obtain the most recent railway guide, or the list last published by the company whose train you wish to employ.

G. H.—We believe the company about which you inquire, to be every way entitled to confidence.

A. B. C.—The operation of the "Forbes Mackenzie Act" is at present confined to Scotland.

DAHLIA.—"Dahlia," who has been reading "Peveril of the Peak," wishes to know how the Isle of Man became annexed to the British crown. It was sold to the reigning monarch by the Duke of Athol, who obtained it by inheritance from the Earl of Derby.

G. RANDALL, GOODNESS, T. G. X. W. W., ELIZA BOORN, A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—"Are you going to come?" is inadmissible: "Are you coming?" is the correct mode of expression.—A lady's assuming a gentleman's apparel is highly indecorous, and might, under certain circumstances, be indictable.—You must not expect perfection, for you are evidently very far from perfect yourself. Should any young girl who is steady, industrious, and good tempered, be willing to accept you, we advise you to marry her without delay, and by unremitting kindness and attention to prove you are worthy of her.—Wash your feet every morning in tepid water, and change your stockings daily. Do not attempt by any quack medicines or applications to check the perspiration, as you might thereby bring on serious, if not fatal illness.—Love only brings happiness when it is mutual, and we frankly own it is very unlikely that the gentleman, for whom you entertain such passionate regard, would be disposed to become your lover and suitor while you continue completely uneducated. Instead of wasting your time in watching for any man, settle down seriously to improve yourself in writing and spelling. When you feel you have made some progress, consult us again, and you shall have our best advice.

M. S.—"M. S.," whose cold and haughty manner has lost her the chance of an offer of marriage, can only determine to make herself more agreeable. Under present circumstances, it would be inconsistent with feminine dignity to make any advances to her former lover.

W. W.—Sugar was not known in Europe till about 1150; but the use of honey is of very ancient date.

KATE'S LOVER, A. C., ANNIE ARMETTE, A. J. S., ELLA BROSE, MOSS-ROSE BUD.—We greatly admire all the domestic qualities which you tell us are possessed by Kate, and we trust that your friends will soon learn to do her justice.—The hair is of a bonny brown.—Keep up your spirits; you have lost no time as yet. You see you are not so completely isolated but that our Paper finds you out, and most likely a good suitor will also find you out. Very likely you are difficult to please.—Alas! time turns dark hair light but too soon.—The inconsistency you describe is quite excusable; it would justify you in giving up the lady.—An ear for tune is not necessary for success in dancing. If you have an ear for time, we advise you to learn to dance, for the sake of exercise and pleasure.—If the gentleman is ashamed of devoting himself to you in company, we advise you to reject all his private proofs of regard.

Z.—You say you are tormented by moths. To drive them away, place an open bottle, containing spirits of turpentine, in your wardrobe.

ELIZABETH.—Your case is a serious one, and we have given it much consideration; the result of which is that we advise you to be frank. If your suitor is the generous man you describe him to be, he will admire the courage and self-sacrifice that prompted your avowal, and, conscious of his own weaknesses, he may overlook yours. At any rate, you have little chance of securing happiness by continuing to deceive one who has every right to your confidence.

J. N., CLARE FITZHERBERT, JENNY L., MAUDE BLANCHE, (2nd) MOSS-ROSE BUD, BELLE ARNETTE, PURPLE VIOLET.—A lady is excusable who breaks off an engagement with a gentleman, and refuses to give her reasons for so doing.—A clergyman who has been a deacon for one year can be ordained a priest.—Of the couple to be married, the lady or the gentleman must have remained three weeks in the parish in which the marriage is to be solemnised, even though the marriage is to be by license. We do not consider eight years too great a disparity, provided it is the gentleman who is the senior.—The lock forwarded for our inspection is decidedly of fair hair.—Endeavour to gain the gentleman's affections by deserving them.—May you long continue in your innocence, and never have anything to blush for.—If the ring is considered by our correspondent as a token of engagement, she should wear it on the third finger of the right hand; but, if no declaration accompanied the gift, we fear it can only be looked upon as an unmeaning attention.—In eighteen months a gentleman should have made up his mind; and if, in this protracted period, he has neither had courage nor resolution to do so, we consider him unworthy of a place in a young lady's affections.

W. F. LAIDLAW.—You should endeavour to procure a letter of introduction from some mutual friend. If no such friend exists, be ever on the alert to show the young ladies parents some delicate attention. Only persevere, and you are sure to find some means of forming the wished-for acquaintance, without infringing on the rules of etiquette. No importance should be attached to sentiments contained in valentines.

JUNO.—The origin of the saying, "Let the cat out of the bag" was as follows:—It was formerly the trick of a countryman to substitute a cat for a sucking-pig, and bring "poor puss" to market in a bag. A discovery of the cheat gave rise to the expression, "letting the cat out of the bag," or causing premature disclosure.

EVA.—A young lady, travelling alone, should not encourage the advances of gentlemen towards acquaintanceship; but good breeding requires that polite attentions should be politely received.

ALICE.—"Alice" complains, and with reason, of a gentleman who, in the company of a lady, does nothing but pour over a book or a newspaper. "Alice's" acquaintance must be a man of very bad taste to prefer a book to a lady's conversation; and he must be very indifferent to etiquette, thus to indulge his bad taste.

SENSITIVE.—Sensitive wishes to know how to keep young men constant. We think she should at least limit her aspirations to her own individual swain. If she teaches him fidelity she will have achieved a triumph, for hear what a poet says on this subject:—

"Find me an end unto a ring,
Turn water back unto its spring,
Make heaven stand still and mountains fly,
Then bring a man to constancy."

ERNESTINE.—Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, was the author of the celebrated moral work called "Telemachus." Fenelon was born in 1651, and died in 1700.

MEALY-MOUTHED.—Dr. Johnson supposes the term "mealy-mouthed" to be taken from animals who, having sore or tender mouths, are unable to grind their grain, and must, therefore, be fed with meal. Used metaphorically it means soft-mouthed, unable to speak freely.

C. E. R.—The 45 numbers of the "Art Treasures Exhibition" will cost you 3s. 9d., postage 8d. You can have them sent to your address by post, on remitting 4s. 5d. to the publishers.

VANDYKE.—You may depend on the fidelity of the likenesses of our "Living Celebrities." You are mistaken as to the authorship of "Hope Evermore."

JUSTITIA.—The mother's appeal must be to the Poor Law Guardians of the parish.

H. C. SREER.—Your question concerning the mode of painting slides for magic lanterns was answered long ago.—The name Anstralsia was first given to the fifth great division of the world by De Broses, a French counsellor, about the year 1766. It is now generally called Australia. Captain Cook first made known the East Coast of Australia in 1770. Numerous discoveries have since been made.

T. C. P.—The answer we gave was on good authority; but an unaccountable degree of mystery envelops the subject; and those who should be the best informed are unable to say for certain in what part of the British dominions the man who saved them from foreign invasion, the man who alone could cope with Napoleon Buonaparte—in a word, the great Wellington—first saw the light.

JOHN BRIGET.—Henry VIII. was a Tudor. We decline furnishing particulars as to poisons.

S. KITSON T.—You ask "at what age ought females to begin courting." We answer, never, as "they should be wooed and not unsought be won."

JOHN SIMON.—The tale "Dick Tarleton" commenced in No. 106 and ended in No. 146; that of "The Soldier of Fortune" commenced in No. 68 and ended in No. 105.

DUNCOMBE.—First give your plaster figure a coating of linseed oil; next a coating of dark green paint mixed up chiefly with spirits of turpentine. While this second coating is yet in a clammy state, on the most prominent parts, those which, if the article were really bronze, are most likely to be worn bright, apply with a dabber of cotton or a camel's hair pencil a little metallic bronze powder.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

'Tis said that the lion will turn and flee
From a maid in the pride of her purity;
And the power on high that can shield the good,
Thus from the tyrant of the wood,
Hath extended its mercy to guard me as well
From the hands of the leaguering infidel.—BYRON.

"How is it," exclaimed our hero, "that I find you thus disguised? and why are you absent from your regiment? What has occurred?"

"I am starving," replied Mark, in a hoarse voice;

"give me food; I have not tasted any these three days!"

Like most travellers in India, the friends were well provided, and Jack hastily set before him an abundant supply.

"But one word," added Richard, "to relieve my anxiety—Lillian?"

"Well when I left her," answered the hungry man, ravenously seizing on the first morsel presented to him, and devouring it like a famished wolf.

Having appeased his appetite at last, Mark Rayner, although he still continued to cast longing glances at the remnants of the repast which Jack was replacing in the saddle bags, intimated his readiness to relate the circumstances which had taken place since the departure of the 61st from Calcutta.

Day by day the disguised soldier described the march of the regiment till it arrived at the village where the treacherous attack was made. When he came to the escape through the blazing jungle, and the refuge within the walls of the temple, the admiration and excitement of his hearers broke forth in words they could no longer repress.

"Gallant fellows!" exclaimed the lieutenant, his professional pride deeply gratified by the narrative. "Sir Charles has proved himself worthy to command them."

"And Lillian," inquired Richard, who thought less of the glory his countrymen had won than of her danger: "how did she bear the horrors of such a scene?"

"I cannot tell you how nobly," replied Mark, his feelings warming at the recollection; "and they were no common terrors that assailed her, for she and Lady Bell had both heard of the fearful massacre of Cawn-pore, and knew the fate that would await them should they fall into the hands of their enemies. But they were prepared to meet it," he added, solemnly.

"How prepared?" demanded his hearers, in a tone of surprise.

"I ought to have said escape it," answered the soldier in a whisper, "by death. Rose told me that she overheard Lady Bell exact a solemn promise from your friend, Mr. Wharton, not to suffer them to fall alive into the power of the rebels."

The lover bit his lips to repress his strong emotion. More than once he essayed to speak, but a rising something in his throat choked his utterance.

"It would have been murder," sobbed Jack Manders; "and yet I could not have blamed the noble gentleman."

"A sacrifice, rather," observed the lieutenant, "and one which, if heaven did not approve, its mercy might have pardoned. Noble, generous Wharton, thank Heaven, he was not called upon to carry out his fatal promise!"

"Who can tell what has since occurred?" exclaimed our hero, mournfully. "The attack may have been renewed with more success, and their defenders slain, or pitiless hunger may have done the work of the sword."

"Little fear of the latter," answered Mark, hopefully. "The place was well provisioned, for the villagers had driven most of their cattle to the temple for security."

"Is the building a strong one?" inquired Marsh.

The husband of Rose described it in terms sufficiently clear to make the old soldier comprehend the advantages it afforded for defence.

"I would risk my life," he exclaimed, "that it is still holding out; our gallant fellows would keep the place against any force that was not backed by artillery. There lies the only danger."

"Had the rajah any cannon?" eagerly demanded Richard, turning to the disguised trooper.

"I believe not, sir."

"And his fort?"

"Appeared a straggling place of no great strength."

These and many similar questions had to be answered before Mark was permitted to renew his narrative, which proved to be one of extreme suffering and privation.

For days after quitting the temple he had wandered, without daring to trust to the protection of his disguise, through the wood and jungle, avoiding the villages by day, and sleeping at night in the branches of some lofty tree, for the possession of which more than once he had to combat with the ferocious jaguar. When driven by hunger to approach some isolated dwelling, he had rested but a few instants; but, the cravings of hunger once satisfied, he had returned to the shelter of the woods again.

It was a painful task, as well as a dangerous one, that Mark Rayner had undertaken; but a double motive urged and animated him: the first was the recovery of the good opinion of Sir Charles; the second, and strongest one, the safety of Rose, whose fate was involved in that of her mistress and the regiment. Whenever he found his courage failing, the recollection of all his wife had endured for his sake reanimated him, and he pressed forward, trusting against dangers that might have appalled the strongest nerves, and hoping almost against hope.

At last the perseverance of the wanderer was rewarded; and, just as his overtaken powers of endurance gave way, he encountered the first division of the avenging force on its march towards Delhi.

His melancholy message was soon told.

The intelligence that the gallant 01st were beleaguered in their solitary position by overwhelming numbers of the rebels, deeply moved the officer who commanded the advancing troops; but he could do nothing without orders from General Anson, to whom he forwarded the messenger. The decision of the former was prompt and soldierly. The regiment must be relieved at any risk, and Mark was once more despatched with promises of speedy succour. Worn as he was, the brave fellow readily undertook the task; and had proceeded thus far on his return, when Providence made him the instrument of preserving the life of our hero.

It was some time after he had concluded his narrative before his hearers, who had listened with breathless attention, could find words to express their admiration of his fidelity and endurance.

Richard was the first to speak.

"You have acted nobly, Mark," he said; "and whatever your past errors, your present conduct has redeemed them. Rose may well be proud of her husband. I no longer wonder at her enduring confidence and love; but tell me," he added, "and candidly, for I have a heart nerved to bear the worst of evils, rather than suspense, what think you are the chances that Sir Charles and his gallant band have been enabled to hold out?"

"I regard it as certain," replied the messenger, "against any force unprovided with artillery, and even then the struggle would be a desperate one; not a man in the 01st but would sell his life dearly."

"There is no fear of a surrender, then," said the lieutenant.

"You forget, sir, there are women with them," answered the disguised trooper, gloomily.

"Right!" exclaimed the soldier, "the question was a needless one; how far is the temple from this place?"

"For troops about ten days' march."

"We can accomplish it in three," observed Richard, eagerly. "Counsellor—guardian—friend, let us not lose an instant. Heart and brain are both on fire till I know whether I have a hope to defend or a life to throw away."

A consultation was held as to the best means of providing Mark, whom it would have been cruelty to have abandoned, with a horse.

"Leave that to me," exclaimed Jack Manders, in a tone of confidence. "You remember the house where we purchased rice and fowls this morning?"

Both his companions recollected it.

"Well," continued the speaker, "the owner of it has a powerful, vicious-looking brute—something like the one the major used to ride in Calcutta. I noticed it tethered in the field. It is not more than an hour's ride from here; wait, and I'll undertake to bring it back with me."

His companions insisted on accompanying him—the more especially as Mark, who knew the country, informed them that, by retracing their path a few miles, they might avoid several large villages whose inhabitants had joined the rebels, and at the same time shorten their journey by a day.

They had not proceeded far when a sudden turn in the jungle brought them within pistol-shot of the owner of the animal they were in search of. The fellow was mounted on its back, and had evidently been following their track; with what intentions might easily be guessed, for he was armed to the teeth.

At the sight of the three friends, he would have turned bridle and fled, but more than one ride covered him.

"Are ye robbers?" he demanded, trying to conceal his fear.

"Have we not paid you for the food we bought?" replied the lieutenant; "robbers are not generally so honest."

"We require your horse," added our hero, impetuously; "name the sum at which you estimate him, and it shall be counted down to you."

"I won't sell him," answered the Hindoo, sullenly.

"By heavens!" exclaimed Mark Rayner—who had approached nearer to the horseman than his companions—"but it belongs to the 01st! I can swear to him, even at this distance."

This exclamation, which was imprudently uttered in English, at once confirmed the suspicions of the Indian, who, levelling a pistol at the speaker, shot him in the left arm; fortunately, the wound proved only to be a flesh one, and was speedily avenged. A ball from Jack's revolver settling not only the first account, but the question of the ownership of the horse, which the marksman caught by the bridle as its rider fell from it.

Richard and the lieutenant dismounted, and bound up Mark's arm with their handkerchiefs.

"It is nothing," said the wounded man, smiling cheerfully. "An hour since I felt as if I could give up life without a struggle; I can defend it now," he added, "for I feel once more that I have something to live for."

Arming himself with the weapons of the dead man, the speaker leaped into the vacant saddle, and the party resumed their journey anxiously but hopefully, for Providence seemed to be watching over them. As they proceeded on their way more than one mental prayer was offered up for the safety of the helpless women whose fate hung trembling in the balance.

It is now time that we returned to the cell in which Lillian was confined, awaiting the return of her persecutor.

Here we may be permitted to remark how simple, yet inscrutable are the means by which the All-directing Power, which holds the universe in its span, controls the strong will and actions of humanity, working all things to its own end. An insect passing from one district to another, may bear contagion and death upon its wings, and the inhaling of a flower produce madness.

When Al Moorad entered the cell at the expiration of the hours he had granted his victim for reflection, he found her suffering from one of those pestilential fevers whose ravages in a few hours break the spell of beauty and reduce the sufferer to the brink of the grave.

Lillian appeared perfectly conscious of the fatal malady which had seized her, and saw him approach without fear—almost without a shudder; for the wing of the angel of death hovered over her, and its shadow was a protection.

"My prayer has been heard," she said; "and He in whom I trusted has displayed his power."

"What mean you?" he demanded.

"Approach and read an answer in the fever that consumes me," replied the fair girl, tottering from her couch till she stood directly under the light of the brazen lamp, which partially illumined her prison. "Aye, gaze upon me," she added; "contemplate your work. Approach—I fear you not, for my touch is death. Affection would fly from me—how much more lawless passion!"

"At least I shall have the consolation of knowing," muttered the disappointed Hindoo, "that thou hast never been another's, that the hated Tyrrell—"

On hearing the name of her lover, the suffering girl uttered a shriek so loud and piercing that it echoed through the vaulted passages. Reason, which till that moment had maintained its balance, gave way, and she fell into wild and incoherent ravings.

"I am death's bride!" she exclaimed. "No living bridegroom may clasp me. Come and receive the kiss of immortality from my burning lips—come, let me lead thee to the grave—peace, peace is there."

Terrified at the approach of his victim, the banker retreated towards the door of the cell. Lillian followed him with a scornful and triumphant laugh, for, even in her madness, she marked his terror.

"My tomb will avenge me," she added; "it shall send forth pestilence and desolation. Only to think, the hunter caught in his own snare!"

Unable longer to endure the horror of the scene, Al Moorad rushed from the prison, and sought the apartment of Nadir. It was some time before he could make the old man understand the cause of his terror.

"It is the will of the goddess," observed the latter, "and must be submitted to. I cannot vanquish death."

"Father," said his confederate, passionately, "thou knowest how devotedly I love this girl—how I have risked wealth, station, life to obtain her. To see her snatched from me, just as the prize was within my reach, is more than I can bear. Out of thy wisdom—and thou hast many secrets—find me the means to save her."

The Brahmin remained impassable, and made no answer to his appeal.

"Save her," repeated the speaker, "and half my wealth shall pay the ransom of her life."

The old man slowly repeated the word "half."

"All, then, take all! Leave me a beggar if thou wilt; I can welcome poverty, if Lillian share it with me."

"I must first see the Christian girl," observed the priest. "If the fever proves not too far advanced, my knowledge may do much. But there is a stage," he added, "beyond which all remedies are useless."

Rising from his seat, Nadir accompanied Al Moorad back to the cell where he had left Lillian. They found her senseless upon the pallet to which she had staggered back.

"Raise her," said the Brahmin.

His companion hesitated; the love of life was stronger even than his passions, although he was their slave.

"And yet you love," continued the old man, in an ironical tone.

Without the slightest symptom of hesitation or fear the speaker placed his fingers upon the pulse of Lillian, and counted its beatings; then raised the lids of her half-closed eyes, and examined them anxiously.

"Speak! is there hope?" demanded the banker.

"There is; but so frail, the slightest breath, the gossamer's weight would break it. You must avoid her presence; should reason return, and the girl recognise you, all the wisdom of our race were powerless to save her."

His confederate eyed him suspiciously.

"As you please," said the Brahmin, preparing to depart. "I speak not twice."

"Forgive me. I will be obedient, follow like a child thy slightest behests; it was a momentary hesitation."

"Say rather a suspicion," replied the priest, who, with his usual cunning, had easily divined what was passing in his mind; "but I forgive thee. Follow me."

"Where to?"

"The cell of Kehoda. When the maiden wakes from the deep slumber into which the draught I am about to prepare will cast her, the first voice which falls upon her ear must be a friendly one; the first features that meet her gaze, those she has been accustomed to, or madness may be the consequence."

"Should the girl refuse to attend upon her former mistress?" observed the banker, anxiously, for he was aware of her mad passion for our hero.

"She dares not. Life is sweet," was the reply.

"I thought she was condemned?"

"I have the power of pardon," answered the priest, at the same time touching the mystic cord which hung from his shoulder.

"Will she trust your promise?"

"Kehoda knows that the word of Nadir is inviolable."

By this time the speakers had reached the prison of the Nautch girl, whom, on throwing open the door, they discovered sitting listlessly upon the ground, clad in a saffron-coloured dress—the badge of the condemned. All fire and animation had vanished from her features. It was evident that she had endured not only mental, but great bodily suffering.

As the visitors entered, the Brahmin made the peculiar sign which imposes the most absolute silence upon the votaries of Mariatele.

"Listen to me," he said.

The prisoner raised her eyes.

"Thou hast been condemned by the laws of the temple, not for violating thy vow of obedience, but seeking to violate it. Had the former been the case, not even my power could have interposed between thee and the awful doom our laws pronounce; as it is, the presence of the chief Brahmin brings mercy."

At the word "mercy" Kehoda looked up into his face doubtfully.

"On certain conditions," he added.

This time she believed him.

"The English infidels are within the walls of the upper temple," continued the old man; "but we have one of their accursed race a prisoner in our hands."

On hearing that there was an English prisoner, the Nautch girl all but broke the silence which the sign, given by the speaker when he first entered the cell, had imposed. Doubtless, she suspected that it was Richard. The Brahmin, who read her thoughts, quickly undeceived her.

"Your former mistress," he said, "whom Al Moorad loves. The deadly fire burns in her veins, and threatens the seat of life. Wilt thou undertake to tend upon her?"

Kehoda nodded her head.

"Watch her hour by hour, and minute by minute, and carry out my instructions to the letter?"

Again the prisoner made the same sign of assent.

"In that case thy forfeit life shall be spared," said the old man, "and thy past crime forgiven. I remove the seal of silence from thy lips; again it is permitted thee to speak."

The first use Kehoda made of the privilege thus unexpectedly restored to her, was to fall at the feet of the aged Brahmin and pour forth a flood of thanks, mingled with vows of fidelity for the future.

"As time proves thee," said her judge, totally unmoved by the vehemence of her protestations, "so will it judge thee."

Calling to his attendants, a crowd of whom filled the passage, he directed them to remove the chain which held the prisoner to the stone column in the centre of her cell, permitting her only sufficient space to circulate around it; his commands were instantly obeyed.

"Now follow me," he said; "I will conduct thee to thy charge."

An hour afterwards Kehoda was installed in the cell of Lillian, whom she watched over with a devotion and tenderness great as the truest affection could have inspired; and yet it was not love, but fear, which urged her, at each fresh cry, to bathe her burning brow, and soothe her ravings with endearing words. She knew that every movement she made was watched—that unseen eyes were upon her.

Meanwhile Hirim, the groom, was not an idle spectator of what was passing within the temple. Since he had mingled with the priests, and witnessed the illustration their lives afforded of their morals, the boy had lost all the superstitious reverence with which he once regarded them. His residence became hateful to him, and he determined to seize the first opportunity of escape.

It was necessary, however, to be cautious.

For some time he was aware that the chief Brahmin found some secret means of quitting the subterranean temple. This he resolved to discover; but the proceeding required caution, for his life would be the certain forfeit should he be detected.

The attempts of the poor boy were for a long time fruitless. At last it struck him that the mystery was in some manner connected with a cell reputed to be of great sanctity, into which Nadir regularly retired after the evening prayer, for the purpose of meditation; whilst there the severest orders were given that no one should venture to disturb him.

"I can but risk it," thought the boy. "Life is not worth much held at the will of a task-master."

Armed by this reasoning, he resolved, after watching the old man to his retreat, to follow him. The place proved empty. Evidently the secret egress must be from this spot,—a careful examination of which enabled him to discover that the seat of the cell was movable. Satisfied with his first success, he withdrew.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

Presence of mind and courage in distress,
Are more than armies to procure success.

DRYDEN.

WE trust that our readers have not forgotten the sailor-boy Caleb, who for several weeks had been a close prisoner in the hands of the chief Brahmin. The hoary bigot had more than once announced his horrible intention of offering him a sacrifice to the goddess Mariatele. Great as had been the poor lad's bodily sufferings whilst on board the Caradoc, they were trivial in comparison with the mental ones he endured week after week in his solitary cell, anticipating the fate that awaited him; for Nadir, with a refinement of cruelty, had informed him of the purpose for which he was reserved.

At times, the terror of the lone captive drove him to the very verge of madness; and he doubted the justice of that Providence whose ways are veiled in clouds impenetrable to human gaze. In his calmer moments he prayed and gathered strength from that source where in affliction or danger true courage only may be found.

At first he had relied on the endeavour which he doubted not our hero and Jack would make to discover the place of his confinement. But as time rolled on, the hope gradually became fainter and fainter, till despair, then apathy, and lastly, a better feeling—resignation, supplied their place.

"I can but die," he thought, "and whether my bones rest in this den, in ocean's depths, or repose in the village churchyard where my father's lie, my soul will rise and confront my murderers before the judgment-seat."

Gradually the poor fellow brought himself to contemplate his fate with calmness—to calculate the duration of the sufferings he would have to endure before death released him from the hands of his pagan persecutors.

One night, long after the steps of the Brahmins and servitors of the temple had ceased to echo through the vaulted passages, as the prisoner lay awake, meditating these bitter fancies, he heard the chain cautiously removed from the door of his cell. He listened in breathless agitation: all again was silent, save the thick pulsations of his heart, beating like a bird against the bars of its cage; whilst darkness—impenetrable darkness, added to his terror.

After a long seclusion from light and liberty, it is extraordinary how acute the sense of hearing becomes, and sounds that are lost or disregarded amid the hum of busy life, strike on the ear with painful distinctness.

Presently, the door was partially rolled aside, and a suppressed breathing like the smothered hiss of a serpent, or some creeping thing, came stealing along the floor. Caleb had heard of the artful means by which the Brahmins destroy those they hate: he remembered the narrow escape of Richard from the fangs of the deadly cobra, and doubted not but he himself was about to be made the victim of some such hideous death.

Just as the long-suppressed shriek of agony and terror was on the point of breaking from his lips, he heard his name pronounced; and the sigh of relief that escaped him indicated to the intruder, whoever he might be, the exact spot in the dungeon to which he was chained.

"Hush!" whispered the same voice.

"Who are you?"

"A friend."

How the heart of the poor captive bounded at the word, but this time it was with joy.

"Hirim," added the speaker, creeping still closer towards him.

Caleb remembered the name of the sycee, with whom he and Jack had been on the most friendly terms, and the love of life, the hope of liberty returned.

"Hush!" repeated his visitor, in the same low, cautious tone, "do not speak till I am near to you."

In a few seconds Caleb felt the pressure of the speaker's hand upon his arm, and eagerly returned the friendly grasp. It is impossible to describe the feelings of the youth at finding himself once more the object of human sympathy. The touch, like an electric shock, vibrated through his emaciated frame, stringing his nerves with new-born energy.

"I have risked my life to seek you," said the boy; "but I could not bear the thought of escaping alone, and leaving you to the horrible fate the Brahmins reserve you for. Oh, that I had known them sooner," he added, in an accent of self-reproach—"oh, that I had known them sooner!"

At the word "escape," the blood rushed to the heart of his former companion, and he clasped the speaker convulsively.

"Are you chained?" whispered the speaker.

"Yes."

"Is your chain a strong one? Do not speak, let me feel it."

Caleb silently guided the hand of Hirim to a large ring of bronze which encircled his waist.

"Is that the only one?"

"Yes."

"That is fortunate," answered the sycee. "I have brought a file with me; you must contrive to cut it through during the next two days: the third night from this I will come for you. I have discovered the means of leaving this fearful place. Be cautious: and when the priests arrive turn the part of the ring you have tampered with under your arm; they will not observe it then. Do you understand me?"

A silent, grateful pressure of the hand assured him that the captive did.

It can scarcely be said that the above directions were spoken—they were breathed rather—to the listener, whose ears eagerly drank in every word.

Despite the caution which, for both their sakes, it was necessary to observe, Caleb could not refrain from asking the cause of the shrieks he had heard from one of the adjoining cells, and why cannon had been fired. Great was his astonishment and joy when informed that a regiment of his countrymen were in possession of the upper temple.

It seemed almost impious to despair, and the 01st so near.

"But the shrieks, Hirim," he said, "the shrieks—you have not explained them."

The boy shuddered.

"I have not heard them for the last few days in my waking hours, but they seemed to pierce my very brain, and are re-echoed in my sleep."

"You remember the sahib's daughter, whom our good young master loved?" replied the sycee.

"Miss Lillian?"

"Yes. She is a prisoner; the rich banker, Al Moorad, loves her, and—"

He paused—Caleb grasped his arm convulsively.

"The monster!" he groaned; "poor girl—poor girl! and no one to protect her."

"The fever protected her," continued his visitor "Kehoda, the Nautch girl, who was to have been sacrificed with you, has been pardoned by Nadir, on condition that she watched over her."

"The pestilence saved her!" exclaimed the young Englishman, interrupting him; "thank Heaven for that, even though it saved her at the expense of life."

"On the contrary, she has nearly recovered," said the sycee, "and this very night I heard the banker boast to the chief Brahmin that in three days she should be his."

"Never!" whispered the captive, with fearful energy; "we must save her."

"Impossible!"

"I tell you we must," repeated Caleb. "There is nothing impossible in a cause so pure and holy that angels would weep its loss. In three days did you say?"

"Yes," answered his visitor, hesitatingly.

"In two I will have filed through this infernal chain," continued the grateful youth, with breathless eagerness. "You must procure me arms—a knife—anything; then fly to alarm Sir Charles Fourreau, whilst I remain to watch over her."

With that vacillating spirit so natural to an Asiatic, Hirim began to regret that he had not availed himself of the discovery he had made, and fled alone. The reasoning, entreaties, but above all, the recollection of the kindness he had received at the hands of our hero at last prevailed, strengthened his better feelings, and he at length consented; but added, "that all hope of rescuing her would be useless, for the means of communication between the upper and lower temples were known only to the Brahmins."

"You forget the path you have discovered," urged Caleb.

"It leads to a half-ruined tower near the fort," answered the boy.

"Could not the English soldiers penetrate by that?"

"Impossible!"

"Why so?"

"There is room only for one to pass at a time."

through the low vaulted passage, every step of which is mined. At the first alarm Nadir would fire the train, and so cut off all communication. You had better fly with me," he added, "and leave Lillian to her destiny."

This was an arrangement, however, to which her countryman would by no means consent; and he so far prevailed that his visitor agreed they should make their escape on the second instead of waiting for the third night.

Feeling that he had remained longer than prudence justified him, Hirim, after once more shaking hands with the captive, withdrew in the same cautious manner from the cell—the door of which he no sooner closed, than a low grating sound might have been heard within the walls.

Caleb was already at work with the file upon his chains.

The struggle between life and death in the frame of Lillian had been a severe one. At times the forces of the contending principles appeared so equally balanced that a hair—a breath might have inclined the scale on either side. But, after several days of intense suffering, the skill of Nadir, who was learned beyond most of his caste in all the science of the East, and the untiring care of Kehoda, prevailed; the disease was vanquished, but it left its victim reduced to all but child-like weakness.

When informed of the certain recovery of the prisoner, Al Moorad expressed his satisfaction merely by a cynical smile. Lillian, he felt assured, could not a second time escape him. Everything seemed to favour his designs. The treacherous rajah had collected an overwhelming force, and was about to attack the temple. All fear of succour, therefore, from her friends he considered vain.

The chief Brahmin shared in his confidence, as well he might; for did not the Mogul reign in the marble palace of Delhi, and was not the massacre of Cawnpore unavenged?

"We will crush the infidels," he said, "like a nest of ants; the outraged and insulted gods of India have given them to our power."

"When will the assault take place?" inquired his confederate.

"Acbar waits but the arrival of the Begum's troops; a council is to be held to-morrow. I must be present to restrain rival pretensions, animate the lukeworm, and promise rewards to those who hesitate."

"When do you leave your present retreat?" inquired the banker.

"This night," answered the old man.

"I thought you said the council would not be held till the morrow?"

"Look on me," replied Nadir: "the snows of age are on my brow; but they have neither frozen my intelligence nor memory. The experience of my past life bids me trust to no man. Whilst my secret remains locked within my own breast, I am its master—once revealed, I become its slave. Think you," he added, "that even to Acbar I would explain the secret of the entrance to this secure abode?"

"And to avoid betraying it you quit it in darkness and mystery," observed his companion. "Well, perhaps you are right. But how are we," he continued, struck by a thought which did not appear to afford him unmitigated satisfaction, "whom you have introduced here, to pass once more to the light of day?"

"By the shrine above," said the old man, without moving a muscle of his countenance. "I can trust to you," he added: "have you not sworn upon the Vedas?"

"So have the collector and the police magistrate."

"Concern not yourself for their safety," interrupted the Brahmin, with a slight degree of irritation at being thus questioned. "What the goddess of the place decrees, her ministers will find the means to execute."

Al Moorad did not feel altogether satisfied with the assurance, and for the first time he mentally asked himself whether he had acted wisely in placing himself so unreservedly in the power of the astute Nadir, whose wisdom consisted in a great measure of cunning, which could only be equalled by his ambition and bigotry.

No doubt our readers will rejoice with us that the gallant 01st still held out against the attacks which had been made upon them by the rebel rajah, whose forces had thrice been driven from the walls of the temple, and, what rendered the defeat more mortifying, forced to retreat by the very guns which had been taken from them when they made their first attempt. Sorrow for the loss of his adopted child, so strangely and inexplicably torn from him, had not diminished the energy of the veteran who commanded the beleaguered garrison; on the contrary, it appeared to have armed him with a stern determination to perish rather than yield the solitary post in which he was called upon to maintain not only the honour of England, but the prestige of her name and arms. In this resolution officers and men all shared; and, although the privations they endured were necessarily great, not a murmur was to be heard, or a word uttered that did not breathe of vengeance.

Dawlish, who commanded the guard at the gate, was smoking his cigar and chatting with one of his brother officers, when the latter suddenly broke off the conversation by pointing to a group of four horsemen, riding at a fearful rate towards the temple; they were pursued by the rajah's cavalry.

"They may be friends!" exclaimed the sub. "Had you not better order the gates to be opened? If enemies, they are not numerous enough to cause us much annoyance."

Dawlish raised a powerful glass which he held in his hand, and something very like a smile of satisfaction rested for an instant on his features.

"Natives!" he replied; "decidedly natives, my dear fellow. How can you be deceived by so clumsy an artifice?"

The cornet did not think that he was deceived, and asked for the glass, which his companion declined to part with; he required it to watch their manœuvres himself.

As the fugitives approached they uttered loud cries, and waved their swords.

"I am positive they are our countrymen," observed the young man. I distinctly caught the word 'open.'"

"An old ruse," observed his superior; "most of the rebel sepoys speak our language."

"But suppose you are in error," urged the first speaker.

"I will take the responsibility," answered Dawlish, in a tone which, although it failed to convince the speaker, silenced him.

The four riders rode close to the gate, evidently expecting that it would be thrown open, to afford them the friendly shelter they so urgently required; but, disappointed in the hope, paused for an instant, and rode on.

"Tell the colonel," shouted the last, "to hold out. Succour is on the march to relieve him."

"By heavens, it is Mark Rayner!" exclaimed the major, who at the same instant made his appearance upon the platform over the archway. "Why did you not order the gates to be opened?"

This was addressed to Dawlish, who muttered something about prudence and an unfortunate mistake.

"Mistake!" repeated the major, angrily; "you deserve to be shot for your prudence—it has cost the lives of brave men."

The soldiers of the guard began to murmur.

"Give them a volley," said the speaker, pointing to the pursuing party, who had incautiously advanced within gun shot of the walls. "It is the only chance the prudence of Captain Dawlish has left them."

The order was obeyed, not only with hearty good will, but with a precision that left more than one saddle empty.

The confusion in which the unexpected firing threw the small body of cavalry, gave the fugitives time to reach a half-ruined tower, standing between the temple and the fort.

"By heavens, but they have another," exclaimed Plinlimmon, greatly excited, for from his position every movement was painfully distinct to him; "see, they have succeeded in closing the gates."

"It will prove their tomb, I fear," observed Sir Charles Fourreau, whom the report of what had taken place had brought to the walls. "We are too much reduced to attempt a sortie."

"They are within reach of our cannon," observed the cornet, who had first descried the approach of Mark Rayner and his companions, whom we scarcely need inform our readers were no other than Richard, the lieutenant, and Jack Manders. "Don't you think, colonel, we might bring them to bear?"

The change of position of the only two pieces of ordnance the besieged regiment possessed was immediately ordered; and the soldiers worked with such hearty good will that the alterations were speedily effected.

The first shot dispersed the cloud of horsemen, who withdrew to a distance, still keeping, however, in such a position as might enable them to intercept the fugitives, should they sally forth and attempt to retrace their way to the temple.

"The advantage unfortunately proved only a momentary one, for the alarm once given, the troops of Acbar issued in such numbers from the fort that all idea of attacking them on the part of the 01st would have been madness. A party of the rebels now dismounted and approached the tower, but were received by a volley from our hero and his friends, who fired through the loopholes of the building. Several times it was repeated and told with deadly effect.

The probabilities are, that had Sir Charles been aware that Richard was one of the defenders of that lone tower, feeling might have conquered the dictates of prudence and duty, and urged him to make a desperate attempt to rescue him, although it must have terminated in the destruction of the relieving party.

"Brave fellows!" muttered the major, his eyes still riveted on the scene of action; "pity it is of no use; they must perish."

His words proved prophetic, for whilst the assault on the tower was being continued, the rajah himself issued from the fort, followed by a body of officers and sepoys.

A piece of heavy ordnance was dragged up, and the rebel chief himself directed his men in bringing it to bear upon the tower and the desperate men who were fighting for their lives against such fearful odds.

"It is a painful thing," said the colonel, turning aside, "to see brave men die; but we are powerless to aid them."

The mournful silence of those around sufficiently justified his opinion.

"There goes the first shot!" exclaimed the major, as the cannon of the enemy belched forth its iron shower; "their shelter will soon be a heap of ruins."

"Better they should be buried beneath them," observed Wharton, "than fall alive into the hands of those who have never yet shown mercy."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

TEMPTATION.

TEMPTATION is a common evil to which we are all exposed, and to which the thoughtless readily succumb. To the youthful and the inexperienced, the temptations of a great city are exceedingly dangerous, and demand more than ordinary circumspection. We are in "A world, where lust of pleasure, grandeur, gold,

Three demons that divide its realm between them,
With strokes alternate buffet to and fro
Man's restless heart—their sport, their flying ball,
Till, with the giddy circle sick and tired,
It pants for peace, and drops into despair."

The wise seaman is careful about his "lead, log, and look-out"—three guarantees of safety amid shoals and quicksands. He runs close-reefed in a gale, and has a sharp eye to every lurking ledge or lee shore; and such a navigator is comparatively safe; while he who slumbers during the watch, or hoists all sail in a tempest, is sure to be wrecked. The strand of life's sea is strewn with the mutilated thousands who have perished on the murderous reef of temptation by foolish carelessness or vaunting self-confidence.

Temptation is the sworn foe of purity and peace. It rules with diversified tyranny over all classes of mankind. Some it arrogantly compels; others it with blandishments beguiles; some it takes captive by surprise; and rules over others with false shame or foolish fear. But it is most dangerous on account of its insidious character. It overcomes us by stealth. Those who would not for a moment think of madly leaping from a high tower, may yet be persuaded to descend step by step. The greatest and most fearful results spring from causes apparently insignificant. Some passion not checked in the bud, some viper not crushed in the egg, some vicious scene revisited with increased delight, the occasion of indulgence sought after, the desire of pleasing carried to excess, corrupt books read with satisfaction,—these are frequently the sources of ruin, which, increasing their force with alarming speed, soon become a torrent inundating the principles of virtue, and involving the character in inevitable ruin.

Self-confidence in the presence of temptation is most dangerous of all. "I can take care of myself," has been the favourite expression of many a ruined man. "A man cannot be ruined," says an old writer, "until he has made himself confident to the contrary." Observe that young man: he has come to town the hope of his parents, the pride of his friends, and with every prospect of outrunning their fondest expectations with regard to his success. His bosom swells with a noble ambition, and his cheek has never been tinged with the first hue of guilt. But by almost imperceptible degrees he is involved in mischief. He forms intimacies with unworthy associates; he familiarises himself with habits of thought and modes of expression of which he would formerly have been ashamed. He oversteps the boundary of prudence, and then his descent becomes rapid; character, prospects, hopes, are all lost, and as some early friend mourns over the wreck, he may express his musings in the language of our great bard:—

"We were
Two lads that thought there was no more behind,
But such a day to-morrow as to-day,
And to be boy eternal.
We were as twin lambs, that did frisk i' the sun
And bleat the one to the other; what we changed
Was innocence for innocence; we knew not
The doctrine of ill doing: no, nor dream'd
That any did. But, ah!—
Temptations have since been born to us!"

It is often those who are the least suspicious who are the first to fall into the clutches of the perfidious. Meaning no harm, they are unsuspecting, and, consequently, unprepared for any evil. They are deceived and betrayed, and sink by degrees. We fall into the snare as readily by harbouring noxious principles and vain thoughts as by the practice of vicious habits. The former are secretly or openly the friends of the latter. There is a German legend of a man who had resisted all the temptations earth could offer. The demon opened to his gaze the marvels beneath the earth: trees effulgent with diamond fruits, pillars of gold and precious stones, fountains of water of a million hues, and over all a delicious music instead of air. The tempter succeeded; envy and extravagant desire were created in the heart that had been calm before.

Our greatest dangers are never clothed in the most repulsive forms. They wear an alluring aspect, but are no less fatal on that account. Perpetual watchfulness is essential to our safety. Temptation should be avoided where it is possible; we need not go out of our way to tempt temptation; and temptation when it comes to us must be boldly resisted. We know not the strength hidden within us until temptation calls it forth. Every evil we make our own slave by subjugation—instead of our tyrant by indulgence—becomes an efficient auxiliary for good. The Sandwich Islanders believed that the strength and courage of the enemies they slew passed into themselves. In like manner, but in a nobler sense, we win strength from the temptation we resist.

"Our desires are the feet of the soul;" on these we stand or fall. Apostolic practice is the best guide for ourselves—"I keep under my body." He possesses little of the dignity of a man whose heart is led by his senses; and he is still less a Christian whose senses are not restrained by his heart.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH. CHAPTER XIV.

ROBERT looked so pleased when next George visited him, that the latter could not help asking him if he had acquired a fortune since they last met.

"Not exactly," said Robert; "but I have acquired two hundred French words, and this without any dictionary, and merely by employing the method you explained to me in the last lesson. Just look, I have written the English on one side, and the French on another, though in many cases the spelling in both languages is exactly the same."

"You have shown great zeal and industry," answered George, "but you must recollect, I only said that most nouns with such and such terminations were the same in both languages. However, as out of two hundred I find you have only made mistakes in ten, you may judge how many words the application of the rule enables you to learn. Should you like to hear a little more on the same subject?"

"Of course I should," said Robert.

"Well, then, sit down to write, and I will resume my old office of dictating.
"A great many nouns ending in y may be made into French words by changing the y into ie, for instance, tragedy, tragédie; fury, furie; but don't forget that those ending in ty are made into French by converting the ty into té. You learnt this in the last lesson.

"Now we will speak about the verbs that can be transformed into our neighbours' language. Most of our English verbs that end in ise, use, and ute, can be changed into French by adding an r to the final, thus, realise, réaliser; abuse, abuser; refute, réfuter. Remark, that to verbs that end in bute and tute, this rule does not apply. You must make them French by changing the ute into uer, thus, to contribute, contribuer; to institute, instituer.

"But, while you appreciate these little helps, you must not suppose that they will enable you to dispense with a vocabulary; and, now I think of it, it strikes me you do not know the cardinal numbers in French, so contrive this morning to add them to your stock."

ENGLISH.	FRENCH.
Cardinal Numbers.	Nombres Cardinaux.
One	Un
Two	Deux
Three	Trois
Four	Quatre
Five	Cinq
Six	Six
Seven	Sept
Eight	Huit
Nine	Neuf
Ten	Dix
Eleven	Onze
Twelve	Douze
Thirteen	Treize
Fourteen	Quatorze
Fifteen	Quinze
Sixteen	Seize
Seventeen	Dix-sept
Eighteen	Dix-huit
Nineteen	Dix-neuf
Twenty	Vingt
Twenty-one	Vingt-et-un
Twenty-two	Vingt-deux
Twenty-three, &c.	Vingt-trois
Thirty	Trente
Forty	Quarante
Fifty	Cinquante
Sixty	Soixante
Seventy	Soixante-dix
Seventy-one	Soixante-onze
Seventy-two	Soixante-deux
Eighty	Quatre-vingt
Ninety	Quatre-vingt-dix
One hundred	Cent
Five hundred	Cinq cent
Five hundred and twenty	Cinq cent vingt
One thousand	Mille
Two thousand	Deux mille
One hundred thousand	Cent mille
One million	Un million.

"I could see, Robert," remarked the teacher, "how surprised you were at having to write down 'soixante-dix,' 'soixante-onze,' 'soixante-douze,' which in our language would be sixty-ten, sixty-eleven, sixty-twelve, &c. I own I think it is rather an awkward manner of expressing these numbers. The old-fashioned way is to render seventy by 'septante,' and ninety by 'nonante,' instead of 'quatre-vingt-dix;' but old-fashioned expressions are as much ridiculed as old-fashioned clothes, so you must accustom yourself to the sound of sixty and eighty with all the teens after them; and observe that the one, 'un,' has always the conjunction and, 'et,' between it and the preceding number.

"Now we must think about the genders of nouns, and with this consideration we must remark their endings. You already know that it is the final letters that indicate the gender of inanimate things. Now, I do not deny that people may talk French quite fluently, and with a perfectly French accent, without being certain about the genders; but you cannot be a correct and elegant scholar while you remain in ignorance of them. You have learnt most of the masculine terminations; and also the words which, having these terminations, are exceptions, and consequently of the feminine gender.

"You recollect that all trees are masculine; so are also the names of shrubs, colours, days, months, and seasons. Nouns ending in a, i, o, u, are masculine, and so are those that end in é accented, if not preceded by a t—as 'opéra,' 'souci,' 'château,' 'thé,' 'blé;' in English, opera, care, castle, tea, corn. The exceptions to this rule are eau, glu, peau, tribu, vertu. Age, âge, uge, oire, acle, avme, ème, isme, and ome are masculine, as un nuage, a cloud; un piège, a snare; un déluge, a flood; but then you must except—la gloire, the glory; une écriture, an inkstand; l'histoire, the history; une racloire, a shuttle; la machoire, the jaw; la nageoire, the fin; une passoire, a colander; la victoire, the victory. Crème, cream, is another exception; and so are page, page; rage, rage; cage, cage; image, image.

The sound of our a is produced by the combination of the following letters; ai in the word aigu, sharp; ai in gai, jay; ée in année, year; œ, in œsophage, œsophagus; er at the end of a word, when the following word begins with a consonant or h aspirated; sometimes these two letters, er, have a different sound at the end of certain words, which they keep in the middle of all words; it is that of e' in the

† The definite article is often employed by the French in sentences in which we should suppress it. We refer the student to the exercises on the articles.

‡ Il faut, from the verb falloir, to be necessary, is one of the most useful idioms of the French language. Il faut represents so many English expressions, that they cannot all be given in this note. "It is necessary," "I must," "you must," "he must," "we must," and "they must," can all be rendered by il faut. It is also used in other senses, to which attention will be directed in the course of the lessons.

§ Avoir mal au cœur is literally "to have a pain at the heart." With the French it signifies to be sick. Avoir mal au, à la, or aux is the idiom for all personal pains. Thus we must say, J'ai mal à la tête, I have a headache, to express "I have a headache," "I have the toothache."

abbreviation of the English word ever, in poetry e'er. But we will mark this sound when speaking of the consonant r itself.

This sound is also produced by the two letters es, in the second person plural of the verbs: as vous lisez, you read; vous aimez, you love, &c.; also in the noun nez, nose; and in the preposition chez, which has no equivalent in English, and means at one's house.

This sound is also produced by the letters es, as in bontés; by the letters ef, in clef, a key, and efs, in clefs; by the letters ed, as in piéd, foot, and eds, as in piéds, feet; by the letters ais, in je sais, I know, and ait, in il sait, he knows.

Thus the sound é, marked é, is the result of the following combinations of letters: ai, ei, ee, æ, er, ez, es, ef, eds, eds, ais, ait, and et, which will therefore be found marked with the number (4) over them.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XIII. MECHANICS OF FLUIDS. PRESSURE OF THE AIR.

362. The body of air confined within a vessel, or room, presses outward against the walls of its inclosure—what is this outward pressure called?—The Elastic Force, or Pressure of the Air.

363. What have you to say of the condition of any limited portion of the external air?—It presses outward in the same manner.

364. What sustains and counteracts this outward pressure?—The equal inward pressure of the surrounding air.

365. If we apply the mouth to the upper end of a small glass tube, which has the lower end under water, and withdraw the air from it by suction, what will take place?—The water will rise in the tube and enter the mouth.

366. What causes it to rise after the air has been removed from the tube?—The pressure of the air upon the surface of the water outside of the tube.

367. It is often said, in such cases, that we draw the water up by suction—what do we really do?—We simply remove the air from the tube, and then the pressure of the outer air crowds the water into the empty space, or vacuum, formed within the tube.

368. Why does not the same pressure force the water up the tube before the air is withdrawn?—Because the elastic pressure of the air within the tube is equal to this transmitted pressure, and neutralises it.

369. If I were to take a glass tube, 33 inches long, fill it with quicksilver, and close the open end with the finger, then invert the tube, dip the lower end in a vessel of quicksilver, and then remove the finger, what would be the result?—The quicksilver would fall in the tube, until it stood about 30 inches above the level in the vessel.

Fig. 28.

370. What supports the column of quicksilver 30 inches high?—The pressure of the air on the surface of the quicksilver outside of the tube.

371. If the open end of the tube were of the size of a square inch, what would be the weight of the column of quicksilver supported by the atmospheric pressure?—Nearly 15 pounds.

372. What, then, is the pressure of the air in pounds on every square inch?—About 15 pounds; and 2,125 pounds, or nearly a ton on every square foot.

373. What is a BAROMETER?—It is simply the contrivance represented in Fig. 28, provided with a scale for reading off the height of the mercury in the tube.

374. What does it make known?—The amount of the pressure of the air at any time.

375. Does this pressure vary?—Somewhat from day to day, with variations of temperature, and

376. If a barometer be taken to the top of a mountain, or carried up in a balloon, does the mercury continue to stand at the same height in the tube?—It does not; it falls more and more the higher the barometer is carried.

377. What does this show?—That the pressure of the atmosphere gradually decreases from the earth's surface upward.

378. What may we infer from this fact?—That the pressure of the air at any point is the weight of the entire column of air that rests on that point.

379. Can the height of a mountain be determined by observing how much the mercury in the barometer falls, when the barometer is carried from the bottom to the top of the mountain?—It can; near the level of the sea an ascent of 93 feet is attended with a fall of one tenth of an inch in the height of the barometer.

380. How high will the atmospheric pressure cause water to rise in a very long tube from which the air has been removed?—Thirty-four feet.

381. How may the pressure of the air on solids be readily shown experimentally?—By taking a tube, open at one end, into which a solid piston has been fitted air-tight.

382. If a small orifice be made at the bottom of the tube, and the piston be pressed down to the bottom—on closing this orifice and undertaking to raise the piston, what will be observed?—The piston will be held down with considerable force; as it rises, a vacuum will be formed below it, and so the pressure of the air on its upper side has to be overcome.

BLIND MINNIE.

"BLIND—blind! Can it be possible? Alas, my poor father—my poor sister!"

"What is the matter? What has so distressed you, my dear fellow?" exclaimed a young man, entering the room where sat his sick friend, propped in a large chair by pillows.

"Read this, Frank," said the invalid, handing him a letter; then, burying his face in his thin hands, he trembled with anguish.

"This is truly sorrowful news," ejaculated his companion.

"What will become of them? My lovely Minnie—my poor infirm father! They will die of want, or—the hospital. Oh, misery! and the sufferer again bent down, and wept in agony.

"Is it really so sad as that? Do you not exaggerate in your distress? Have they no friends—no relatives?" asked his friend.

"None on whom they have any claim," answered the invalid. "My father has none, and my mother's relations would never notice her after her marriage with my father."

"This is indeed heart-rending," cried Frank Howard. "Something must be done for them; but we will think of it after you have rested awhile. At present you are overcome by the shock. Come and lie down," and, perceiving that his friend had fainted, Frank lifted him upon the bed and applied restoratives, which soon brought him to consciousness. A violent burst of grief followed, which Frank at length succeeded in soothing; and the sick man lay in apparent listlessness. Frank seated himself at the bedside, and soon became lost in thought. Suddenly, snapping his fingers, he joyously exclaimed, "Cheer up, man. I have it. It is a glorious plan."

"How—what?" And the wan face of the sufferer for an instant beamed with hope.

"Send for them to come here."

"Impossible!"

"Not at all! on the contrary, nothing easier. Our salaries for the last six months will pay their passage to us, and enable us to hire a comfortable apartment for them when they arrive. It's a splendid idea."

"Alas! Frank," objected his companion, gloomily, "your plan would be admirable were I in health; but I may not live, and, under the most hopeful circumstances, months must pass before I shall again be able to labour. What, meanwhile, will support them?"

"Be not so downcast, my dear friend. Remember the lessons you used to impress upon me. The merciful Father of mankind has never yet forsaken one who trusted in his help. Only have faith. Do as well as you can, and God will provide the rest. And how you wrong me, too, Frank!" he continued, taking his hand. "When I came here an orphan, friendless and homeless, you adopted me as your brother. Have I not, then, a right to claim your father and sister as mine, and do my share towards their support, as a dutiful son and brother? Don't look at me so doubtfully. It shall be so, I say."

"What an unselfish, noble soul you have, Frank!" exclaimed the invalid. "But I cannot consent to this self-sacrifice, for I feel that I shall never recover. You would then—"

"In such a sad case," interrupted Frank, hastily, "I could and would glory to be their sole support, but I anticipate no such calamity. On the contrary," he added, cheerfully, "I predict that in a few days you will be well again, and that the two Frank Howards will, arm-in-arm, take their long-accustomed way to the office of Robson and Co., there to puzzle anew old John, the porter, who can never comprehend the possibility of two people of the 'same identical' name, as he says, finding their way to Bombay from such different countries, and there living together, 'just as though they wasn't but one person after all.' And shame upon us, for a couple of ungrateful fellows! Have not our employers generously offered to continue your salary during your sickness, so that, even should you linger a long time, which heaven forbid, you have ample means of subsistence for them and yourself."

"Oh, you comforting angel!" ejaculated the invalid.

"Nonsense, you stupid boy!" laughingly cried his friend. "Just let me manage it, and you shall acknowledge that, though no angel, I am a right sensible young fellow, and an honour to my Yankee blood and birth for planning."

The sick young man pressed his hand, yet objected to the plan, as being too hazardous; but, after a rather lengthy discussion, strength, as usual, though not often in so generous a cause, conquered weakness. The letter was written and despatched, offering to Mr. Howard and his blind daughter a home with their son in India.

Mr. John Howard, our sick hero's father, had wooed and won the fair Minnie Dale upon the lovely borders of Loch Lomond, in Scotland. He was one of a class very common throughout Europe—a poor artist; and Minnie's wealthy parents, therefore, opposed the union. But love—who will not always be reasonable—led the fair girl to yield to the persuasions of her lover, and to marry him without the consent of her parents, who refused to pardon her, or notice her again. She accompanied her husband to London, where he obtained scanty employment from some of the picture-dealers. Music had been a favourite pursuit with Minnie. She had become a good performer upon the harp, and was thus enabled to assist her husband, by giving lessons to a few pupils in a boarding-school; but their united and unremitting exertions, and the strictest economy, barely sufficed for the support of themselves and their son and daughter, who had been given unto them.

They had but one friend on earth, Mr. Howard's only brother, whose means, although limited, were often and generously brought forward in aid of their own insufficient funds. When Frank was about twelve years of age, this uncle determined to seek to better his fortunes as a merchant in India, whither he invited his young nephew to accompany him as assistant.

His parents were loth to part with their son; but they were too poor to support him longer. He must work for himself; and this opportunity with his uncle offered many advantages, which might never again be opened to him. The boy was eager to go. India was, to his young mind, a place where gold was to be picked up in the streets, or, at least, where a fortune might be amassed speedily. He already saw, in his glorious anticipations, his parents living in comfort and ease, and his lovely little sister Minnie grown into a lovelier woman, accomplished, educated among the daughters of nobles, all through his exertions. His parents consented to let their boy go; and, with tearful eyes and sad heart for the present separation, but full of joyous hopes for the future, Frank started with his uncle, on board the ship Admiral, for Bombay. But—alas! for his air-castles!—his uncle, in endeavouring to aid the sailors during a fearful storm, was knocked overboard by a blow from a suddenly shifted sail, and drowned instantly; so that, on arriving at the land of his golden dreams, the poor boy found himself alone, without a friend, except the captain with whom he had made the long voyage, from whom he could claim assistance or advice. Through the kindness of this captain, he was enabled to procure a room and board in the family of a missionary. This good man and his wife advised the boy to return with the captain to England, as he was unfitted, both by youth and inexperience, to struggle alone for a livelihood, to battle and hold his footing among the set of men with whom he would be thrown, most of them adventurers, like himself, and eager of gain, and unscrupulous, in many cases, in imposing upon and ensnaring the unwary. This advice was, no doubt, correct; but it struck like ice upon the heart of the poor boy.

How could he return to be a burden to his parents, who could with difficulty support themselves and their little six years old Minnie? At least, he would not do it without making some effort to gain employment here. True, he was a stranger, unknown, and with no friend, save the captain, to whom he could apply for recommendation. He might be rudely repulsed, perchance insulted; but Frank was no coward. He boldly examined the unpromising circumstances which surrounded him. He believed his appearance would be in his favour, for the society of his parents, who had been almost his sole companions, had served to give him a certain gentlemanly refinement of manner. His father had carefully instructed him in the rudiments, at least, of a good education. His handwriting was neat, and he was an excellent arithmetician for his age. Besides, he was not afraid of labour. He would do almost anything that was honourable. Try, he would. If one merchant repulsed him, another might receive him. Youth is so full of hope! Having procured from Mr. Braun, the missionary, the addresses of the principal merchants in Bombay, he hastened to prepare himself outwardly for his adventurous expedition. The thought suddenly struck him that his uncle's name might be of some assistance, and he opened, for the first time since his arrival, his uncle's trunk. In seeking among his papers for a card bearing his uncle's name, his eye fell upon a small package of letters, bearing the names of some of the very merchants whose addresses Mr. Braun had given him. They were introductory letters! With a cry of surprise and joy, he seized these treasures, and sallied forth.

We will not follow our young hero in his long and fatiguing search. Suffice it, that after repeated and insulting repulses, he at length succeeded in procuring a situation, which offered him the means of present subsistence. He entered upon his new duties the following day; and his efforts to please his employers were so satisfactory, that, when the year for which they had engaged him had expired, they increased his salary to a sum sufficient to enable him to send to his parents a considerable remittance. A letter from his father, a few months later, informed him that this remittance had arrived just in time to aid in paying the expenses for the funeral of his mother, whose health had been gradually failing for many years under the discomfort and hardship to which she had been unavoidably subjected since her marriage. They were on the eve of selling her harp, in their distress, when Frank's gift had so opportunely relieved them from this necessity, to Minnie's great comfort; for, besides the value of the harp to them, as having been used by her mother, Minnie herself had become, young as she was, quite a proficient upon the instrument, of which she was very fond.

Frank continued to send them frequently such sums of money as he could save from his salary and his own small wants; and these, with the aid of Minnie's exertions (she had become very skillful in embroidery, as well as in designing, and obtained as much employment as she could undertake in both of these arts), had lately placed them in a state of comfort which they had never before known, and provided many a luxury to soothe the declining health of Mr. Howard.

It might have been four years before the date of our story that Frank Howard, who had now been for several years in the employ of Robson and Co., was shipping some cases of silk goods at one of the wharfs of Bombay, when he noticed a youth, apparently of his own age, watching him with a sad, earnest gaze. Frank accosted him, and found that he had worked his passage from America to Bombay. Having had a dispute with his step-father, which ended in his being driven from his home, he had, in a fit of anger, taken the first vessel which met his eye, to remove him from the shores where he felt himself so ill-treated and unhappy. He had no desire to go to sea again, but "guessed he should have to do it," as he was an utter stranger in Bombay, and had no means of gaining a livelihood.

Struck by the handsome, open countenance of the stranger, and interested in his story, as well as sorry for his present friendless position, Frank invited him to dine with him, saying that he would afterwards take him to Robson and Co., who were in need of an assistant packer, and might, perhaps, be willing to try him. The stranger gladly consented, and, on their way to Frank's boarding-house, said—

"May I ask to whom I am indebted for such unexpected, generous kindness?"

"I am from England," answered his companion, "and my name is Francis Howard."

"Impossible!" cried the stranger.

"And why impossible?"

"Because that's my name."

"Nonsense! You are surely jesting, now!"

"No, on my honour," replied the stranger; "I was baptised Francis Howard, and ever since rejoiced in the more familiar title of Frank."

"Well, this is the strangest coincidence!" ejaculated our Frank, and the two boys laughed merrily.

After dinner, Frank introduced his new acquaintance to Mr. Robson. When he mentioned his name, the merry old gentleman called to his brother: "John, John, come here. This is as good as a play."

He explained the circumstances.

"Faith," replied his brother, "and they are almost as similar in looks as in name. Give our Frank a pair of dark eyes and a little more sinew, and I defy you to know them apart;" then, shaking hands with the stranger, he added, "We will take you in our service on the recommendation of our friend, your namesake, and if you serve us as faithfully as he has done, we shall have no cause to regret our confidence."

Our Frank soon discovered the generous, honourable nature of his American namesake, shared his apartment with him, and adopted him as his brother. Their devoted affection had known no change up to the present date, when they had nearly attained manhood, being about twenty years of age. No wonder that the American Frank should demand, as his right, to look upon his friend's relatives as his also.

A few weeks before the scene with which our story opened, Frank Howard, while assisting to lift a bale of goods into a vessel, had received a severe blow on the chest, which knocked him backwards. He was taken up stunned, and carried home. A physician was immediately called, but, after a careful examination of the injury, pronounced it impossible that he should ever entirely recover from the effects of it. This decision was, however, concealed from the two friends, and the brothers Robson offered to continue the invalid's salary during his illness, even should it be a long one. His friend determined that their generosity should cause them no loss; he, therefore, took the sick man's responsible situation in their office in addition to his own lighter one. Howard had been for several days free from great pain, and Frank, not perceiving his increasing weakness, imagined him convalescing; and when he wrote the letter in his name, inviting Howard's father and sister to come out to them, he mentioned nothing of his illness, believing that ere they could arrive Howard would be quite well again. But the intelligence of his sister's misfortune had been too great a shock for his exhausted frame. Violent bodily suffering again seized him; and though, after many weary days, the racking pain was lulled, it became evident even to the hopeful eyes of Frank that his poor friend was worn out and must die. But months passed, and the poor fellow still lingered, never complaining, and sometimes slightly rallying for a few hours. At length, one evening, as Frank sat wistfully gazing upon the still emaciated face of the sufferer, the latter suddenly beckoned him to his bedside, and whispered—

"Frank, my dear friend, I ought not longer to conceal from you what I had long known myself, that I cannot recover. I now feel that death is not many days distant from me. We shall soon be separated by the only power which could have parted us. Do you not see that I am right?"

A groan and a shudder from the young man beside him was his only reply.

"My friend," continued the sufferer, "be not distressed for my sake. To me personally death will be but a relief from suffering. I fear it not; I am ready. But for you, and still more for those helpless ones who will now so soon be here, I would gladly have the cup pass from me. For their sakes I have earnestly prayed to God that my life might be spared; but he wills otherwise, and I must be satisfied. I know, my brother, that my father and sister will never want shelter or food while you live. I give them, under God, into your charge—to your protection. You will never abandon them, of that I feel sure. Now I see plainly the providence of God in directing me towards you on that day when you sat alone on the pier. He drew my heart towards you that you might be raised up to be a son unto my father in my place."

His friend pressed his hand fervently; and, after a pause, Howard continued:—"My father, in all probability, must soon die, for he is very infirm; but my sister—she may need your care through a long lifetime. Will you not sometimes weary of the burden, Frank, and blame me for having imposed upon you a charge which will cause you so much self-sacrifice and—"

"Fear not!" interrupted Frank, in a firm, earnest tone. "I swear to you that, while I live, she shall never lack a brother and protector."

VOICES.

THERE are voices we shall never hear again

As we heard them long ago,
Save in the mournful midnight rain,
In the wind, as it murmurs its moaning strain
In the water's complaining flow.

Some through the boundless blue have soared
Up to the land of light,
To the fanns we have loved they are never restored,
And their mystic music is only poured
On silence, and on the night.

Some, that in happy years of yore
We heard with a passionate thrill,
Have lost the magic to charm us more;
And though their spell is for ever o'er,
Their memory liveth still.

And still, as we catch a reflected gleam
Of the loves and the hopes gone by,
We hear, like music is heard in a dream,
Voices remembered, and charmed, that seem
A marvel of melody.

Some have departed, and some have grown strange.

Those voices of long ago,
And we sigh—as we yearn for the wider range—
That death is better, far better than change:
Alas, that we loved them so!

RT. HON. LORD VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, K.G., M.P.

No living statesman has been more continuously before the public than Viscount Palmerston. He has held office under governments of every shade of politics, he has fought many battles, weathered many storms, has invited confidence, and excited indignation; but by talents of no mean order, and triumphs of no small importance, he has fairly earned from friend and foe the assertion made about him by the late Sir Robert Peel—"We are all proud of him." Without at all entering on the question which ended in his resignation of office, and in the formation of the new ministry, we furnish a brief outline of the career of this eminent statesman. At the same time we have pleasure in presenting an engraved portrait from a photograph by Herbert Watkin, taken on the seventy-third anniversary of his lordship's birthday.

Viscount Palmerston claims lineage as, ancient and as noble as that of any family in the peerage. The family of Temple can be traced directly and legitimately from a son of Leofric, of Mercia, who founded the abbey of Coventry, and who married lady Godiva. The accomplished Sir W. Temple, the eminent minister in the reigns of James, William, and Anne, was also among his lordship's more recent predecessors. He was born in 1784. He was educated at Harrow, and then, as was the fashion with certain scions of noble houses of liberal tendencies, went to Edinburgh to study moral philosophy, under the celebrated Dugald Stewart, for two years; after which he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became an honorary M.A. in 1806.

His lordship commenced his parliamentary career almost as soon as he was of age by contesting the representation of the University of Cambridge with Lord Henry Petty—now Marquis of Lansdowne. This was in 1806. He was unsuccessful in this attempt, but was soon afterwards "appointed" representative of the pocket borough of Bletchingly, and was introduced into official life as a junior lord of the Admiralty.

The young Irish peer, as yet without the slightest distinction in the political world, held the last-named appointment for about two years, shifting his parliamentary services from Bletchingly to Newport, in the Isle of Wight, and from thence to the University of Cambridge. He then succeeded to the secretaryship of the War Department. His lordship entered this office in 1809, and retained it, with but very trifling interruption, for the extraordinary period of twenty years! In the meantime, many governments had flourished and perished, each in political opinion as opposite to its predecessor as one could well imagine; yet Lord Palmerston managed to agree with them all. He appears to have been the most docile of subordinates and the most unobtrusive of senators. His love of office seemed to beget a sort of cleverness in adapting himself to the circumstances of the day—not the least effective step being a careful study of what Carlyle calls the "talent of silence." His lordship was seldom heard in debate, except when discussing the business of his own department, or when the annual estimates were under consideration.

At length the noble viscount began to take a more prominent part. In 1830 he abandoned his tory and liberal-conservative friends, to join the whig government of Earl Grey, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Those were stirring times, both at home and abroad, so that his lordship had ample opportu-ties of showing his skill in political debate. His views on the foreign policy of England were (and always have been) vehemently discussed and opposed; his lordship displayed undeniable ability in defending his opinions and remarkable zeal in attacking his opponents.

Lord Palmerston's reign in the Foreign Office was subjected to a brief interruption by the advent of Sir Robert Peel's first administration. This was exceedingly short-lived, and the noble viscount resumed his seat under the rule of Lord Melbourne, until the ministry of that statesman in its turn gave way to the strength of the opposition. Sir Robert's second and more effective attempt to form a conservative government left Lord Palmerston again out of office.

His lordship occupied his comparative leisure in endeavouring to enforce upon the ministry the chief points of his policy with reference to foreign affairs.

On the accession of Lord John Russell the subject of our sketch resumed the direction of the foreign department. The most important matters which he was called upon to manage, and which may be recollected from their recent occurrence, were the troubles in Portugal, the Swiss question, the great revolutionary movements of 1848, the Spanish difficulty of the same year, the Greek question, and, finally, the Hungarian war and the protection of the fugitive Hungarian chiefs. Lord Palmerston's foreign policy throughout the administration of Lord John Russell was the subject of unceasing attack by men of all shades of political opinion. The opposition was brought to a climax in 1848, when a motion of impeachment was carried in the upper house; but the Commons refused to indorse their lordships' verdict. The tide of unpopularity was in a measure turned by the late Sir Robert Peel, who opposed the foreign secretary's policy on the matter in question, but employed the expression to which we have already alluded—"We are all proud of him"—a sentiment which, from the long services of the noble lord, was cheered by the house and echoed by the country. A short time after a banquet was given to his lordship by the members of the Reform Club, and his portrait was presented by public subscription to Lady Palmerston.

The short administration of Lord Derby followed, and this was in its turn followed by the "coalition" ministry of the Earl of Aberdeen, with Lord Palmerston holding the seals of the Home Department. The weakness of the latter cabinet was the stepping-stone by which Lord Palmerston attained the Premiership of England. He entered on this important office in the spring of 1855, and, as all the world knows, continued to hold it till within a very recent period.

Limited as we are in space, and indisposed as we are to introduce political matters into our journal, we can give nothing but the merest outline of his lordship's long and active life, otherwise we might touch upon many matters of foreign and domestic interest which have been directed or influenced by Lord Palmerston during the last half century; we might moralise, too, upon the caprice of Fortune—proverbially she is prone to neglect the good and the deserving; but it is not often she smiles for fifty years together upon the actions of a politician, however great his ability may be.

Lord Palmerston is what may be described as a fluent speaker rather than an orator. Long experience has taught his lordship the art of dwelling upon the high lights of his subject without touching upon its shadows, so that, in answering questions, giving explanations, or in defending his policy, he has a ready way of making his case good. Although nearly seventy-four years of age, his lordship is exceedingly active, walks smartly but stoops a little, and when in the House seldom, if ever, sleeps.

His lordship sits with his hat on, his arms folded, and his face in deep shadow, apparently unconscious of all that is going on; a spectator would think him the least interested party in the House, until some unlucky member provokes a rejoinder, he then starts to his legs and glibly talks over the matter in question, showing a thorough acquaintance with all its details, and with all that has been said thereon.

As a debater, properly so called, he is inferior to none—his replies are always admirable, and none the less so on account of the invariable good humour and tact which characterise them, though the latter is sometimes thought to border on the flippant or the frivolous.

THE FOREST OF ARCACHON, IN THE GIRONDE.

ARCACHON.

THE forest of Arcachon, in the Gironde, is but little known to tourists, with the exception of those who seek sea-bathing in its immediate neighbourhood. The baths, indeed, have attracted much attention, and speculators have constructed a railway through a line of country where no previous traffic existed;

a little town, bearing the name of the forest, has also sprung up; an agricultural association, for the redemption of the barren Landes, has been formed; so that, upon the whole, Arcachon is gradually emerging from obscurity, and promises to become notorious. At present, however, the assertion with which we started is undeniable—Arcachon is but little known to tourists.

But it deserves to be known. How much of picturesque scenery is entirely overlooked by the very seekers after the picturesque. How much that is romantic and interesting fails to excite inquiry or engage attention, simply on account of tourists putting their faith in guide-books, and remaining wilfully blind to everything but what therein is recommended to their notice. This is not as it should be; but what is and what ought to be are two very different things, and until these two are united, our tourists will insist upon flocking together on pilgrimage to the same shrines.

How attractive is a grand old forest, where the "Murmuring pines and hemlocks,

Bearded with moss, and in garments green, indistinct in the twilight,
Stand like Druids of old, with voices sad and prophetic—
Stand like harpers hoar, with beards that rest on their bosoms;
When from its rocky caves the deep-voiced neighbouring ocean Speaks, and in accents disconsolate answers the wail of the forest."

A forest such as this is that of Arcachon. The aged oaks and other venerable trees present in their foliage the most pleasing varieties of verdure and freshness, and afford a remarkable contrast to the lofty pine trees, whose towering summits are covered with an unchangeable green canopy. It is a pleasant thing to wander in their sylvan solitude to trace the wagon-path that dwindles away into a slender sheep-track, and by-and-by is altogether lost in a low undergrowth of shrubs and plants; to wander there in the obscurity—for the intermingling boughs above us give but slight entrance to the sun—amongst the robust and gigantic trunks, the quietude and solemnity of the scene is deeply impressive, and is very far from being devoid of interest.

Within the last few years plantations of pines have been formed by the French government at Arcachon, and the observer is struck with the contrast between the recently planted saplings and the indigenous trees of the forest. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to ascertain the pecuniary success of the experiment; but there is a probability that these plantations may ultimately produce a considerable revenue.

The pines of Arcachon are preferred to those of the more inland forests of the Landes; the pitch and turpentine which they yield is of a very superior quality. The forest is the property of a large number of the country people, but is held by a remarkable tenure.

In virtue of a concession of Frederick de Foix, capital of Buch,* known in the country under the name of baillette of 1543, all the inhabitants having their legal dwelling within the communes of Teste and Guyan have the right to fell those trees which they may require for the construction of their houses, granges, stables, or barns. This privilege is regulated by a syndic, who establishes a system amongst the proprietors, so that each may be proportionately charged. This proportion is not determined by the extent of the land, but by the quantity of resinous matter yielded by the trees. Thus, the holder of a large section of the forest has not always the largest number of valuable trees, and consequently pays less than the small holder. It is difficult to conceive of a tenure more wild or antiquated, or more fatal to the interests of all who are concerned in it. The proprietors are but little disposed to care about a forest so rudely and so unjustly controlled. They kill the goose which lays the golden eggs, in felling those trees which constitute the real property of the district—but what else could they do under so unwise a system of management?

Independently of the right to fell the pines for building purposes, the inhabitants are permitted to carry away, without limit and under no surveillance, all the dead firs of the forest, and oak-trees at their pleasure. Living or dead, the magnificent oaks are at the mercy of the woodmen. Without a possibility of interference, the labourer wields his axe, and threatens to leave a desert in place of a forest. These oaks are valued in all parts of the world, but they are allowed here to be absolutely destroyed for want of proper supervision.

The produce of the Landes dates from very ancient times. An old writer bestows the epithet of piceous, or producers of pitch, on the people of that district. The resinous matter which flows from the trees is put into a cauldron and boiled over a quick fire. The essence of turpentine, which forms the most valuable product, is distilled and condensed in an alembic. The peculiarly unpleasant odour of the turpentine is removed by a new process, which, without in any degree affecting the material, frees it from its objectionable smell.

Properly managed, the forest of Arcachon, and those of the Landes generally, would become exceedingly valuable. As it is, nothing but destruction is before them, unless the project of government plantations is more effectually carried out, or better regulations introduced by the authorities.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

Or jealousy with rankling tooth

That truly gnaws the secret heart.—GRAY.

BOB BLOSSOM did not recover as rapidly as had at first been anticipated.

The low fever of his mind retarded the knitting of the bone, for it heated his blood and impaired both his sleep and his appetite. He was suffering from one of the subtlest and most torturing of poisons—jealousy; an unacknowledged, silent, smouldering, sullen, groundless jealousy.

Yes, he was jealous, jealous almost to insanity, of Apple Blossom's respect and regard for Jem Goodman, and of the noble, pure, and Christian interest that good man took in that now unhappy wife.

Apple Blossom, though growing daily weaker, more low, and anxious in mind, and more faded and wasted in person, never suffered her own feelings of dejection and pain to prevent her visiting her husband in the hospital whenever the regulations allowed her to do so.

But it was with her a matter of duty—cold duty—not of the vivid, ardent pleasure, the warm, wife-like, passionate delight, it would once have been to Apple Blossom to come, after long, dreary days and lonely, sleepless, endless nights, to comfort, and cheer, and caress her beloved Bob.

But what pleasure can it be to any woman to be subject to the lynx-eyed scrutiny, the querulous cross-questioning, the insulting disbelief, the cutting sarcasm, the bitter retort of a jealous husband; one who, instead of suspecting her conduct, ought to be trying to repent of and amend his own? One whose gross and sensual sin had thrown on the poor wife, ill, perhaps incurably so, through his brutality, the whole burthen of the family; at least, till Larky could endure it no longer, and had begun to earn an honest shilling or penny as the case might be—now by going on an errand, now by holding a gentleman's horse, or standing by a chaise, and occasionally by hawking about delicate little articles of fancy work, crochet, &c. &c. made by Hope, or ingenious articles in tin and wire work, most adroitly manufactured by himself.

It was fortunate that these good and clever children (for Merry would help sometimes) had started this little source of profit, for the stall was no longer what it had been.

Apple Blossom's blooming looks, quiet humour, and kind, merry tongue, had been a great attraction at her stall, and besides when she was well in body, and at ease in her mind, she was such a capital caterer.

Her fruit was always good, her charges moderate, and her conduct fair and obliging.

The working men used to buy an orange, or an apple, or half a pint of nuts, for the sake of a pleasant word or two with Apple Blossom; and as to the children, she did not put them off, as so many do, with mouldy oranges, shrivelled nuts, and rotten apples.

The little hot farthing, so tightly clutched in the small, grimy hand, was received as kindly as a sovereign would have been.

The child always had a "good pennyworth for his penny."

Apple Blossom had children of her own. She wouldn't sell unwholesome fruit to any child, because it was her motto to do as she would be done by.

At one time Apple Blossom's stall was the most flourishing of its kind in the whole metropolis.

Now, both Apple Blossom and her stall were getting very low indeed.

She had not health, strength, spirit, or energy to rise, as she had done, before dawn to go to market.

She seemed to have almost lost the power of setting out her stall; and, as for presiding at it, every one told her she looked fitter to be in bed, and so she was.

Every one pitied poor Apple Blossom and censured Bob, and that pained and distressed the good, loyal wife.

Hope and Merry did what they could for the stall, and at it; but matters were getting worse and worse. They were but children, and, with all they could do, they were often cheated.

Yes, the stall was going down rapidly.

It was lucky that Larky's tin and wire works, and Hope's crochet brought in a few shillings weekly, or the incomes would have fallen very short of the inevitable out-goings.

Jem Goodman had gone down to Manchester, where he had a widowed sister dangerously ill, and whose only comfort he was.

The Earl of Glenlonely, who was quite convalescent, had repaired to Pemberton for a little change of air, and had begged Ada to accompany him, and Ellen St. Ange was with Mrs. Golightly at Brighton, that champion of her sex requiring a few sea-baths and sea-breezes to enable her to carry out with proper zeal and energy all her schemes and plans for the triumphant success of her pamphlet.

Thus Apple Blossom, in her hour of bitter and protracted trial, had no one to consult with, but the innocent, inexperienced children, who often seemed to her to be indeed "wise as serpents, and harmless as doves," but yet, who could not enter into her harrowing anxieties while she concealed their cause, or be of any use in a case of disease and perhaps death.

Sam Slybrute, wondrous to relate, did not die, but he lost one eye, and the other was seriously affected (generally when one eye is impaired, the other suffers from sympathy); and he was not only a cripple, but likely to be a blind cripple too.

Apple Blossom had, as we have said, no comfort in her visits to Bob in the London Hospital, nor did she seem to give him any.

One subject occupied him, and it was one he would not have touched on for worlds; but yet every word he said had some reference to it, in his own mind, though not so palpably that Apple Blossom could detect it.

Thus, if he asked her when she had attended the mothers' meeting, and whom she had seen there, all his desire was to know if she had seen and spoken with Jem.

But Jem, as we have said, was at Manchester; and, as the jealous extract poison out of everything, he associated the increased pallor and sharpness of Apple Blossom's face, and the extreme dejection and abstraction of her manner to this absence; and he thought he would rather she saw him than long for him. "Absence makes the heart grow fonder," he said to himself; and, had there been any love in the case—which we are thankful to say there was not—he would have been right: a lover's absence is often more softening to a woman's heart than his presence.

But Apple Blossom had never given a thought of love or a sigh from her pure wife-heart to any man but the lover of her youth, the husband of her heart, and the father of her children.

Slybrute and Bob were now in the same ward, and their beds were very close together. Slybrute had no comfort in his own misery so great as that of working on Bob's weakness.

He contrived to contrast the spaniel-like devotion of his Kitty with the reserved and somewhat cold manner of Apple Blossom; and then he would say, "Spoilt wives are like spoilt bairns, meate—there's no love or gratitude in 'em. But if you want 'em to follow you like dogs you must treat 'em like dogs; that's the principle I goes upon, and you sees the consequences."

'A spaniel, a wife, and a walnut tree,

The more you beat 'em the better they be.'

Why, maimed, crippled, and disfigured as I am, Kitty's fit to worship me; and your missus, though, in your white linen and after your long holiday, you looks like a lord and ain't a pin the worse, never takes no notice at all. I'd make her, though, if she was moine; and if she'd got any casting fellow in her head, I'd punch him out of it; and if he'd got into her heart, I'd break it for her."

Slybrute was a sort of coarse, brutal lingo.

"And now, meate, I'll tell you what I'd do. Don't tell thee wofe thee's a coming out, but steal on her unawares. Didn't she say something about not being able to come next week? Be sure she's up to somebat she didn't exactly ought to; and if I wor thee, I'd be one too many for her, for I'd be up to somebat too—I'd be up to snuff. It's my opinion, if you goes quietly and cunningly to work, and goes home quite on the sly, you'll find him as Apple Blossom once called to me a 'hangel on hearth' a-trying to comfort her."

"You means Jem Goodman, meate," said Bob, his eyes blazing, white as the sheet he clutched, and gnashing his teeth.

* Capital, Gascon word, signifying chief or lord. The capital of Buch, John of Grailly, is celebrated in the wars of the fourteenth century.

"I mentions no names; but I never holds with young and pretty woives having any buzzom friends but their own measters. I've no belief, meate, in friendship atween men and women; in a woman's nature it allays turns to love, and there beant many Josephs going, I can tell 'ee, and it's my opinion Jem Goodman beant one of 'em if there wor. But I'd know the rights of it if I wor thee, Bob," said Sam.

"And that I will too, meate," groaned Bob; "and thank thee roundly, meate, for putting me up to it. Thee be my best friend, and I take it very kind of thee—crippled, and moolated, and half blind—to think so much about my troubles, which they ain't to be named with yourn."

"Ain't 'em though!" said Slybrute. "I'll tell thee what it is, Bob, I wouldn't change places now. There you are, with all your limbs sound, and here I be, a good fourth of me most likely on the dissecting-room table, and yet I'd rather be as I am than I'd know my Kitty thought any man but me 'a hangell on hearth." I never talks about love matters—there's nothing spooney about me—but I doats on my Kitty, and it's my believe she wuships the very ground I treads on—she do; and I'd rather have a broken limb, meate, nor a broken heart: at any rate, I'd know the rights of it."

This was very artfully put. In his cold, cruel heart he did not care what became of Kitty, and he would have sold her to the Sepoys to have been again the fine, strong, robust man he was the day of the accident; but he knew how to work on Bob's feelings. He envied Bob; he always had envied him Apple Blossom's love; and he grudged him bitterly his wondrous escape from the consequences of that drunken bout which had made him what he was. He began to hate Bob, and to wish to work his ruin and despair.

He seems on a fair way to do so; for the fire he has kindled in poor Bob's simple nature seems to be burning up all that was good in him, and at that moment he could gladly have slain both his best friend, Jem Goodman, and his fond, true, suffering wife, if he could have seen them together; and he might have seen them together (but for Jem's absence at Manchester) consulting what was to be done to save him, and make him what both felt he might yet be—a blessing to himself and his family.

There was but one thing in the way, and that was—strong drink!

CHAPTER LXIX.

The work that should to-day be wrought.

Defer not till to-morrow;

The aid that should within be sought,

Scorn from without to borrow.

ANON.

APPLE BLOSSOM's little plot was woven, her plan was formed, her resolution taken.

Her country doctor, in whom she had such entire confidence, and with whom of late she had had many secret consultations, had informed her the last time he had examined her poor breast, that there was no time to be lost, and that if she wished to be spared to her husband and children, she must decide on undergoing the operation; which, in his opinion, alone offered a chance of saving her useful life.

He was in his own way, though a very kind old fellow, a great advocate of the knife; and as he firmly believed extirpation or amputation to be necessary, he urged it on Apple Blossom, and proposed a plan for the speedy, prompt, and secret carrying out of his scheme.

Apple Blossom on her return from visiting Bob, sick at heart, and bitterly grieved at his coldness and apparent want of confidence, and at the estrangement that seemed to increase daily and hourly, had fallen on her knees by her now lonely bed, and prayed long and fervently for guidance from on high; the result was that for her children's sake—those children who, if she died, might be left to a drunkard's care, or rather neglect—she resolved to save her miserable life if possible; and as she rose from her knees, and dashed the large scalding tears from her eyes, there was in that poor, pious, lowly heart, the faith of a saint, and the self-devotion and resignation of a martyr.

But there was still much to do.

Jem Goodman was expected in town in a day or two; his poor sister was gone to her rest, but he had smoothed the way. Yes,

"She was gone to the grave, but we will not deplore her, Since God was her refuge, her ransom, her guide; He gave her, He took her, and soon shall restore her, Where death hath no sting, for the Saviour hath died."

Apple Blossom resolved to call on her old friend and crony, Mrs. Trudge, who knew so much of little Hope's mother, and as Mrs. Trudge was "a great scholar," to get her to write for her to Jem Goodman. Besides this, she wanted her to come, if possible, and watch over her little household for a week or more.

Mrs. Trudge often went out as a sick nurse or a monthly nurse, and therefore she could do this without putting her own husband and family to any inconvenience.

She often did it for money, and it would not have been like one of that kindly, loving, helping class, "the poor," not to do it more gladly still for love, where a sick and suffering neighbour was concerned.

The poor do indeed love their neighbours as themselves.

Mrs. Trudge, too, was very fond of Hope, and being a little romantic, and seeing Larky Grigg so clever, and so likely in her opinion to come to be "Lord Mayor," she delighted to watch the attachment that had sprung up between him and Hope. And in fine, she used to call them Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, and ask their leave to go through Temple Bar.

The country doctor's plan was, at his own expense (he had been a parish doctor, and parish doctors are often angels to the poor) to take a little pleasant, quiet room at Brompton for Apple Blossom. The woman of the house was a nurse, and was to tend her after the operation, and be with her while it was performed by himself and his son.

To the children it was merely to be said that the doctor considered a little quiet and change of air necessary for Apple Blossom, and that Mrs. Trudge had kindly promised to come and keep them company while their mammy was away.

In case of a longer absence than she had at first contemplated, Larky, Hope, and Merry were to go to see their dad with Mrs. Trudge, and the same explanation was to be given to him.

Larky turned very pale when his mother first explained this to him. It was such a strange—such a wonderful thing for his mammy to go from her home, for a week, too; she who had never slept a night away from her home since her marriage! He seemed inclined to cry—to suspect something—to question, and even to rebel; but little Hope, though her cheeks too were pale, and her blue eyes full of tears, checked him with her upraised finger, and her "Larky, good lad, mammy knows best. 'Honour thy father and thy mother,' Larky; and don't go for to ax more nor mammy chuses to tell thee of her own accord. All thee've got to do, lad, is to try so to behave thyself that thee may be loike a feather here while dad's bad in the hospital; and I'll try hard while mammy's away to be a mother to thee and Merry. Let's see how much we can make and sell, Larky, good lad,—thee at thy tin and wire work, and I at my crochet and bead work; and Merry, good lass, thee be prime at the fruit stall, thee be; and we'll be reglar at ragged school all the same. So don't fret, mammy, but come back as soon as thee can—do, there's a dear, dear mammy!"

Poor Apple Blossom! how she strained the lovely, loving Christian child to her heart; and how her tears gushed forth as she thought that it was possible she might die under the operation, and these darlings be orphans indeed. "But for their sakes, O Father," she said, "I will go through it; and if it is thy will that I should never come back alive no more, thy will, not mine, be done, and the orphans will have thee for their father."

Poor Merry showed a great deal of good feeling and love for her mother.

Her volatile nature was quite sobered for a time, and her energy about the fruit-stall recalled that of Apple Blossom in her best days, while her zeal and civility were rewarded by a very great increase of custom.

The children were at the ragged school when Mrs. Trudge arrived to install herself in the little home; and Apple Blossom told her the whole affecting story of her illness and its result, and dictated the following letter to Jem Goodman:—

"Dear Mr. Goodman,—You knows I've been hailing for some time bak, but you don't know the hiddin cawse, which it's a kansor in my brest, and to be cut off is my only 'opes of life being spared, so 'as made up my mind according, for the sake of Bob and the bairns.

"My own good, kind doctor will do it, and has took me a rume, at his own cost, at Plesent-row, Brumton.

"All will be over by three to-morrow aternune, and what I wants is you to cum and see me, and how all gose hon, and whether it's God's will i lives or dyse.

"I've praid to be derekto roit, and I feele I'm doin' the thing that is roite. So no more at presente; butt, iff it's God's wil to tak me to hi'self, watch over Bob, gett him to jine the temp'rance folke, and don't let him know he dun it, unless he won't be persuaded without.

"Be a feather to littel hangel Hope, and to 'em all. Oh, my Larky Grigg, and my Merry! So no more. My 'ead swims, my 'art sinks. Tea thousand blessings for all ye goodness, and the same to Mr. Stephin, and the dere, koind lades. Tell Bob I bles and prase for him. But thinks may go roight, and all be 'appy ag'in, below if not above.

"Your dootiful, poor

"APPLE BLOSSOM."

"It's lucky I'm a first-rate sholard," said Mrs. Trudge, as she directed the enclosed; "but I ollys wor a great speller."

She was convinced "the letter," as it was called, was a model of orthography and calligraphy; and, considering her advantages had consisted in a few weeks at a penny school in her childhood, it was a wonderful production.

"Have a cup o' tea afore ye goes, Apple Blossom?" said Trudge, assuming the office of mistress, and exercising hospitality to Apple Blossom in her own house.

"No, thank'ee koindly," said Apple Blossom: "I'm that sick I can't touch nothink. I'll be better in the hair. Good bye, Bess, and bless 'em all for me."

She repressed her tears, tied on her bonnet, and was gone!

CHAPTER LXX.

How often woman takes a high degree

In sorrow's, fortitude's, and suffering's school;

A member of that university,

Where those great masters, Faith and Patience, rule.

ANON.

At one o'clock all was ready in the little sunny parlour of No. 1, Pleasant-row, Brompton.

The country doctor had sent his cases of instruments, and word that he and his son were on their way.

The mistress of the house, who was a monthly nurse, was in office, and pleased to be so. She had set out a table covered with a white cloth, and a formidable array of basins of cold water, sponges, napkins, towels, vinegar, brandy, and salts. She herself was in a clean cap, and with a large nursing apron, flushed and excited.

Apple Blossom was up and dressed. She had not closed her eyes all night; indeed, it had been chiefly spent in prayer. She was white as marble, not a tinge of colour even in her lips; her large black eyes were dilated, her hands were clasped, her form erect, her teeth were set. The spirit of a martyr animated that loving woman's heart. She had arranged her hair, washed and dressed herself neatly; she would not add to the sickly horrors of that scene.

Mrs. Posset looked at her in amazement, and declared her to be a perfect "Nero"—of course, meaning hero.

At length there was a knock at the door. Mrs. Posset declared it gave her a shock, and turned her nerve. Apple Blossom smiled a faint smile, and the fussy little parish doctor who had brought her into this world of woe entered, followed by his son, the young surgeon who had so recently passed his examination.

They both shook hands kindly with Apple Blossom. The old man called her a "dear, brave gal," and the young one pronounced her "a trump," and "a brick."

"Now, if all's ready, we'll go to work at once," said the little old doctor. "Mrs. Posset, get the patient ready. Harry, my boy, we'll better take off our coats and put on our sleeves and aprons."

He then took out his keys, and Apple Blossom felt a something like an icy eel creep over her back, and her tongue clove to the roof of her mouth as the little shining key turned in the lock, and all the bright and terrible instruments met her eyes.

The two surgeons looked, sooth to say, a little like butchers as they put on their large bibbed aprons and tucked up their sleeves.

Mrs. Posset was about to bind Apple Blossom to her chair, but she pleaded for freedom, saying, "I cannot bear to be tied down. I had rather not be bound; I will not stir; let me be as I be; you'll see I'll not move so mooch as a finger. I'll just hold your hand toight, Mrs. Posset, and that'll steady me."

"No, it won't, when ye feels the first cut of the knife. Dear heart alive! you can't be off shrinking," said Mrs. Posset. "Do be persuaded, my dear soul. Flesh and blood can't stand it."

"No, but the spirit can," said Apple Blossom; "and moine has got strength from on high. I thinks of Bob and the bairns, and what'll they do without me? and then I can bear anything."

The old parish doctor (Dosem) felt Apple Blossom's pulse, and said, "Be it so; let her have her own way, Posset. Now, are we ready?"

And he rubbed his hands and smiled; not that he was at all unfeeling—he was very kind-hearted, and very fond of Apple Blossom; but habit had familiarised him with every kind of amputation, he was so great an advocate of the knife.

It was a dreadful moment.

Apple Blossom sat pale, beautiful, and rigid as marble, in an arm chair, clutching tightly with one hand the wrist of Mrs. Posset, with the other the elbow of the chair. Exactly opposite to her was an engraving of the Crucifixion; and her large black eyes dilated, but not tearful—rather dry and shining with the awful excitement of the moment—were fixed on that beauteous, God-like head crowned with thorns, and bowed in deference to the will of a heavenly Father; those hands and feet pierced with nails, and that blest body in its dying agonies.

"See what the Son of God, the Lord of love, suffered to save sinners," said Apple Blossom, almost unconsciously; "and shall the loikes of me flinch? No, no; I'm ready, sir."

Mrs. Posset had prepared Apple Blossom for the operation, and the younger doctor came forward, knife in hand (as having the firmer hand and steadier nerve). He was to perform the operation under the direction and superintendence of his father.

A regular son of Sangrado was this youth, and with what Astley Cooper said a surgeon should have, "the hand of a lady, and the heart of a lion." He took a sort of pride and pleasure in any amputation or extirpation that required daring, skill, and nerve.

"I am ready, sir," repeated Apple Blossom, murmuring a fervent prayer, while her eyes were still fixed on the crucified Redeemer.

Mrs. Posset turned away her head, and the old parish doctor wiped off the large, damp drops that burst out on Apple Blossom's brow.

The young surgeon was about to inflict the first gash, when the door opened and Jem Goodman, pale and panting, cried, "Stop! stop! stop, doctor! Thank heaven, I am not too late."

"What do you mean by this interruption, sir?" said the old doctor. "Don't you know that this poor woman's life depends on the operation she has nerved herself to undergo?"

"In five minutes we'd have made a neat job of it," said the young Sawbones. "Ne sutor, &c.; I do wish people would mind their own business."

"It seems to me necessary for you to mind yours, young sir," said Jem. "I think before undertaking such an operation as this, you should at least have got first-rate advice; and as you haven't done so, I have. You know the names of Sir Astley Cooper and Mr. G—: in two minutes they'll be here, and if they decide this must be done to save her life, I've nothing to say but 'God give her strength to bear it.' If, as I hope and believe, modern science has other resources, I shall thank Heaven I arrived in time. Ah! there's the carriage; I caught the doctors coming from the hospital, and, when I told them the case, they promised to be here in no time, and here they are."

Poor Apple Blossom! as Jem entered the room, with an instinct of shame, and that sweet, womanly modesty which never forsook her, she had drawn her shawl around her, and there she remained, listening with a beating heart and changing cheek to Jem's words, half sorry for the delay, half hoping that the ordeal she had nerved herself to go through, might yet be escaped.

The two eminent surgeons came in.

Apple Blossom tried to rise and curtsy.

"Don't stir, my good woman," said Sir Astley, kindly patting her on the back; "we've no time for ceremony now, if you please."

And the keen eyes of both those great anatomists were fixed upon the poor, faithful, diseased bosom.

And a few scientific words were uttered in a low and rapid voice; and Apple Blossom felt faint with the new hope, more so than with the old despair.

Meanwhile, the parish doctor, at a respectful distance, stood rubbing his hands, but less cheerfully, and smiling, but more faintly. The young surgeon, his son, still held the knife ready. Jem Goodman had turned away in silent prayer, and Mrs. Posset arranged her sponges, basins, and napkins.

At length the sentence came forth—

"The knife's not wanted here," he said. "Come, young son of Galen, put up your weapon; and never use it when you can avoid it."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the parish doctor, "and of course I speak humbly and under correction, but this schirrus or cancer was first caused in this poor woman's breast by a kick given her by her husband when in liquor. Now, sir, what but amputation can avail when schirrus or cancer has developed itself to—"

"Nothing. I agree with you, good sir; but this is not a cancer—this," and he used some hard Latin words, lengthy and sonorous, which we fear to repeat, lest we be found guilty of

"Just enough of learning to misguide."

"This is—as you ought to have known, gentlemen—this is," and again learned words were thundered forth. "You have mistaken the nature of this swelling; and the remedies you have prescribed under a false impression have irritated and inflamed an indolent tumor, which, though doubtless caused by the drunken husband's kick, is not cancer. A bread and water poultice, a little alterative medicine, change of air, and above all peace of mind, will make this breast as healthy in the course of a couple of months as the other. Here, let me write a prescription. And you, sir," he added turning to Jem Goodman, "let us know how the patient progresses. If needful, we'll visit her again; if not, any day before twelve let her call at—Curzon-street, May Fair. And for you, young man, another time don't be so ready with the knife. Come G—, time's up!"

"We're due at Lord Fastliver's; no such luck there," said Mr. G—; "no sparing the knife there! Good bye!"

"Good day to you all. Don't rise, good woman; take your medicine regularly, and apply a fresh poultice night and morning. By-the-bye, can you make a poultice? No, not you—few women can. This is the way to do it properly:—Take the crumb of a stale penny loaf, put it in a basin, pour boiling water on it; cover the basin with a plate, let it stand five minutes, then drain off the water, and apply the softened bread warm to the breast. Good day!"

Off they went, with a quiet rapidity peculiar to eminent practitioners of the medical profession, and then poor Apple Blossom gave way, and her long pent-up feelings found vent in an hysterical passion of tears, and wild bursts of laughter.

Then, too, it became known to those present that Bob Blossom himself had been a witness of all that had passed, having followed Jem Goodman—burning with jealousy, mad with hate and revenge, and convinced that he was about to unravel a complicated and tangled intrigue, and to detect and expose a false friend and a faithless wife!

Urged by Sam Slybrute, he had concealed from Apple Blossom, during her last visit, his approaching dismissal as "cured" from the London Hospital.

He had crept stealthily to the neighbourhood of his home; there he had watched (hidden behind a dead wall at the back of his house).

He had ascertained Apple Blossom's retreat; and, convinced that Jem Goodman would join her, he had dodged him from his home in Stamford-street, to Mrs. Posset's, at Brompton. With jealous and avenging wrath he had stolen in unnoticed after Jem; and, unnoticed, he had followed him upstairs.

With what sickening shame, repentance, and remorse he, at one glance, read the whole tale of his own sin, and his devoted wife's suffering and peril, as he saw her in the arm-chair, pale, resolute, and her bosom bared, awaiting the first incision of the knife.

In the tumult of emotions of all present, the surprise and the rescue, the low moan he uttered was unheard, and he shrunk behind a screen near the door, to await the decision of the doctors.

When they were gone, forth from his hiding-place came the heart-stricken, shame-bowed, and repentant man.

Apple Blossom, after an hysterical emotion, that at once relieved and exhausted her, had sunk back insensible in the arm-chair.

A few simple restoratives were applied, but perhaps the most potent was the sound of "the one loved voice."

Bob was kneeling beside her, his arms were thrown round her, his head was in her lap.

"It's Bob," he cried, "poor, guilty, miserable, repentant Bob. Look on me, darling, angel wife, Betty Blythe, Apple Blossom, love of my youth, wife o' my buzzom, mother o' my bairns; patient, kind, fond, true wife, good wife, look on the poor, penitent, weeping, heart-breakin' Bob, do'ee, do'ee. I seed there wor a secret heavy at thy heart. I see there wor someth weighing on the dear, blessed mind. I little thought that I'd hurt thy dear, fond, faithful buzzom so bad loike, and that thee wor all of a shiver with dread of all thee'd have to go through, and maybe, after all, no use, like poor Mrs. Grimshaw, as had a cancer cut out of one breast, and then it come in t'other, and when that wor cut off, it come in the back and killed her. Oh, my dear, dear wife, what have thee suffered, and all along of the drink and I!"

Here his sobs choked his utterance, and his tears fell fast on her bosom, and then he clung around her, and kissed her hands, her very dress. At last he drew her beloved head on his shoulder, and hid her face in his agitated bosom.

"Let me whisper to thee, lass," he said, as Apple Blossom murmured faintly, "Bob, husband, Ise down-right glad to see thee. Don't 'ee take on so; don't 'ee, Bob!"

"Listen, lass," he cried; "I'm ready now to do what thee and Jem there have been at me so long about; I'll do it now. Come, Jem, I'm ready; take me where thee wilt; I'll put it beyond me even to cost my blessed woife another tear. And to think I've been mad enough to be jealous of thee, true friend—of thee, faithful, fond, darling woife! Come, Jem, I'm ready. I'll not kiss my own dear Betty till I've done what you both wishes—but stop a minute, Ise uncommon dry; I mean to have just one glass first." And he laughed in the recovered gladness of his buoyant heart, "just one glass, no more."

"A glass!" cried Apple Blossom, in dismay.

"A glass, man!" said Jem Goodman, sternly.

"Yes, a glass, woife; a glass, friend; but only a glass o' water; for my throat's that dry, I feels well-nigh choking; won't that a clean take in—a glass of water was all I meant; and as strong drink has nigh lost me a woife and a leg, I'll stick to water in future, and see what that'll do for me. So come, Jem, I'll join temperance folk at onst, and I'll make you and my darling woife, there, ashamed of me no more."

So saying, he drank off a tumbler of clear, cold water, which Mrs. Posset handed to him, and went out with Jem Goodman.

The parish doctor and his son, having carefully packed up their instruments, took their leave, not a little disappointed and crest-fallen, but prophesying that after all it must come to the knife.

Apple Blossom had now no such fear. Her heart was lightened of a heavy, a dreadful load; and with something of the gladness of former days, she prepared against the return of Jem Goodman and Bob Blossom a dinner-tea, comprising a few simple luxuries so dear to the children of temperance—good tea, roasted potatoes, a few radishes, and a little fruit.

Oh, when Jem brought back Bob Blossom, enrolled in the great army of abstainers, how he enjoyed his Apple Blossom's modest joy, and the pleasant little feast she had so neatly prepared.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. IV.

"I WAS thinking," said Wilton, "as I came hither to join you, that if we were to string together eating, drinking, dressing, lounging in libraries, smoking cigars, staring out of windows, sauntering on the Esplanade, walking up and down the pier, pointing a telescope towards a distant ship, bathing occasionally, or sailing on a tranquil sea, buying at an auction, reading novels, and making a sketch to which only the artist, or the artist's admirers attach any value, the principal occupations of a watering-place would all be told."

"I concur with you," I replied, "tacking on to your list, however, the use of donkeys and horses with the saddle, and the employment of these animals in all kinds of vehicles, from the humblest of carts to the most splendid of carriages."

"I hope, however," said Wilton, "we shall yet improve as a people, by examining, instead of merely looking at the objects above, beneath, and around; and thus, by exercising our intellects, greatly heighten our pleasures. Paley, walking by the sea-side in a calm eve, observing a thick mist stretching along the coast, and always retiring with the water, and discovering to his surprise that the mist was filled with young shrimps in the act of bounding into the air from the shallow margin of the water or the wet sand, exclaims, 'If any motion of a minute animal could express delight, it was this; suppose, then, what I have no doubt of, each individual of this number to be in a state of positive enjoyment, what a sum collectively of gratification and pleasure have we here before our view!' Nor can we doubt that the sight of these little creatures afforded to him on this occasion a higher and purer satisfaction than any of their race had ever yielded him before."

"I have often stopped in the midst of eating these delicacies," said I, "to admire the structure of a shrimp."

"It is indeed," said Wilton, "a beautiful little creature. Its outer covering consists of a thin shell of a green and transparent colour, spotted with gray. It is divided between the head and tail into six parts, each of which works into the next, like the portions of a coat of mail, thus combining hardness with flexibility, while the body is defended without impeding its motions. The tail, consisting of a wing-like apparatus of four parts, which can be folded compactly, or extended at pleasure, is admirably adapted to propel the shrimp. The head is provided with a pair of feelers as long as the body, and the two forelegs are made to act as a hand, having jointed forceps for the seizure of food. Three pairs of legs are placed on the fore part of the body; and behind are five other pairs of legs, which are much shorter, and which diminishing successively in size, are fringed with bristles. The fore part of the head has on each side a fan-like wing, feathered on each side, transparent, and so flexible, as greatly to aid the motions of the shrimp."

"I have often seen shrimps taken," said I, "by means of a net, used alike by man, woman, and child, wading up to the knees and pushing it along, and by fishermen who go out for the same purpose in boats. Their colour is changed by boiling to that which they wear when placed on our tables. Some years ago, a friend of mine saw at Brighton boiled shrimps everywhere, but unboiled nowhere, and suggested to a woman who sold them that they were probably alive before they were boiled. 'They were never alive,' she replied, 'while I had anything to do with them; for they all came from London as they are.' It was clear, therefore, that many of our metropolitans who would not touch a shrimp at home, ate others exactly in the same state at the sea-side."

"These remarkable beings," said Wilton, "belong to the order of the crustacea, of which the lobster and crab are well-known examples. A careful examination of the lobster will amply repay us the attention. The head and thorax belong to one portion, covered above by a shield, and below by a narrow plastron, to the sides of which the legs are attached. The lower portions of the plastron are defended by seven broad, arched plates—said by some to have been the origin of plate armour—beautifully hinged, and overlapping each other in succession. The lobster's limbs are admirably adapted to the services they are to perform, among which may be noticed the left-hand pincers, firmly toothed, for the purpose of seizing and catching its prey; and the right-hand pincers, destined to hold anchor-like to any fixed object, and thus firmly to moor the animal amidst the dashing of the tempest-tossed waters. The lobster has organs of hearing on the basal joint of the larger pair of antennæ, underneath which is a little cell filled with fluid, and a branch of the nerve of the antennæ running powerful muscles—an efficient apparatus for reducing the food to a pulp, so that it undergoes a second and more complete mastication before the commencement of digestion takes place. So energetic is the stroke of the tail, that the lobster can propel itself in a backward direction to a distance of eighteen or twenty feet. If the sides of the shield be taken away, a shallow chamber will be observed on each side, enclosing a series of pyramidal tufts beautifully covering the breathing organs of the creature."

"Am I not right," I asked, "in believing that animals of this kind cast their outer coverings?"

"You are: the covering of the lobster, for example, does not, like the shell of the oyster, admit of increase as the animal grows; and it is, therefore, changed at intervals until the creature has attained maturity. Not only the scales of the body, but the eyes, the lining membrane of the stomach, and the teeth, are all periodically thrown off. Perfectly shut up in his armour, the soft body of the lobster cannot increase, but now it suddenly pushes forth its growth, the vital energies are, as it were, put to the task of enlarging the frame, and as soon as this is done, a new coat of armour is acquired, which is again to be cast off when the proper period arrives. To the process just described, that passed through by the crab bears a strong resemblance. To the crustacea, the loss of a leg, or two, is a matter of little importance. Whenever a limb is injured, the creature breaks it off at the joint nearest the trunk, where the growth will more speedily recommence. No pain seems to attend this singular process; the new claw, however, remains unprotected with a hard shell till the next general moult, and, though equally perfect, never acquires the size of the corresponding ones."

"I think," said I, "there are many kinds of crabs."

"There are," said Wilton; "the velvet-crabs of our coasts—so called from the velvety substance through it; and it is by the vibration of the water that the sensation is conveyed, though probably not very definitely or acutely. It has a mouth capable of crushing very hard substances, and a stomach provided with three hard-grinding teeth, moved by with which the shells are covered, and which extends even to the limbs of the animal—are among the most beautiful in appearance. They are of a reddish colour, tinged with blue. One of them, very commonly found, has colours remarkably bright; it is about two inches and a half long, and is much esteemed for food. The children of fishermen are often employed in crab-catching, as these animals are found on a rocky beach at low water, hidden under stones and in crevices. A stick, having a hook at the end of it, is put into these retreats, and the crab instantly grasping it, is drawn out; but only a small number, and these not of the finest sort, are taken in this manner, as the largest and strongest betake themselves to the sea on the ebbing of the tide. Crab, like lobster-fishing, is practised with creels, made of dry osier, and baited with bits of fish; they are then weighted with stones and dropped in some favourable situation. Mr. Ball, of Dublin, once had a domesticated crayfish, which he kept in a glass pan, in water not more than an inch and a half deep; previous experiments having shown that in deeper water—probably from want of sufficient aeration—this animal did not live long. By degrees his prisoner became very bold; and when he held his fingers at the edges of the vessel, the crayfish assailed them with promptness and energy. About a year after Mr. Ball had had him, he perceived, as he thought, a second crayfish with him: on examination, he found it to be his old coat, which he had left in a most perfect state. The crayfish had now lost his heroism, and fluttered about in the greatest agitation. He was quite soft; and every time Mr. Ball entered the room during the next two days he exhibited the wildest terror. On the third day he appeared to gain confidence, and ventured to use his nippers, though with some timidity. In about a week, however, he became bolder than ever; his weapons were sharper, and he appeared stronger, and a nip from him was no joke. He lived in all about two years, during which time his food was a very few worms, at very uncertain times,—perhaps he did not get fifty altogether. Mr. Ball concludes that some person, presuming to poach in his pond, and getting pinched, pulled out the crayfish, who thus got a fall and died from the injury it received. The water was never changed, but some was occasionally added to supply the loss by evaporation.

"I have heard," said I, "that the hermit, or soldier crab, is a singular creature."

"It is," said Wilton. "The hinder part of the body has no armour of defence; it has merely a membranous covering. How, then, shall it escape being bruised and broken among the rough stones of a rocky beach, when the rolling tide lashes the seashore? and how shall it be secure when attacked by its enemies? A provision for these purposes is made in the instinct of the animal. It selects an empty shell from the beach suited to its size, introduces its tail backwards, and in the winding recesses of its new dwelling is perfectly secure; while the hermit crab of our own shores has a large pincer claw with which it both shuts and guards the circumference of the shell. Mr. Salter has amusingly described the process of the soldier's 'moving house.' His plan was to put a naked soldier into a large glass jar of seawater with one shell, the latter about proportioned in size to the former. The crab he describes as proceeding in the following way, in three instances:—'Appearing to see the shell in the distance, the animal crawled up to it for the purpose of seeing if the house were to let, and this circumstance he discovered, not by sight, but touch. Upon reaching the shell he hooked two of his legs into its open mouth, and thrusting them as far down into its cavity as possible, commenced scrambling round the edge. He was evidently probing to discover if there were really an inhabitant. In each case the crab pursued this probing operation in the same direction—commencing on the projecting side of the shell, and ending on the receding side. Having performed this process once round, he instantly, in the twinkling of an eye, erected straight his head, and whisked himself over the smooth lip of the shell into its tube with a rapid alacrity that was perfectly marvellous. And then, in his vastly improved position, he looked so funny—such at-homeishness there was in it; he was so different from the poor houseless vagabond with a drivelling tail, that we had seen miserably crawling about a moment before: he looked right up in your face, and said, as plainly as looks can speak, 'How d'ye do? here I am, quite at home already.' I never saw it without laughing.' The whelk-shell is very commonly appropriated by the soldier-crab. A friend of mine met with thirteen specimens of it, provided with this habitation, in the course of one hour's walk on the beach at Dover. In some instances the indweller has to defend his abode against the envious assaults of others who wish to possess it. Even when danger threatens, the soldier cautiously looks out as it moves rapidly over the shore. As the right claw is generally larger than the other, it is protruded when the animal is at rest; but on the approach of danger, it retreats far into its shell, and putting the left claw over the head, clasps it down with the right limb, and so carefully ensconces itself that, unless the shell is broken, it is not easily injured. A crab will defend its dwelling with great energy and fierceness, and he is often opposed with the same qualities. I have known one of these creatures attack another, whose dwelling he coveted, in the most determined manner; even pushing him bodily from his house, hurling him to a distance, and then ruthlessly taking possession of the castle he had stormed. The soldier-crabs are much employed by the fishermen, who call them 'wigs,' or 'whigs,' as bait for cod; for which purpose they answer very well for immediate use, although the original possessors and builders of the house—the whelks—are much preferred for night-lines, as they remain more firmly on the hook."

I had been musing on these facts for some time in silence, when Wilton suddenly startled me by saying—

"There, too, is a creature worth looking at; about half an inch high, rooted by the base of its stalk to the seaweed, formed not, indeed, of one piece, like the stem of a plant, but a pile of small pieces, all held together by a living membrane. What is there at its summit? A sea-star, it might be said, for it is like one, though minute, yet not brilliantly tinted like some of these creatures, but with here and there a patch of colour, which may presage a brighter hue. See how it sways its delicate stem to and fro, and is twisting its tiny arms in all directions in quest of food. It is an image of the encrinure, the stone-lily, having a skeleton composed of a vast multitude of pieces: for Parkinson says that in one kind there are 26,000; and Buckland estimates those of another to amount to 150,000. Place one of these minute beings in a vessel of sea-water at night, and will you find it there as you then saw it? Oh, no; the sea-star has left its stalk and moves about, free from encumbrance. All the species in the older rocks have the circular stem, with but one exception. The animal occupied a fixed position at the bottom of the ocean, like its modern representatives, or was attached to floating pieces of wood, merely moving itself as far as it could reach by bending its very flexible column, so admirably adapted to its purpose. The little bones, or joints, with a central perforation, commonly occur singly in the northern counties, where they are called 'wheel-stones,' and 'St. Cuthbert's beads,' from the fact of their being strung as beads, and used formerly as rosaries. You know the lines

'On a rock by Lindisfern
St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The sea-born beads that bear his name.'

By the way, would it not astonish the multitude to say that a large part of the rocks once lived?"

"I should think it would," said I; "but what have you to state as to this matter?"

"Why," said Wilton, "that with the very substance of our globe shells have much to do, and that every one of these had once an inhabitant. Chalk is entirely a marine deposit, upheaved in the course of ages by subterranean forces, broken into cliffs and long lines of undulating hills; while in some places, the marine covering being removed, the fresh-water deposits that lie beneath are disclosed. The eye can easily trace, at Dover, for instance, on the base of the cliff the various strata or layers into which it is divided; in some parts having dark and regular lines of intervening flints, and in others having none. It is evident, therefore, that the chalky mass was once deposited in a fluid state at the bottom of a very deep sea, and that during the process shells, corallines, and various other creatures sank and were embedded in it, each layer becoming consolidated before the next, either of chalk or flint, was formed upon it. Heated waters and vapours have probably produced the nodules and veins of flint so abundant in the upper chalk. That the silicious matter was perfectly fluid before its consolidation, is proved not only by the sharp moulds and impressions of shells and other bodies retained by the flints, but also by the presence of zoophytes and sponges, which swarm in some of the cretaceous strata. Siliceous matter is insoluble in water of the ordinary temperature, yet experiment has shown that its solution readily takes place in vapour heated a little above that of fused cast-iron. Silicious deposits are also known to be formed by intermittent boiling fountains. Thus, from the crater of the volcanic mountain of Tongariro, in New Zealand, rising more than 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, jets of vapour and streams of boiling water, highly charged with siliceous matter, are continually issuing forth. Dashing down the flanks of the volcano, in cascades and torrents, they empty themselves into the lakes at its base; and as the temperature of the water diminishes, silicious matter is deposited in vast sheets, and incrustations of flint are thrown down on the extraneous substances lying in the course of these volcanic waters. Nor is it less remarkable that they also precipitate siliceous matter in the state of stalagmitic concretions, and in nodules resembling in colour and solidity the flints of the English chalk. That organic bodies are transmitted into flint by an agency of this kind has been satisfactorily demonstrated."

"Truth is strange, stranger than fiction!" said I; "so I suppose you have something yet to add on the former vitality of rocks?"

"Certainly," said Wilton; "though ours is the 'touch and go' style, you know. Lying upon and filling up depressions in the chalk is our great tertiary formation, abounding with shells, some absolutely gigantic. The beds comprising this formation are covered by others of a peculiar soft, white stone, including much gypsum, and resembling chalk, but nearly of the nature of pumice-stone. This substance is very remarkable, from its being formed, at least one tenth of its bulk, of animalcules, among which have been recognised no fewer than thirty marine creatures. The size of one of these animalcules amounts on an average, and in the greater part, to one two hundred and eighty-eighth of a line, which equals one-sixth of the thickness of a human hair. The globule of the human blood is not much smaller. Those of a frog are twice as large as one of these creatures. A cubic inch would contain, on an average, about forty-one thousand millions of these animals. Of this aggregate, one hundred and eighty-seven millions go to a grain. Numbers of these animalcules have coverings or shields of flint, and a single shield of the gastrolonella weighs about the one-hundred-and-eighty-seven millionth part of a grain. But here we must stop; we have just left time for another meal; and then, only because I must go, I am off by the rail."

The Matron.

NO. XXXI.

I WILL now keep my promise, and give some directions about pickling. I begin with walnuts. They are now green, and just fit for use.

Make some brine, consisting of four table-spoonfuls of salt, and a gallon of water. Whatever quantity of walnuts you may have, cover them with brine made in the above-mentioned proportions. Let them remain in the salt and water, or brine, for nine days, putting fresh brine to them every other day. Then put them into vinegar and water, in equal quantities, having first sprinkled the walnuts with salt. Then boil them up once in the vinegar and water, after this strain them and put them into jars. Then take the strongest vinegar you can procure, to every quart of which add one ounce of white pepper, one ounce of cloves, the same quantity of whole ginger, twelve chalcots, four bay leaves, and a stick of horse radish cut in pieces; boil all these up together, and pour it hot over the walnuts. Then put as much mustard-seed over them as the bottles will admit of, and tie them down close.

Onions are pickled in the following manner:—Take small ones, and strip off the outer skin. Boil them in water till they begin to grow tender; then drain them dry, and when they are cold strip off two more of the skins, and dry them with a soft linen rag; put them into a stone jar, and to every quart of onions add five bay leaves, two races of ginger, sliced, and a quarter of an ounce of mace. Then take some vinegar, and to each quart put two ounces of salt. Boil the salt and vinegar together, skim it clean, and when it is cold fill up the jar of onions with it, and then tie them down carefully.

Mushrooms may be pickled for your own use if you are well off, and if you are not for an article of sale.

You should procure nice mushroom buttons, and (with the bottom of the stalks cut off) throw them into brine made as directed for soaking the walnuts. Let them remain in the brine for one day. When you take them out wipe them one by one. Then put some milk and water in a stew-pan on the fire. As soon as it boils put the mushrooms into it, and let them continue boiling for three minutes. Then strain them; after this spread them on a clean dry cloth, and cover them with a similar cloth. When they are quite dry put them into bottles with a few corns of white pepper and some mace; fill up the bottles with good strong vinegar, and tie them down tight.

French beans make a very nice pickle, and as they grow very plentifully, my readers may be glad to have a few directions about them. Let the beans be young, wipe them clean, cut off the stalks, and string them; put them into a clean dry jar, and prepare the pickle for them as follows:—The quantity of vinegar you will require must depend on the quantity of your beans. However, to every gallon of vinegar put one nutmeg, cut into quarters, an ounce of whole ginger, cut into small pieces, a quarter of an ounce of mace, and the same quantity of cloves and whole pepper. Boil these up together and pour them boiling hot upon the beans; cover them up, and let them stand two days. Then pour the pickle away from the beans into a perfectly clean saucepan, boil up again, and then pour the pickle again over the beans. Let them stand for three days. Then in a saucepan lined with earthenware boil up once, the beans and the pickle together. Then take them off, put them into jars, and lay a plate over the top. Let them stand till they are quite cold, and tie them down with care. Girkins, you may pickle in exactly the same manner.

And now I come to the most homely pickle of all, yet to my taste it is as good as any—I mean red cabbage. In the first instance, procure a fine large red cabbage, cut it into thin slices, put it into a cullender, and sprinkle a handful of salt over it. To a quart of vinegar put an ounce of allspice, and boil them well together. Place your cabbage in a jar, and as soon as the vinegar is cold, pour it over the cabbage. It will be fit for use in a few days; but mind it is always kept well tied down.

I have yet to add a few general directions about pickling. Always have stone jars for your pickles, and keep them in a thoroughly dry closet, or else the vinegar will lose its acidity. Another caution is, never put a metal spoon into the jars, but make use of a wooden one that has a long handle to it, and holes in the bowl. Put bladder over the mouth of the jars, and leather over this bladder, thus the air will be thoroughly excluded, and mind you tie the jar down well after taking any pickle out.

I hope this chapter on pickles will be welcome to my readers. I do not recommend the constant use of pickles, as they are not very digestible, but I consider a little of them taken now and then is wholesome, and they are very "handy" when the dinner consists principally of cold meat, or when a nice little lunch or supper must quickly be prepared for an unexpected guest.

Small Change.

If you are disquieted at anything, you should consider with yourself, is the thing of that worth, that for I should so disturb myself, and lose my peace and tranquillity?

UPON the 19th of May, 1790, the memorable dark day, a lady wrote to Dr. Byles, as follows:—"Dear Doctor, how do you account for this darkness?" He replied, "Dear Madam, I am as much in the dark as you are."

By taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over, he is superior.

A GENTLEMAN, having written a letter, concluded it as follows:—"Give Everybody's love to Everybody, so that Nobody may be aggrieved by Anybody being forgotten by Somebody."

"I THOUGHT you were born on the first of April," said a benedict to his lovely wife, who had mentioned the twenty-first as her birthday.—"Most people would think so from my choice of a husband," she replied.

A GREEK maid being asked what fortune she would bring her husband, answered, "I will bring him what is more valuable than any treasure—a heart unspotted and virtue without a stain, which is all that descended to me from my parents."

"THE wicked don't live out half their days," said a good man to his negro servant. "Dat is queer," said Cuffy. "Him no live out half his day? Den I s'pose he die 'bout 'leven o'clock in de forenoon."

AN inscription, it is said, may be found in an Italian grave-yard: "Here lies Etella, who transported a large fortune to heaven in acts of charity, and has gone thither to enjoy it."

SATIRE is an ugly weapon in the work of reform. It tears asunder, it cauterises, it blisters. No one is really made better by it. The one assailed, though he may fear the sting, will never be better through its application, though he may seem so. A satirist lives all the time in boiling water.

THERE are many things that are thorns to our hopes until we have attained them, and envenomed arrows to our heart when we have.

AN attorney before a bench of magistrates, a short time ago, told the bench, with great gravity, "That he had two witnesses in court in behalf of his client and they would be sure to speak the truth, for he had no opportunity to communicate with them!"

"CAN you tell me, Bill, how it is that a rooster always keeps his feathers sleek and smooth?" "No," said Bill. "Well, he always carries his comb with him."

SLANDER.—The expansive nature of scandal is told by the poet thus:—

"The flying rumours gathered as they rolled;
Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told,
And all who told it added something new,
And all who heard it made enlargement, too;
On every ear it spread—on every tongue it grew."

"You always lose your temper in my company," said an individual of doubtful reputation to a gentleman. "True, sir, and I shouldn't wonder if I lost everything I have about me."

WHEN the Princess Helena was born, it was told the Princess Royal that she had got a little sister. "Oh! that is delightful," cried innocent little royalty; "do let me go and tell mamma!"

THERE is a man of my acquaintance who thinks that "Hon." placed before a man's name stands for honest.

BE ON THE WATCH.

He that a watch will wear this must he do—
Pocket his watch, and watch his pocket too.

"Six feet in his boots?" exclaimed old Mrs. Beeswax. "What will the impudence of this world come to, I wonder? Why, they might just as reasonably tell me that a man had six heads in his hat."

THAT was a very singular mistake made by Digg, at the wedding, who, when introduced to the bride, wished that she might enjoy many returns of the present happy occasion.

This word, Time, is the only word in the English language which can be thus arranged, and the different transpositions thereof are all at the same time Latin words. These words, in English as well as in Latin, may be read either upward or downward, forward or backward. The English words, time, item, meti, and emit (to send forth), are mentioned above; and of the Latin ones (1) Time, signifies fear thou; (2) Item—likewise; (3) Meti—to be measured; (4) Emit—he buys.

THE RIVER'S BANK.

So many untold years have passed,

As birds with bright wings flee,

Since we beside that river's edge

Sat down in childish glee.

The day was beautiful and calm,

We happy as the day,

The very waters seemed to laugh

Like children in their play.

You sat and told me fairy tales,

And both believed them true,

You from your faith in all things bright,

I from my trust in you.

You told me that in after years

We'd dwell beside that stream,

And all the while the waters laughed,

So pleasant was the dream.

I asked you if an elfin queen

Had made your eyes so blue—

And then the waters louder laughed,

As if they thought it true.

The sunlight played amid your hair—

It loved you as its child;

And if I had a childish pain,

I lost it when you smiled.

We launched our barks upon the waves,

And marked them dance and shine;

Your's safely gained the other shore—

The waters buried mine!

Your face was like an angel's then,

Its look has scarcely changed;

You dwell beside that river yet,

While I afar have ranged.

You might believe in fairies still,

Your life has been so fair—

Some vestal nun serenely calm

Might have the look you wear.

The hopes which blossom o'er your heart,

Are like the flowers of yore—

You still cling roses on the tide,

And still they gain the shore!

The laughing glee of that bright day

Departed from me long,

Perchance those dreaming waters keep

The echo of its song.

Ah no! the throbbing of my heart

Would hush its pleasant tone,

To hear the summer music there

Is left for you alone.

EDWARD PLAYER, JUN.—Problems sent for insertion must be accompanied by their solutions.

HERR KÖNIG.—R to K 8 is Black's best reply to your proposed move of R to K 8 in Problem No. 50. Mate cannot then be effected in two more moves. Your solution of Problem No. 49 is correct.

T. POTTER.—We cannot undertake to examine Problems which are not submitted to us on diagrams. The requisite forms can be forwarded to you on your sending us your name and address on a stamped envelope.

W. F. KENDER.—Black's best defence to your first move in Problem No. 49 is Kt to Q Kt 2, mate cannot then be given in two more moves. In Problem No. 50 Black should play K to K 2, instead of Q 2, when the Kt has taken the Pawn which stands on Black's K B 2.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

In order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I. New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

JOHN A. N.—The Chiltern Hills are a range of chalk eminences separating the counties of Bedford and Hertford, passing through the middle of Bucks, from Tring in Hertfordshire to Henley in Oxfordshire. Formerly these hills were covered with thick beechwood, and sheltered numerous robbers. To put these down and protect the inhabitants, an officer was appointed under the Crown, called the Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, which were Barnham, Desborough, and Stoke. The duties of the stewardship have long since ceased, but the office itself is retained for a particular purpose. A member of the House of Commons, not in any respect disqualified, can only vacate his seat by his acceptance of this office, or some other nominal office in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

QUID.—"Revenons à nos moutons" (let us return to our sheep) is a proverb taken from an old French play, "Patelin," where a woollen-draper is brought in, pleading against his shepherd concerning some sheep the shepherd had stolen from him, continued digressing from the point to speak of a piece of cloth, which his antagonist's attorney had likewise robbed him of, which made the judges call out to the draper, "Revenons à nos moutons!" It is now used among friends, either in conversation or in writing, after a digression from the subject in hand, and is equivalent to—"Let us return to our subject."

EMMELINE.—The widow of the man who died intestate and without issue, will take half the personal property of which he was possessed at the time of his death, and one-third of the revenue of his freehold estates. The heir-at-law and the personal representatives will succeed to the rest of his property.

A HOUSEKEEPER.—You ask us how you can prepare chloride of lime so as to use it as a liquid. Before we give you the receipt we must warn you that it is a very powerful preparation, and it is dangerous to use much of it. It has an injurious effect on the lungs. It takes the colour out of dresses and furniture, and burns holes in linen; but, properly applied, it is very valuable as a disinfectant. The way to prepare it for use is as follows:—Stir one pound of the chloride of lime into four gallons of water; allow it to settle for two or three hours. Then pour off the clear solution and keep it well corked and bottled. The rooms of houses in which there is fever should be sprinkled with it morning and evening, but during the process fresh air should be admitted. To destroy the bad smell from drains, &c., pour into them a quart of the mixture with a pail of water. Observe also that water in cisterns may be purified by putting about a pint of this liquid to one hundred gallons of water. Another valuable property of the liquid chloride of lime is to remove the smell of paint in a single day. Sprinkle the newly-painted room with it, and put some of it in the corners of the apartments, in dishes or saucers. When, added to all this, we tell you that this preparation, poured into the crevices of bedsteads, destroys bugs, we think you will allow that we have given you very valuable directions respecting this recently discovered disinfectant.

L. M. P.—In reply to your question, as to whether persons can be forced into a madhouse on the affidavit of two physicians, we are sorry to say that they can, and in this respect the law requires immediate alteration; for as it stands at present, there is not an individual whose personal liberty is safe. Physicians form a very respectable body, but at the same time a very numerous one. The less worthy among them are as likely to be influenced by bribes, as the unprincipled members of any other profession, and thus they furnish ready tools for ruthless and designing men. We consider it a lamentable absurdity, that upon the mere word of two individuals of any description, persons may be thrown into confinement at the instigation of an enemy anxious to get rid of them. You ask if there is any remedy for persons thus imprisoned? Certainly there is none for the poor victim himself. Should he have friends aware of the injustice done to him, they can, with difficulty and expense, cause to be issued what is termed a writ of "habeas corpus," or a command to have the person confined brought into a court of justice. But this is poor amends, if any, for in the meantime the victim of unjust imprisonment in a madhouse, surrounded, no doubt, by circumstances of a horrible and frightful character, depressed by the prospect of perpetual confinement, and wrung with an intolerable sense of injury, may have been driven to madness, though perfectly sane before his unjust arrest. There should exist no possibility of confining an individual in a madhouse, until an inquiry has taken place as public as that which precedes confinement in any other prison. This is necessary for the safety of society in general, and imperatively so for that of unprotected women.

A CHEVALIER.—You are right, there has been a question of removing Temple Bar, but it is doubtful whether this removal would do any permanent good, for the obstructions to carriages are as great on Ludgate Hill as in the Strand and in Fleet-street. Taking another view of the subject, we should lose in Temple-bar a most interesting and characteristic landmark of the metropolis, and the only one of the city boundaries now remaining. However, Temple-bar is not so ancient as you seem to think. It was built by Sir Christopher Wren, after the great fire of London in 1666. It is of Portland stone, and of the Corinthian order of architecture. Over the gateway on the east side, in two niches, are statues of Queen Elizabeth and James I., with the royal arms over the keystone; and on the west side are statues of Charles I. and II., in Roman togas.

OLIVIA.—The friend who has informed you that for the southern coast of England no protection has been provided is in error. The ships intended for the Channel fleet are to be brought forward immediately and put in commission. The active and popular admiral, Sir Charles Howe Freemantle, has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of this fleet. Sir Charles is in his 56th year. This is young for an admiral. He has had great experience, and he is full of strength and energy. We think that great discretion has been shown in selecting this officer from a great number of competitors.

A SISTER.—We are able in some degree to allay your fears respecting the health of your brother, whose business obliges him to remain in London, and in the immediate vicinity of the Thames. The deodorisation of which we spoke in a recent number has commenced, and the miasma, or unpleasant smell, has diminished. The black appearance of the water excites alarm in the first instance, but scientific research has dissipated this feeling, and on excellent authority we can inform you that this dark hue is a good indication. This inky appearance of the river is caused by the iron in the clay of the river's bed. This clay has fixed and retained the sulphuretted hydrogen or poisonous vapour, and greatly contributed to our safety. Nevertheless, the vapours from the Thames (though less deadly than they would have been but for the clay-bed of the river) are offensive and unhealthy, and they produce headache, giddiness, and nausea. We hope that those in authority will not relax in their efforts to purify the Thames, for there is greater cause of uneasiness for the autumn than for the summer, as the human constitution has less power to resist infection when the frame is relaxed by previous heat. It should be remembered that the plague of London, that carried off so many thousands of inhabitants, did not happen in June or July, but in September.

ELLEN BRUCE.—"Ellen Bruce" has been reading of Robin Hood, of his courtesy, his daring, and his generosity. She declares she is quite in love with him, but adds she would not have troubled us about this, but for a series of provocations she has received. Her brother declares that there never was such a person as Robin Hood; no, nor as King Arthur; nor even William Tell. In reply to "Ellen" we will only observe, that without any intention of fighting in support of all the heroes of past times, we consider that her brother takes too much upon himself, in denying the existence of one, or any of the three worthies mentioned above. He may think his scepticism a proof of vast research; we look upon it in a very different light. As to his sister's beau idéal, Robin Hood, the author of the "Popular History of England" accepts Robin Hood as a real personage, and considers that there may have been a succession of Robin Hoods, during the long term of Norman tyranny; but whoever he was, and in whatever reign he lived, Robin Hood is the representation of the never-ending protest of the people against misrule. In the Robin Hood ballads, the detestation of the oppressors was long kept alive; and having put aside the exaggeration of these ballads, we feel that we are in the natural regions of poetry, surrounded by adventures that might have been real, and by men that have human hearts in their bosoms.

HARRY.—To produce blue flame, take seven ounces of nitrate of potash, two ounces of powder of crude antimony, one ounce of sulphur vivum, half an ounce of gunpowder, three drachms of king's yellow, and one drachm of oil of lavender. Mix well together.

JAMES DANIEL.—We have several times given excellent receipts for the removal of warts. See No. 191, page 271.

A YOUNG CHEMIST surprises us by asking us to "furnish him with a simple method of making distilled water." The water must be evaporated, and subsequently condensed by means of a still and refrigerator, or other similar apparatus.

ONE WITH COARSE RED HANDS.—To remove the roughness of the skin use sand balls, or sand, or pounded pumice-stone, with the soap. The hands may be whitened by the use of a little chloride of lime and warm water; but this should be used only occasionally, and should be well washed off with clean water.

A CAREFUL HOUSEWIFE must, in the first place, select a clean, dry place in which to deposit her furs; she should then place some strong spices, as cloves, pimento, &c., wrapped in muslin, amongst them.

ROB ROY.—You will find it very difficult "to keep flies out of the room;" but by placing the following mixture in various parts of the room, in small saucers, you may destroy them rapidly.—Mix one tea-spoonful of black pepper and two tea-spoonfuls of moist sugar in a table-spoonful of milk.

J. B.—You will ruin your drawing if you apply cream to it. Milk, carefully skimmed, so that no particle of cream remains, will answer your purpose.

ANNIE ROWLAND.—Though we place no faith in the assertion of the poet you have quoted, it is not for you, "not yet nineteen years of age," to give way to feelings of despondency. The desire to "love and be beloved" is natural; but have patience. Cultivate the adornments of the mind, and years of happiness may yet be yours.

THE LILY OF THE VALLEY, GEORGE HENRY TAYLOR, WILLIAM, PATTY ANXIOUS.—To the "Lily of the Valley's" first questions we answer, that if she wishes to speak in the prater perfect, she should make use of the first mode of expression; if in the prater pluperfect, the latter is correct. She may rely on the directions given for pronunciation, and she cannot do better than persevere in the study of "The Lessons."—We strongly recommend "George Henry" to bend all his energies to induce his parents to consent to his marriage with the young lady he loves. We consider her aptitude for business more than an equivalent for the fortune of the other lady.—"William" must not be in a hurry. At twenty-one a man often mistakes a fancy for a passion. If his love stands the test of time, say a twelvemonth, let him propose, supposing always that the lady's constancy has also stood this test.—The only bar "Patty Anxious's" lover is suited for is the prisoner's bar, supposing he is so unprincipled as to endeavour to induce a young girl to elope with him from school. If "Patty" wishes to avoid disgrace and misery, she will grant this intending barrister no more interviews.

AN INQUIRER.—By all means let the inscription be in English, and in the exact words of our Bible translation.

AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—M. Jullien is a native of France. Your lines are not suited to our Journal.

ST. CLAIR.—The mark on your wrist is indelible.

E. LOVETT.—The English of moyen âge is "middle age." W. B. S. (Sunderland).—You have not stated by what tenure the person who has so greatly increased the value of the house holds the property, or at whose expense its value has been enhanced; without the knowledge of those circumstances we cannot advise you how to act.

J. CELIA ROSS.—Your case is a sad one; but it does not admit of legal redress. Try the power of persuasion upon the wrongdoer.

J. R. (Dundee).—An excise officer is just as amenable to a creditor as any other of her Majesty's subjects.

A YOUNG TRADESMAN FROM HOME.—Your master has power to employ you as you state; but if he neglects to instruct you in the business to learn which you were apprenticed, you may complain before a magistrate.

J. DEEDS.—Be sure, "J. Deeds," that everything may be made of use, and marigolds, though not remarkably pretty as flowers, should not be neglected. When dried, they improve the flavour of broth and soup.

F. H. J.—Your hint shall be taken into consideration.

MINNIE.—A fine voice is a valuable gift, and one that should not be neglected. We think if you make inquiries, you might hear of public schools or singing classes in which you might gain instruction at little or no expense.

CLARA (Colchester).—"Clara" of Colchester informs us that her eyes are blue, and wishes us to tell her of something to make them sparkle. In our opinion, the finest eyes are those that sparkle with intelligence, and intelligence is promoted by study.

MARY MAY.—"Mary May" has probably some business which occupies her by day; but she might further her laudable wish to improve in spelling and writing by going regularly to an evening seminary.

HORTENSE.—"Hortense" should not recognise the gentleman under the circumstances mentioned.

A DROOPING LILY.—"A Drooping Lily," in her touching and well-worded communication, does not tell us on what grounds her father refused to consent to the union she so earnestly desired; but putting together "the errors not a few" which "Drooping Lily's" lover confessed, and the harshness which his conduct to "Lily" imply, we are tempted to conclude that "Lily's" father did not act without good reason. Woman's love is often blind, a father's is very clear-sighted. Ernest's resentment at the neglect shown him by "Lily's" father ought not to have extended to "Lily" herself. To add to her grief was very unfeeling. He should have given her the option of trying what time would do, and of seeing if she could not induce her father to consent. We are glad to hear that another gentleman was able to console her; for although in the first anguish she would not listen to his suit, it showed her at least that she had still the power to please; and this consciousness must have saved her from that painful want of self-appreciation, one of the worst consequences of a disappointment in love. Now comes the question whether, if at any future time Ernest should renew his attentions, "Lily" would do well to reinstate him in her favour? We answer no; for the man who is harsh and inconsiderate as a lover, is not likely to make a kind, indulgent husband.

R. POUNCE.—Good authorities pronounce Trafalgar with the accent on the last syllable, but custom accents the second syllable.

AMY A., A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER, MISS E. G.—Receipts for improving the hair and for making it curl are so constantly requested by our readers, that we think our "Editorial Table" must (by some) be read over with little attention, for we have frequently discussed these subjects. However, at the request of the above-mentioned correspondents, we return to them. To strengthen and improve the hair, damp it frequently with a wash prepared in the following manner: Dissolve in one quart of boiling water one ounce of borax and half an ounce of camphor. When cool the solution will be ready for use. This wash not only cleanses and beautifies, but strengthens the hair, preserves the colour, and prevents baldness. A good curling fluid can be made in the following manner:—Melt a piece of white beeswax, about the size of a filbert kernel, or large pea, in one ounce of olive oil. To this add two drops of otto of roses. Apply it to the hair as you would pomatum.

CONSTANCE MAUD.—For the object you have in view, we recommend your studying the French Lessons we are now publishing in this paper.

IGNORAMUS.—Unless love for the lady prompts you earnestly to wish for a union with her, we consider the disparity in your ages too great. But if you feel convinced you can form an attachment for no other woman, you had better have a wife seven years older than yourself than no wife at all.

W. S. GREEN.—You had better watch the working of the new society before you connect yourself with it.

G. W. B.—Your marriage should have been registered by the minister before you left the church.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

Courage! the gift of God and manhood's crown.
OLD PLAY.

ALTHOUGH it was with a feeling of bitter disappointment that our hero and his companions found the gates of the temple closed against them by the obstinacy or error of Dawlish, it did not make them unjust. Not one of the party blamed the excessive prudence which forced them to seek the precarious shelter of the ruined tower in order to avoid their pursuers, who had hunted them like bloodhounds through the still blackened jungle till their panting steeds were well nigh exhausted with fatigue.

On reaching the entrance to their retreat, the riders, without one instant's hesitation, abandoned them; and by uniting their efforts, succeeded at last in forcing the massive doors back on their rusty hinges, and drawing the ponderous bars.

Having accomplished that, they had time to look around them.

The building had evidently been constructed with a view to defence. The walls were constructed of rough, unhewn stone, without aperture of any kind, except a row of loopholes just large enough for musketry.

So far they were fortunate.

A broken staircase led to a vaulted chamber beneath. The lieutenant and Richard descended to examine it, whilst Mark Rayner and Jack kept watch above.

After groping carefully round the walls—for the place was too obscure to trust to sight alone—they satisfied themselves there existed no means of egress from the vault; consequently they were safe from any attack in that direction. One singularity, however, forcibly struck our hero: the walls appeared to be constructed with superior care and choice of materials from the rest of the building.

"Strange!" he exclaimed.

"What is strange?" demanded his companion.

Richard pointed out the peculiarity he had noticed; when Marsh, to satisfy himself, struck a light by means of his pistol, and, setting fire to the muslin scarf he wore twisted round his turban, had time during the temporary blaze to examine the chamber more minutely.

Its walls were built of long square blocks of sandstone, tallying in size, and curiously sculptured in high relief with subjects taken from the incarnations of Vishnu and the Hindoo mythology.

Evidently it had been intended for some religious purpose.

Under any other circumstances they would have examined it with interest; but the report of their companions' revolvers recalled them to the apartment above. As they emerged from the vault, a bullet which had passed through one of the loopholes, slightly grazed the temple of Richard. Fortunately, the enemy, three of whom had already fallen, were too much intimidated to fire except at random.

"We can never hope to hold this place," observed the lieutenant.

At the same time he cast his eyes around to ascertain if there were any means of reaching the chamber above, and from thence passing to the roof of the tower.

The staircase had been taken away.

"Our friends by this time must have perceived their fatal error," said our hero. "They never will desert us."

"Sir Charles will do his duty," was the reply of his more experienced friend.

"And that is?"

"Not to risk the lives of his men in an attempt which must end not only in their destruction, but in that of the helpless beings who have no other protectors. Were you his own son," added the veteran, "he would endure the misery of seeing you perish before his sight, rather than abandon his post for an instant."

There was a silence of several minutes; each felt that he was listening to his doom, and heard it without a murmur—although it seemed hard, very hard to die, and their countrymen so near them.

Suddenly the firing ceased, and they listened eagerly.

"By heavens!" exclaimed Mark Rayner, greatly excited; "but the regiment has made a charge upon the rebels."

The lieutenant shook his head incredulously.

Jack Manders, who, to do him justice, regretted the peril of his benefactor more than his own, could endure the harassing suspense no longer. He mounted with desperate courage to one of the loopholes, to ascertain why hostilities had ceased. A glance sufficed to explain it, and he hastily withdrew his head, just in time to avoid the volley of bullets which came rattling against the aperture.

"They are piling brushwood and timber," he said, "against the gates, in order to smoke us out of our retreat."

"Or force an entrance by fire," observed Richard.

It appeared a cruel doom to men in the pride and strength of mankind to perish by such means. To die, suffocated like the wolf and wild fox in their lair, or rush forth to be hacked to pieces by the countless bands of fanatics, who already gloated in anticipation over the sufferings of their victims; but no hope, or means of escape, presented itself, and the lieutenant cast his glances once more despairingly on the broken stairs which led to the upper vault of the tower.

Jack, who followed the direction of his eyes with his own, reflected for a few seconds, then, drawing forth his clasp knife, began to rip the boots from off his swollen feet—the only possible way of removing them.

"What are you doing?" demanded our hero, mournfully, for he suspected that the horrors of their situation had impaired the poor fellow's reason.

Jack pointed to the broken stairs.

"Impossible," said Richard.

"I ain't so sure of that," replied his companion in misfortune: "I ain't been to sea for nothing. Many a night, when the waves dashed over the deck of the Caradoc, and the cold, white, feathery foam came splashing in my face, half blinding me with the salt spray, I have mounted aloft to reef sails, and balanced myself like a sea bird at the end of the yard, on a space not broader than one of those broken stones."

"You will never reach it," observed his benefactor; "and only add to your sufferings. My faithful friend, we must die together."

Jack repeated the word "friend" in an undertone several times, as if to give himself courage, and then without further hesitation commenced the difficult and dangerous ascent. At the same instant he did so, the enemy, as if aware that their prey was making a last desperate attempt to escape them, recommenced firing, and the bullets once more came whistling through the loopholes of the tower.

The sepoy were armed with our own rifles, and used them well.

With anxious eyes, the fugitives watched the efforts of Jack, who clung to the broken stones which projected from the wall with the tenacity of youth, struggling desperately for life. More than once, as he hung suspended by his bleeding hands, the poor fellow cast a despairing look towards the still distant aperture; and would have relaxed his grasp, had not a cheering word from our hero encouraged him. At the sound of his voice, his half-relaxed muscles recovered their tension; and, by an almost superhuman exertion of his remaining strength, he contrived to reach a stone, which projected further than the rest.

This afforded him time to pause and recover breath.

Meanwhile it was only by keeping their backs to the gates, that the remaining three could avoid the shower of bullets which, with deadly precision, the besiegers continued to pour through the loopholes. The lieutenant had advised his companions to reserve their fire, for the stock of ammunition was getting low, till the last moment; still they kept a wary eye upon the only aperture by which the enemy could ascertain their exact position, and the first bronzed visage that appeared, received a ball that scattered its owner's brains.

There was a loud yell of fury and defiance as the sepoy fell.

Another rebel, who made a similar attempt, shared the same fate, from the cool, steady hand of Mark.

"There is wisdom in all things," says the poet, "even in the trials and sufferings which temper both body and mind." Had Jack not been subjected for years to the brutal treatment he had experienced at the hands of Captain Gall, his powers of endurance must have given way; for not only were his feet lacerated by the sharp points of the projecting stones, but his fingers, which from time to time he was obliged to thrust like wedges between the interstices, were cut to the bone, and his nails torn to the quick.

More than half an hour elapsed before the poor fellow succeeded in reaching the opening in the roof, which, after all, was not more than thirty feet high.

With an effort, which caused the sinews of his arms to rise like strained cordage, he swung himself through, and then sank exhausted.

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed our hero; "one, at least, may escape."

Mark Rayner now began to examine the means of ascent, for the thought of Rose and the love of life became strong within him, and he resolved to make the attempt.

Richard called to Jack Manders several times before receiving a reply. When it reached him it was in so low a tone that the speaker was evidently struggling to recover breath.

Here Mark, who had raised himself about four feet by the projecting stones, fell heavily.

"He can never accomplish it," whispered the lieutenant: "his weight is against him; for my own part, I shall not make the attempt, but I wish you to try it."

"And leave you to the mercy of our ferocious enemies?" answered Richard; "never."

The veteran entreated him urgently.

"It is of no use," was the reply; "I can only answer in your own words, spoken the day before we started from Calcutta."

"I do not recollect them."

"We both of us return to England," said Richard, repeating them, "or leave our bones in India to bleach together."

Just as Mark Rayner was about to renew the attempt, Jack called to him to desist.

"Why?" shouted the soldier.

The reply came in the form of a thickly knotted rope, which the former had discovered in the chamber above, and now let down to his companions, first making one end of it fast to a stone column, round which ran a spiral staircase, leading to the roof.

The ascent now became easy; and in a few minutes the four fugitives, who had so bravely struggled for life, stood once more together.

"You have saved us!" exclaimed the last three, shaking hands with their preserver, who looked joyfully in the face of his friend and benefactor, and smiled.

The thought of having been useful to him repaid his sufferings.

The first thing was to draw up the rope, which was evidently intended for the purpose to which they had applied it; the next, to mount at once to the roof of the tower, to the edge of which Mark cautiously crept.

"Down!" he cried; "they are watching us."

The words were followed by several shots, which fell harmlessly.

Lieutenant Marsh now undertook to conduct their proceedings. Advancing in the same cautious manner that Mark had done, he perceived at a glance the design of the enemy. They had piled brushwood and timber against the gates of their retreat, and were about to fire the pile.

Silently he pointed to a huge stone which had become detached by time from the parapet, and indicated to his companions, by a movement of the finger, the direction in which he wished them to roll it.

It required all their united strength to move it; even Jack's was brought into requisition. Just as they got it to the very verge of the roof, the veteran called to them to stop.

"Wait," he said, "till I give the signal."

Several sepoy approached the pile which the rajah—by the advice of Nadir, who had his own reasons for not destroying the tower by artillery—had ordered to be gathered against the gates; but at the very instant they were about to apply their torches, the lieutenant pronounced the word "Now!" and the ponderous stone fell, crushing three of them into a hideous, misshapen mass.

A shout of mingled rage and despair from the besiegers followed.

Marsh pointed to a second stone; and before the wild yells of their enemies had died away, the resolute Englishmen were quietly dragging it to the requisite position.

The second stone fell, and with a still more fatal result to those who thirsted so eagerly for their blood.

Then it was that the rajah, turning to the chief Brahmin, declared he would no longer sacrifice his men to his caprice of sparing the building, but at once open his great guns upon it.

Despite his effort to conceal it, the countenance of Nadir became troubled, and he bitterly regretted having quitted his retreat.

Why he did so will appear in the course of events. "It has been consecrated," he said, "to the deities of India, and may not be destroyed without sacrilege."

"I will erect one far more magnificent," answered the prince, with an incredulous smile, for he began to suspect the motives of the speaker. "The gods will pardon the crime," he added, "if crime there be, in consideration of the sacrifice of the infidels who fall with it."

"Beware," said the priest, "how you interpret their will; it is the soldier's duty to fight, the Brahmin's to announce—"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Acbar; "it is the reason, not the pretext that can move me from my purpose. If you have nothing better to urge than a superstitious veneration for a few old stones, I shall give the order to fire."

The features of Nadir became suddenly calm and expressionless. Whatever his motives, he had made up his mind to submit to the destruction of the tower rather than betray them.

"As you please," he made answer; "the counsels of age are thrown away upon impetuous youth. The chief is wiser than the sage in his own conceit; may he never live to discover the bitter truth."

With an impatient movement of his hand the rajah gave the signal to the gunners. A report which shook the ground followed, and the balls from the two field pieces striking the gates shattered them into countless fragments.

Sir Charles and his brother officers, who were watching the proceedings from the walls of the temple, turned aside in despair. The besiegers had removed to the other side of the tower, and were out of the range of the two solitary guns mounted on the walls of the temple.

"Poor fellows," he groaned; "it is all over with them."

His men impatiently demanded to be led to the rescue of their countrymen.

"Too late," muttered the major, whose courage was as warm as his temper. "This is the hardest trial of my life."

Here the fiery Welshman turned aside to conceal his rage and vexation.

Wharton, to whom great and heroic deeds, whether in action or endurance, possessed a peculiar charm, had for some time been watching the defence made by four men against unequal numbers with breathless interest.

"They will perish," he exclaimed, "worthy the name of Englishmen," as the fugitives kept hurrying from their elevated position a shower of stones upon the rebels, who thrice attempted to enter the shattered gates, but were as frequently repulsed.

The lieutenant of Acbar approached to give directions; a shot from the revolver of our hero, who had purposely reserved his fire, brought him from his horse. The rebels retreated, bearing the body with them.

Enraged beyond measure at the successful resistance of four worn-out Englishmen, the rajah now gave orders to bury them in the ruins of the tower they had so bravely defended. A native artilleryman, a deserter from the Bengal army, altered the elevation of the guns, and the work of destruction commenced in earnest.

Nadir smiled when he beheld the upper portion of the tower rapidly falling beneath the cannon of his ally.

"Raze it to the ground," he said. "I now withdraw my prohibition. Their hands are stained with the blood of the faithful. Let the asylum they have chosen prove their tomb."

Such, in all probability, was but too likely to be the case. The remaining battlements had fallen before the devoted band had retreated from their perilous position to the second chamber, the roof of which already began to crack above their heads.

"Let us descend," said the lieutenant.

"We may as well die here," observed Mark Rayner, despairingly.

"That is not the Christian's thought," replied the veteran, who, during the prolonged and terrible contest, had never for an instant lost his self-possession. "It is our duty to struggle to the last for life; man has no right to abandon it."

Urged by his reproof, the soldier began letting down the rope by which they had mounted. Richard was the first to descend.

"Here," he said, "we must make our last stand," when his companions joined him. "I, for one, am determined not to fling the slightest chance of life away; but I am equally resolved," he added, "not to fall alive into the hands of wretches who possess no other claim to humanity than the form and name."

Each one expressed a similar determination, and they mutually shook hands.

"We forget," exclaimed Marsh, struck by a sudden recollection, "that we have one more chance for safety."

Richard regarded him inquiringly.

The old soldier pointed to the aperture leading to the vault below. Despite their courage and resolution, an involuntary hesitation betrayed itself. Death from the falling roof and crumbling walls appeared horrible enough; but it was merely compared with the certainty of perishing by hunger and the pangs of thirst, sealed by the ruins in that living tomb.

A terrific crash was heard overhead: the first roof had fallen in; and the second was shattered by the superincumbent weight, that it was evident the next discharge of the enemy's cannon must bring it down.

Marsh gently laid his hand upon the arm of our hero and led him to the vault, which, as we before observed, was of far more massive construction than the rest of the building, which soon afterwards came tumbling down as if an earthquake had shaken it.

The cloud of dust which penetrated their retreat—we might say grave, for there appeared no possible means of escape—almost choked them; but the solid roof resisted the shock.

"We are preserved," said the lieutenant, who was the first to break the awful silence which succeeded.

"To starve," murmured Mark Rayner, despondingly.

Jack Manders groped his way to the spot where our hero was standing, and grasped his hand. He felt resigned, nay, almost content, to die by the side of one who had proved so true a friend to him.

"Here is my flask," he whispered; "it is more than half filled with wine."

Richard distributed it in equal portions to his friends, not forgetting to compel the speaker to take his share.

"I have many regrets at quitting life," he observed; "but it is not the slightest, that I shall never have the means, Jack, of proving how deeply I feel your fidelity and friendship for me."

"You can prove it," replied the nephew of Andrew Silcox, in an under tone.

"How?"

"By repeating to me the prayer which Lillian tried to teach me. I should like to hear it again, and from your lips."

There was a pause: the name of the fair girl, whom he so fondly loved, unmoved the heart of his benefactor; but the weakness, if weakness it might be called, lasted only for a few moments.

"Right," he said; "even here I have a duty to perform, let me not neglect it. Although ignorant of much I ought to know, He to whom our supplications are addressed will direct me."

The two friends knelt and prayed together.

When the rebel force beheld the downfall of the tower they set up a loud shout of triumph and derision, directed rather to the garrison of the temple, whose guns they were too cautious to approach, than to their victims, whom they believed beyond the reach of insult or of outrage.

"There fell as brave fellows," observed Sir Charles, "as ever bore the name of Englishmen. Poor Mark Rayner, it will be a sad blow to his wife—just as his good name was cleared too. Who could have been his companions?"

The question was not addressed to any one of the group near him, but the eyes of Wharton instantly sought those of Dawlish, which sank beneath his searching expression.

"If I were certain," he exclaimed, struck by a sudden suspicion, which he instantly checked.

"What?" demanded Plinlimmon.

"Nothing, major; one of those thoughts which sometimes tempt our better judgment, and lead us into error. Mine," he added, "was too terrible to be repeated."

CHAPTER LXXIX.

But, oh, the doleful sight that then we see!

We turned our look, and on the other side

A grisly shape of famine mought we see,

With greedy looks and gaping mouth, that cried,

Her body thin and bare as any bone,

Whereto was left nought but the skin alone.

SACKVILLE.

On the second night, the sycee, faithful to his promise, made his way to the cell of Caleb. Something of an extraordinary character had evidently occurred to alarm the inmates of the subterranean abode: Nadir, the chief Brahmin, was absent, and the subordinate priests, deprived of their head, wandered about the rock-hewn temple in a state of alarm and confusion; consequently, it was long past midnight before the boy ventured to visit his friend.

The prisoner, who had been counting the hours impatiently, could scarcely restrain his joy when he heard the door of his dungeon cautiously rolled back, his heart beat violently, for he felt that the moment of liberty was at hand.

Again, as on his previous visit, Hirim approached his lips to the ear of the youth before uttering a word; when he did speak, so intense was the silence that reigned around, his half-breathed whispers seemed to wake the sleepless echoes of the place.

"Have you filed the chain?" he asked.

Caleb caught his hand, and directed it to the ring which encircled his body; it was filed through as he had directed, just under the arm.

"Now drink of this, it will give you strength," added the speaker, giving him a flask filled with palm wine. The youth drank it eagerly, and as the invigorating draught cooled his parched lips, it imparted fresh energy and strength; he felt, should the necessity arrive, that he could once more make a struggle for life and freedom.

"I am ready!" he exclaimed, in an under tone; "prepared for any risk."

"Not yet," was the reply.

The speaker had brought with him a dress, similar to those worn by the servants of the temple, and silently assisted him to arrange it.

"Lillian!" said Caleb, for even in the joy he felt at the prospect of his own escape from captivity and a fearful death, the grateful fellow had not forgotten his fellow victim.

The sycee made no reply.

"I will not fly without her," added the speaker.

"There is but one chance of saving her," answered the boy, at last, "and it depends upon our quitting this place. Each night since I last saw you, I have listened at her cell; Kehoda never quits it for an instant."

"She is her servant," observed Caleb.

"She is the servant of the temple, and dares not assist her flight, even if her heart prompted her," said Hirim: "the penalty would be fearful. Besides," he added, "I have listened to her words, and overheard her urging Lillian to listen to the love of Al Moorad."

Caleb reflected for an instant. He had no cause to doubt either the sincerity or truth of one who had risked his life to serve him; added to which fear-and-twenty hours still intervened between the time the banker had appointed to make his last attempt to win or force the maiden to his wishes. Once free himself, he might apprise his countrymen of the place of her concealment. Sir Charles Fourreau and the gallant 61st he well knew would risk everything to save her. It was the best plan, for, after all, what could the arms of two mere youths achieve against a host of fanatics, in the event of a discovery?

"Lead on," he whispered; "I am ready."

The two speakers crept stealthily from the cell, the door of which the Hindoo closed and carefully replaced the chain.

"Trust to your disguise," he said, "and follow me boldly. Look not to the right or left, and keep on the darkest sides of the passages."

The fugitives—each one with his hand upon his weapon, ready to defend his life in case of discovery—proceeded through the rock-sculptured labyrinth of vaults and corridors without interruption till they reached a hall of loftier proportions and larger extent than any they had yet entered.

Caleb shuddered, as his eyes fell upon a rough altar like the one in the sanctuary above, formed of a single stone, and crowned with the statue of Mariatele. Fixed to the huge block were fetters of bronze, evidently for the purpose of attaching the victims offered to the goddess.

About half-a-dozen servitors and as many Naulch girls were sleeping on carpets spread in front of the idol, at the back of which was the cell where the chief Brahmin so frequently retired.

Hirim glided like a shadow past his countrymen, till he reached the entrance to it, then paused an instant for his companion. As the latter joined him one of the sleepers awoke.

"Who passes?" he demanded, aloud.

Neither of the young men uttered a word.

"Speak," added the priest, "in the name of the goddess and her symbol."

The sycee drew Caleb into the cell, and closed the door after him. An instant after and the sound of a gong was heard. The inmates of the temple were alarmed, and Al Moorad and a crowd of fanatics speedily filled the hall.

The absence of Nadir, whose authority being supreme, directed all things at his will, had left the priesthood without a head. It was some time, therefore, before an explanation could be obtained, for all were asking questions, which one only could reply to.

At last it was clearly understood that the priest had seen two persons enter the cell where none save the chief Brahmin ever ventured.

There was a cry of horror, such an act being looked upon as sacrilege by the numerous dupes of the old man's supposed sanctity. Al Moorad, less superstitious than those around him, tried the door: it was fastened.

"Bring me the means to force it," he exclaimed.

All who heard him shuddered; not one stirred.

He repeated his order, which in all probability would have been equally unattended to, had not a Brahmin, known to be in the confidence of Nadir, made his appearance. He was a venerable-looking man, and, next to his chief, possessed the greatest authority.

"The Christian prisoner," he exclaimed, "has escaped, and the boy Hirim has been the instrument and companion of his flight."

On hearing this the proposal of Al Moorad was at once complied with, and the door of the cell broken open. When those who had penetrated the sacred precincts—sacred at least in their eyes—looked around them, the place was empty. Some accused the Brahmin of having mistaken his dreams for reality; others declared that Mariatele had worked a miracle; but the banker believed in neither supposition—he thought only on the escape of Caleb, its possible consequences, and with a determined look he turned aside, directing his steps towards the prison of Lillian.

For forty-eight hours our hero and his three companions had been the inmates of the lonely vault in which they had taken refuge; sealed, as it were, within a living tomb by the enormous mass of stone which the falling of the tower had piled above them. They were without hope, except that Christian one which can alone sustain us when earth and all of earth appear to have abandoned us.

In addition to the pangs of hunger, the prisoners,—for such they really were, although no bolts were drawn, or living being kept guard over them—had suffered severely from the pangs of hunger, and still more from those of thirst, when the lieutenant, whose coolness and self-possession had not for an instant deserted him, in placing his hands against the walls discovered that they were damp, and proposed to his fellow-sufferers to lick the moisture from the stones. The suggestion was eagerly complied with, and in a few minutes the blood-swollen lips, which cracked and burned at every effort to speak, became less painful.

"Why should we make a fruitless attempt to prolong existence?" murmured Mark Rayner.

"Simply because it is our duty to do so," observed Richard. "My hopes of escaping from this living death are faint as yours; still I am determined not to give the slightest chance away. The means of lessening the pangs of thirst have already been vouchsafed to us, who can limit the mercy of God? It is boundless as his power, and may reach us even here."

"Do not let the courage of two boys shame your manhood, Mark," added the lieutenant; "see how patient poor Jack is, and his sufferings have been intense."

"I feel better now," said the latter; "the fire is quenched in my throat, and my head no longer throbs as if it would split; I almost fancy that I could sleep."

Strange to say, a similar inclination crept over his companions, who, no longer tormented by the fiery thirst which had lately consumed them, soon sank to rest.

The hero of our tale was the last to close his eyes, for he had thoughts which wrung his heart with agony and bitter regrets.

As is frequently the case after any violent reaction, either of pain or pleasure, the dreams of the sleepers were peaceful. We have heard many an old soldier declare that he has slept calmly upon the battlefield, amid the dying and the dead, and dreamt of home and of those who were most dear to him.

No wonder, then, if the visions of the lover were of Lillian. In his sleep, she appeared before him decked in her sunny smiles and modest beauty; he saw her beckon him to advance towards her, but a river, whose waters were dark and agitated, seemed to roll between them, and he hesitated; she beckoned him again, and, in his dream, he overleaped the barrier, and awoke with the imaginary effort.

Several minutes elapsed before Richard could persuade himself that he was not still sleeping.

A portion of the wall of the cell appeared to have been rent away, and he distinctly perceived two figures dressed in the garb of Hindoos standing at the aperture. Both were armed, and one of them carried a lamp.

Once convinced that it was a reality, and not a vision of his disordered imagination, Richard started to his feet and called to his companions to awake.

"It is Mr. Tyrrell's voice!" exclaimed Caleb, rushing forward and clasping his knees. "Don't you know me, sir? Caleb—the sailor you rescued from the Caradoc."

"And Hirim, your servant," added the sycee.

It was some time before our hero could recover his surprise, or either of the party find words to explain the chain of accident and adventure which had once more brought them together; but when at last they did mutually comprehend them, the hearts of all were filled with gratitude and astonishment.

"Who, after this," observed the lieutenant, "shall despair? From the depths of the earth the prayer of the captive has been heard and answered."

Mark Rayner bowed his head; the words sounded like a reproof.

As yet not a word had been uttered respecting Lillian.

"I am convinced," said our hero, after reflecting for an instant upon what he had heard, "that there exists a communication between the temple and the subterranean den you have described."

Hirim looked doubtfully.

"There must be," observed Caleb, eagerly; "how else could the daughter of Sir Charles have been made a prisoner and conveyed there?"

On hearing that Lillian was a captive, everything like deliberation or hesitation at once gave way. What were dangers—the disadvantages of numbers—nay, the certainty of death itself, weighed against her safety? Lillian in the hands of the heathen rebels! wretches who had never yet shown pity or forbearance to those within their power! There was a horror in the thought which seemed to nerve her lover's arm with more than human strength.

"Perhaps," observed the lieutenant, in the hope of calming his excitement, "the Brahmins may have obtained possession of her person by way of hostage."

Richard repeated the word mechanically.

"Not so," replied Caleb; "there is one who loves her; Hirim knows his name."

"Al Moorad," said the sycee, in answer to the question his master's lips refused to ask.

Our hero repeated it, bitterly: his heart had already divined it, for he had detected the cold and snake-like glances which the wily banker, on more than one occasion, had cast on him and the fair girl.

As for Jack Manders, he was already on his feet and examining his revolver. On hearing of Lillian's danger he no longer felt sensible of pain.

Following the sycee, who bore the lamp, the speakers threaded the narrow, winding succession of vaulted passages which connected the fallen tower with the subterranean temple. To one at least of the party they appeared interminable. The heart and brain of Richard throbbed with impatience.

"Shall we never arrive?" he murmured.

"Patience," replied the lieutenant, calmly. "Doubt not that Providence which has so unexpectedly befriended us; it seldom leaves its designs imperfect or unaccomplished."

With a groan of mental anguish the despairing lover once more pursued his way.

When Al Moorad directed his steps towards the cell of his captive, it was with the full intention of bringing matters to an issue, by compelling Lillian to go through the ceremony of a marriage with him. The escape of Caleb had alarmed him. There was a possibility that succour might arrive; and the heartless ruffian knew too well the temper of her countrymen not to be aware of the doom he might expect if once he fell into their hands.

"At least," he thought, "I will have one triumph over the hated race—the dearest, vengeance can ask or fortune grant!"

On entering the cell—and it was the first time he had done so since her recovery—even the callous nature of the oppressor was touched by the ravages which disease had made in the person of Lillian. Her features were pale—as if life and death were struggling for mastery, and the latter all but victor. The brilliancy of her dark eyes alone remained unimpaired, and they flashed with all the scorn of virtuous indignation, though not unmixed with terror, when the wily Hindoo presented himself before her.

"Don't leave me," she whispered to the Nautch girl, who guessed what the visit of the banker forebode. "I was kind to you once, and you loved me. Pray do not leave me," she repeated; "at least, till I am dead."

Kehoda hesitated; despite her jealousy of her former mistress, and mad passion for our hero, something like a feeling of pity was awakened in her breast.

Al Moorad motioned her a second time to quit the cell.

"Why am I not obeyed?" he demanded.

"The chief Brahmin placed me here," replied the girl.

"Do I not speak by his authority?" exclaimed the banker. "Have you forgotten the condition on which he spared your forfeit life—forfeit by your love for one who mocked and scorned you?"

The momentary feeling of commiseration for her former mistress faded in the heart of his hearer.

"Will you tempt his wrath again?" added the speaker. "Have you so soon forgotten the doom which a word, a look may recall?"

Kehoda shuddered at the recollection, and, drawing her saffron-coloured veil over her features, silently glided through the still open door of the cell, which Al Moorad closed after her.

He could not fasten it, the bolts being only on the outward side.

No sooner did she find herself alone with her oppressor than a sensation of calm amounting to confidence replaced the terror which Lillian had previously felt. It seemed as if her guardian angel whispered that he was watching over her.

"You remember my last visit?" said the banker, addressing her.

"Alas! yes."

"And the offer I made you?"

"That too."

"Well, then," said Al Moorad, struck by her collected manner, which he could not understand, "I await your answer."

"What answer can a Christian maiden give to such an offer?" replied his prisoner. "It is an insult to have heard, it would be pollution to dwell upon it."

"You brave me, then!" muttered the licentious ruffian, trying to work himself into a frenzy of passion, which might excuse the violence he meditated.

"No," replied Lillian. "I would appeal to your reason and mercy. Look upon me—compare me with the girl whom you first saw, surrounded by loving friends, happy in their affection, in her own grateful basking in the sunshine of existence, and then ask yourself what you have made me. You have deprived me of these blessings," she added, "and yet I can forgive you."

"Forgive me!" repeated Al Moorad, astonished at the tone her words had taken.

"On one condition."

He repeated her words.

"I am dying. Restore me to my friends—let my last sigh be drawn in the presence of those I love, and—"

"Never!" interrupted the Hindoo.

"Let me die in peace, then," exclaimed the captive, with a look of resignation. "Seek not to trample on a broken flower. Why persecute me? why attempt to sully the last remaining drops in the all but exhausted cup of life?"

"What!" exclaimed the banker, mockingly, "abandon the hope for which I have risked wealth, and it may be, safety; resign it when the fulfilment is within my reach? Never; such cold-blooded virtue may exist in Europe's passionless sons—the children of the East are strangers to it."

"Kill me," said Lillian, throwing herself at his feet; "death has no terrors, compared with dishonour. Kill me, and I will call it mercy; a blow, a single blow, will suffice. The thread of life is so nearly broken."

"It will hold, at least," was the brutal rejoinder, "until I have made you my wife according to the custom of this country."

Her persecutor attempted to seize her, and doubtless would have proceeded to yet further violence had not the door been suddenly dashed open by our hero, who had preceded his companions. Richard Tyrrell had heard the despairing shriek which echoed through the vaulted passages; the next instant Lillian lay senseless on his manly breast, and Al Moorad prostrate at his feet.

"Saved!" he exclaimed, pressing her with convulsive joy. "Angel of purity, look up—revive!—bless me with the assurance that you live!"

Lillian faintly murmured his name.

So absorbed were the feelings of our hero by the piteous scene he had witnessed, that he forgot for an instant the presence of the cowardly aggressor, who by this time had recovered from his confusion, and silently drawn a weapon from his girdle.

The sword, however, and the hand that grasped it, speedily fell beneath a blow which Jack Manders—who was the first to follow his benefactor—inflicted, severing the arm at the wrist.

Al Moorad uttered a loud cry; before he could repeat it his voice was silenced for ever.

Surrounded by his faithful friends, our hero succeeded in bearing his still senseless burden through the throng of Brahmins, who by this time had gathered to prevent their escape. Fortunately they were unarmed, and the fugitives succeeded in once more reaching the secret entrance by which they had penetrated.

This time, however, their enemies followed.

The rescued victim of lust and crime was in brave hands, and had brave hearts to defend her. Jack Manders, when he recognised her pale features as she lay more like a corpse than a living thing in the arms of her lover, forgot hunger, thirst—all that he had endured, and fought with the fury, if not the strength of the lion. Not a Hindoo braved a second blow; and when his sword broke in his blood-stained hands, the shots of his revolver told with fearful execution.

Neither were Mark Rayner and the lieutenant idle.

"Where will this passage lead to?" exclaimed the former, when he found they had entered a different one to that they came by.

"No matter where," replied our hero, greatly excited; "Heaven is visibly on our side, and will direct our steps."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

THE editor is in receipt of a large number of letters from all parts of the country, and from individuals of different positions in life, all young, urgently pressing the question—How are we to improve? In them the desire to be something better than they are has already been called forth. They feel their deficiency of education, they aspire to knowledge, and they seek to advance their position in life. Their ambition is laudable. It is a bad sign when people are supinely satisfied—not willing to strive for anything beyond them; going through their ordinary labour with the routine of cattle, and, like the cattle, caring only to satisfy their appetites and to sleep. We have heard this called contentment. If it be true contentment, give us discontent. We require emulation. Without this we can make no advancement. The sluggish brain must be awakened and set in motion; the sluggish heart must be made to palpitate with a more rapid action; and the sluggish body must be roused into exertion.

In numerous instances this has been done. The mind has been set a-thinking; the heart has felt the power of emulation; the body has been subjugated to the high authority of the soul. But how to act, what to attempt first, in order to proceed—these are the questions which agitate the breast of the youthful aspirant. They write to the editor of this journal, freely, openly; and our interest is awakened by the perusal of their letters. They are earnest. They are real. They are important. This "hand" in a cotton-mill—this apprentice in the shop—this worker at forge or bench—these toilers, earning bread by the sweat of their brow, are fired with a noble ambition, and what are they to do?

We offer a few plain practical remarks on this topic, endeavouring, without alluding to them by name, to meet the peculiar difficulties of a large number of our correspondents.

First of all, take stock of your inner self. How much or how little do you know already? What sort of education have you received? Can you read well? Can you write tolerably? do you know anything of figures? It is evident from the letters of several of our correspondents, as well as from the statements which they make, that of writing they know little, and of spelling, less. A casual observer might arrive at the conclusion that the writers of some of these letters were incapable of any intellectual effort. But the conclusion would be unwarranted and unjust. It would be unjust because the most illiterate may become learned, and because these ill-spelt, ill-written letters contain sentiments and expressions which indicate very considerable ability, which show that the writers have both good sense and good principles, that they are wanting not in wisdom but in knowledge.

Now, in taking stock of your inner self, ascertain what education, commonly so called, you have received. What do you know? What can you do? In what particulars are you chiefly deficient? As it is necessary to make a solid foundation before any important superstructure can be raised, so is it necessary for you to begin with the groundwork before you attempt any of the higher departments of education. Can you read and write with accuracy and facility? People are often mistaken about their acquaintance with both these arts. Do not fall into the same error. Spare no pains in reading so as thoroughly to understand what you read, and in writing, that you may express yourself in accordance with the grammatical structure of our language. Master the English grammar. This is of great importance to every youth who aspires to improve himself. And this insures not only a present but an ulterior advantage. It will help you to comprehend, far more readily than would otherwise be the case, the structure of foreign languages. Besides acquainting yourself with English grammar, familiarise yourself with an English dictionary. Never mind the trouble or the slow progress you may make at first. Go on steadily with your work, and speed will be gradually attained. In reading the compositions of some authors, you meet with words about the meaning of which you are uncertain. Do not continue in that dubious state. Turn to your dictionary and discover their meaning. In writing, it sometimes happens you are uncertain as to the spelling of a word. Do not hazard an experiment in orthography. Turn to your dictionary and make sure of what you are about. This seems exceedingly simple; but, simple as it is, how many neglect to do anything of the sort. They guess at the meaning of words, and spell them as they think they must be spelt; and so they fail to comprehend an author, and make their own ignorance apparent in every letter they write. Now, those who desire to improve themselves must resolve on hard work; and the hardest work they are almost sure to encounter at the outset of their journey.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XV.

At the next lesson, George said he wished to examine his pupil in the rules he had given him about the terminations, because, added he, "by recollecting that words with such and such final syllables are the same in both languages, you are not only able to furnish yourself with a great many words but to understand a vast number that you will meet with in French books, without the trouble and delay of referring to a dictionary."

After questioning Robert as to what he recollected on this subject, and finding that he had been very attentive, the teacher proceeded to the subject of the gender of nouns.

"To-day," said he, "we proceed to the study of feminine terminations. In the first place, recollect that substantives ending in x, eur, ion, and also in son, when the s is preceded by a vowel, are feminine. For instance, la paix, the peace; la chaleur, the heat; la nation, the nation; la maison, the house. But this rule has exceptions, and here they are: le crucifix, the crucifix; le choix, the choice; le flux, the flux; le reflux, the reflux; le prix, the price; l'auteur, the author; le bonheur, the happiness; le cœur, the heart; le dishonneur, the dishonour; l'équateur, the equator; l'honneur, the honour; le labeur, the labour; le malheur, the misfortune; les larmes, the tears; le bastion, the bastion; un champion, a champion; un lampion, a lamp; un million, a million; un scorpion, a scorpion; le septentrion, the north; le blazon, heraldry; un gazon, a green turf; l'horizon, the horizon; un oison, a gosling; le poison, the poison; un tison, a brand.

"I advise you, Robert," said George, "to commit these exceptions to memory. Though not very interesting in themselves, they will acquire an interest when you consider that the recollecting them is a step towards a correct knowledge of the French language. To attain this, it would be very silly in you to grudge a couple of hours' attentive study to writing exercises or learning rules, words, or sentences by heart. Remember how many, for the sake of acquiring French, leave their comfortable homes and dear friends, and sojourn for a twelvemonth or more on the continent. How much expense, trouble, and anxiety do those young people spare their parents, by diligently acquiring at home a language it is so desirable they should know."

"I hope," said Robert, anxiously, "that you do not think I grudge the time I am devoting to my French studies. I find in them one of my greatest pleasures."

"I am delighted to hear you say so, Robert," replied George; "and I have every reason to be satisfied with your attention and progress. The observations I made had no other object than to reconcile you to those details which belong to the grammars of all languages, and which certainly would be tedious but for the consideration of the advantage which familiarity with them must obtain for us. Your reply has quite re-assured me. I find you are not impatient of details; therefore I am confident of your success."

"We were speaking about the feminine terminations of substantives: add the following to the list you have already made:—

"Those nouns are feminine which terminate in té, tié, ée, ie, ue, ace, ade, ude, anse, ence, anse, ense, ière, ure, lle, mme, nne, rre, sse, tle; for instance:—la piété, the piety; la pensée, the thought; la vie, the life; la vue, the sight; la glace, the ice. The exceptions are, however, numerous, and as they consist of useful words, we will make of them to-day's vocabulary. Of course, you will recollect that all these you are about to write are masculine, since they are exceptions to the feminine."

"E mute has been considered a feminine termination, but there are so many exceptions that the rule falls to the ground. However, there are more feminine words ending in e mute than masculine ones. After all, rules respecting the genders of inanimate things are merely helps. It is through reading, and through familiarity with the language, that you will overcome the difficulty introduced by rendering masculine and feminine things in reality neither the one nor the other."

"In the exercise you are to prepare for me, do not fail to observe, Robert," said George, "that the (f) or (m) is only added to those nouns, the gender of which has not been made quite evident in the preceding rules; also remember that in most of the examples the definite article is to be used in French, though omitted in English."

CONTINUATION OF

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

How pleased I am. Here we are at Dieppe. Where is the best hotel? There are several that are very good. May I venture to ask you to point out the best? I want to be comfortable, as we say in our country. In that case go to the Victoria Hotel. In what direction is it? It is on the quay. I will send some one to conduct you there. Ah! Our passports are wanted. Here they are. Whence do you come? Where are you going? We come from London, and we are going to Paris. Ah! All right. You have had your passport signed at the French embassy? Yes; I know it is all in good order. The custom-house officers ask if you have anything to declare. I have two articles liable to duty; you will find them on the top of my trunk. Que je suis content. Nous voici à Dieppe. Où est le meilleur hôtel? Il y en a plusieurs qui sont fort bons. Est-ce que j'ose vous prier de m'indiquer le meilleur? Je veux être confortable, comme on dit chez-nous. En ce cas allez à l'hôtel de la Reine Victoria. De quel côté est-ce? C'est sur le quai. Je vous y ferais conduire. Ah! On demande nos passeports. Les voici. D'où venez-vous? Où allez-vous? Nous venons de Londres, et nous allons à Paris. Ah! C'est bon. Vous avez fait viser votre passe-port à l'ambassade de France? Oui; je sais bien que c'est tout en règle. Les douaniers demandent si vous avez quelque chose à déclarer. J'ai deux objets soumis aux droits; vous les trouverez en haut de ma malle.

OF THE SOUND È.

The sound è, with the grave accent over the e, is nearly similar to that of the English e in ever, an abbreviation for ever, &c. This sound has several slight shades of variation, but so difficult to describe and to perceive in pronouncing, that we will not mention them here; it belongs to a teacher to illustrate them to his pupils.

The same sound is produced by the following combinations of letters; ai, ei, aie, es, ait, aïs, ès, ets, er, es, o, see the preceding sound; as in the words aide, help;

* Il y en a, translated there are, would be literally he there of them has. With us this would be absurd; but in French it is an elegant, concise mode of expression. The use of y is explained apart. En means of them; and the pupil (to speak like a native) should use this word as often as possible. Example: "I have some of them," J'en ai. "Give me some of them," Donnez-m'en.

† Chez-nous is an expressive word for home; but, used by any one abroad, it may be made to signify our country. ‡ Y is one of the most useful words (if a letter can be called a word) in the whole French language. The exact translation of it is there; but it always implies the preposition to. For instance: J'y vais, "I am going there, or to that place." Mettez-y du sucre, "Put there some sugar;" or, "Put some sugar to it." I also renders our preposition of with a pronoun: Pensez-y, "Think of it." Ya-t-il beaucoup de monde, sentence, and asks a question: Ya-t-il beaucoup de monde, "Is there much company?" or, literally translated, "There has he much company?"—the t being merely used for the sake of the sound.

90 5 1 5 0 5 5

 (plural); il aimait, he loved; j'aimais, I loved;
 1 5 0 5 0 5 5
accès, access; secret, secret; secrets, secrets; mer, sea.

The sound ê is also produced by the letter e, without the grave accent, when in the same syllable this letter e is followed by a consonant which is pronounced; as in the words, bec, sep, set, enfer, in which the consonants c, p, l, r, are sounded.

OF THE SOUND ê.

The sound ê, with the circumflex accent, resembles that of the letter e, in the words there, where, when these words are pronounced with great emphasis.

This sound is of the same nature as the preceding ê, but a little broader, and requires the mouth to be a little more open; it results from the suppression of the letter s in the words where it belongs; as mesme, now même: estes, now êtes, &c.; and is intended to preserve to those words the same pronunciation they had before.

This sound ê is also produced by âi, as in the words ainé, the eldest; faîte, the top of a house, &c.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XIV. MECHANICS OF FLUIDS.

AIR PUMP.

383.—What is an AIR PUMP?—It is a contrivance by means of which the air confined within a vessel can be removed from it, and a vacuum obtained.

384. Its essential parts are represented in Fig. 29—what are they?—An upright cylinder, C, F, into which a piston, P, is fitted air tight.

Fig. 29.

385. Is this piston solid?—It has an opening at its centre, covered by a valve that opens upward. There is another valve opening upward, fitted to an orifice at E, in the bottom of the pump.

386. Where does this orifice in the bottom of the pump lead to?—It leads, by means of a small pipe, D, to the vessel, A, from which the air is to be removed. This vessel is called the Receiver.

387. Suppose the piston is pressed down to the bottom of the pump, what happens when it is drawn up?—The pressure of the air in the pipe opens the lower valve, and air flows through the opening from the receiver, and fills the empty space which the piston leaves behind it.

388. What happens when the piston is forced down again?—All the air that is below it passes through the open valve in the piston, and mixes with the external air.

389. When the piston is raised again, what takes place?—More air flows out of the receiver; and, in this way, by repeatedly raising and depressing the piston, the air may be nearly all withdrawn from the receiver.

390. Whenever the piston is raised, the pressure of the air upon it has to be overcome—how is the power requisite for this obtained?—In some pumps by means of a long lever; but the more common expedient is to combine two pumps in such a manner that the pressures on the two pistons will balance each other.

391. What was the celebrated experiment performed by Otto Von Guericke, the inventor of the air pump?—It was an experiment made by him to prove that the pressure of the air acts in all directions, and not only downwards, as had been previously asserted.

392. Describe it briefly.—Two hollow hemispheres of copper were nicely fitted to each other, and the space within them exhausted of air, through a cock by means of an air pump. These hemispheres are represented in Fig. 30.

Fig. 30.

393. What was then done?—It was then found that the hemispheres were held together so firmly by the pressure of the external air, that several horses could not exert sufficient force to separate them.

PUMPS FOR RAISING WATER.

394. What does Fig. 31 represent?—The common sucking pump.

395. Describe it.—It consists of two tubes of unequal size, one on the top of the other, D, F, and an air-tight piston, P, that can be moved up and down in the upper tube, D, by applying the power, B, to the piston rod. There are also two valves opening upward, one at S, and the other in the piston.

396. What is the use of the valves?—They allow the air or water to pass up through the opening over which they are placed, but prevent it from going down again.

397. When the piston is worked up and down, what is the effect?—The air is first pumped out; as it is removed, the water rises in the lower pipe, then into the body of the pump, and finally gets above the piston and is delivered at the spout, E.

398. What causes the water to rise in the pump in proportion as the air in it is removed?—The pressure of the air outside of the pump on the surface of the water in the well.

399. Is there another form of pump?—There is, called the Forcing Pump. The piston is solid, and the upper valve is differently arranged.

400. How does it operate?—The air is pumped out, and the water rises to the piston, just as in the sucking pump.

401. What takes place after that?—Whenever the piston is forced down, the water below it is driven up the pipe, and through the valve.

402. Does not the water pass from this pipe into a closed vessel; what is this vessel called?—An air vessel.

403. For what purpose is it used?—The water that is forced into it crowds the air in it to the upper part, and this condensed air pressing on the surface of the water impels it up the ascending pipe in a constant stream.

404. What kind of pump is used in the FIRE ENGINE?—The forcing pump; the long handles which the firemen move up and down work two force pumps.

405. Into what do these two pumps force the water?—Into an air-tight box. From this it is driven out through the pipe and hose in a constant stream.

BLIND MINNIE.

THE excitement of the conversation we recorded in the last chapter exhausted the sufferer, and it was some time before he was sufficiently recovered to thank his friend and adopted brother for the promise he had made.

At length, Frank arose suddenly, and, approaching the bed, said—

"My dear fellow, are you strong enough to talk a little more with me?"

"Yes, I feel very much better to-night," answered Howard.

"One thing gives me anxiety," continued Frank. "Your family are proud, and unwilling to receive aid from strangers. Your sister has inherited that pride; this is evident from her former letters to you. I fear she will refuse to recognise my right to claim a brother's privilege of protecting her. How shall I be able to persuade her to consider me thus?"

"I have also thought of that, Frank," said the other; "but I think we can overcome their objections. The steamer which brings them arrives this week. I hope to linger to embrace them once again before I go to rejoin my blessed mother. I will tell them of the ties between us, ties which your long tender care of me has rendered even more indissoluble than those which nature alone forms; and, with my dying breath, I will enjoin upon you and upon them mutual protection and affection, that you shall be unto them a son and brother, and that they shall cherish you as such. They will not refuse at first for my sake, nor afterwards through confidence and love for you yourself. Or, should I not live to see them, I will write to them; and to true noble souls like theirs and yours the expressed wishes of the dead will be sacred."

"'Tis a well-thought-of plan; God grant it success!" responded his friend, warmly. "And now let me arrange your pillows, that you may sleep, for you have been gazing at me until your eyes must ache; and you must rest, if you would keep your strength."

The next morning, Frank, at his friend's request, placed by his bedside writing materials, which Howard said he should use as the day advanced; but when, during the day, Frank returned home, he found the writing materials untouched, and his friend lying peaceful and cold. He summoned assistance, and every effort was made to restore life to the rigid limbs, but in vain; the spirit had fled, apparently without a struggle or a pang.

It was deemed advisable to inter the body as soon as possible; and, a few hours later, our hero returned to his now companionless chamber with a desolation of heart such as he had never before felt.

As he sat lonely in the dim twilight, the thought of those who were so soon to arrive and claim his care came over him. How should he meet them? Would they trust him, and receive him instead of the relative they expected? How should he announce to them their heart-rending sorrow? Would not the shock be too great for the feeble old man and the delicate girl to bear, unprepared as they were for such intelligence? During these distressing reflections, a plan flashed upon his mind like a ray of light. Might he not pass for his friend, meet the old father as his own son, and then, after they became settled in their new home, break the sad truth to them gradually? He might easily do it, as Mr. Howard had not seen his son since the latter was a mere child. He was now nearly blind, and very weak. Minnie was but six years old when her brother had left them. She was now blind, and could not detect the difference between her brother and himself. He would do this, and acquire, by his devoted attention and care, the right to protect and console them; then he would undeceive them.

Reader, can you, from your heart, condemn him quite that he received this suggestion, not as the temptation of an evil spirit, but as an illumination from heaven? that when, on the next day, the Victoria entered the port, he mastered his emotion, and prepared to meet the new-comers as their rightful protector? that he embraced the old man with the warmth and respect of a son? that he pressed the young girl to his heart with a tenderness which their mutual loss, although unknown to her, rendered a sacred and genuine feeling with him? that when her soft voice called him "brother," his lips tremblingly responded "my sister?"

The old man had been so much weakened by the long and fatiguing overland route that he could not walk without support. Frank lifted him to a carriage, while Minnie followed, led by their faithful servant, Ann. This good woman had entered into the service

"IT IS I,—BE NOT AFRAID."

FRIEND, in every woe and care,
 Hearer of our inmost prayer,
 Which at dawn of morning gray
 Ere the shadows fleet away,
 All unclothed by language stems,
 And before Thy footstool kneels,
 Friend Eternal, Friend Divine,
 Be our warmest praises Thine.

O'er this world's tempestuous tide,
 Be our pole-star and our guide;
 Through the suns, wild and dark,
 Thundering make the lonely bark.
 Tho' the tempest wake in dread,
 Tho' the wrecks be round us spread,
 Let Thy promise be our aid,

of Mr. Howard about two years before Minnie's affliction, and had become so much attached to her that, when her brother had written that they should bring with them an English attendant, she had offered to leave her home and friends to accompany her dear young lady to India.

On arriving at the apartments prepared for them, the old man was placed upon a couch, which Frank made comfortable for him by pillows, and then, while Ann attended to the bringing and placing of their trunks, seated himself at some distance, and watched Minnie with astonishment as she hovered around her father, gently smoothing his thin hair, passing her soft hand across his brow, or speaking to him in her gentle voice. Howard had often spoken of his lovely sister, Frank, therefore, expected to see a delicate, pretty blonde; but for the purity and angelic type of face, for the holy expression of serenity and love of the brow and closed eyelids—for the smile of ineffable peace which ever hovered over her features—he was totally unprepared. Frank gazed upon her with a look of almost terror: for her impression upon him was as a vision from heaven, for which there could be no home upon earth. He remained speechless and bewildered until Minnie, feeling her way to where he sat, caressingly passed her hands over his face, and exclaimed—

"Brother, what a strong, large man you have grown! The boy of my childish recollections was so small and delicate, that I can scarcely realise that this great man can be my little brother. But why are you so silent?" she asked, after a pause, as he made no reply. "Talk to me!"

"I am lost in admiration of you," answered he, rousing himself and pressing her hands to his lips.

"Ah, now I know you are my brother, you silly boy. Just so you used to behave to me years ago. Do you know, for a long time after you left us, I used seriously to miss the incense of adoration you were so constantly offering me? 'Tis well you left home, for you would have made a very vain, silly girl of me. But do tell me when you will bring your friend to visit us. You wrote so much about him, your second self, that I long to know him."

Frank started up, and pushing her aside, paced the room rapidly. What should he answer? He looked upon the pallid face of the old man, who lay weak and helpless, and who must so soon die, then upon the wondering young girl, whose fragile frame looked as though a severe shock might break it.

"Is it not my duty," thought he, "to continue for the present my false character, to spare this dying father the knowledge that his few remaining days on earth are soothed by a stranger's care? that he must leave his Minnie without one relative on earth? My vow to his son, my grateful affection, could not console him. Does not Minnie herself need all her strength to bear the loss which must so soon come upon her? She will need a brother's sheltering arm. They are so happy now in the belief that I belong to them as truly by nature as by affection! No, I must not undeceive them—not yet. God will surely pardon the deceit in such distressing circumstances."

"Why are you thus agitated, my brother?" cried the young girl. "Pray, come to me—speak to me."

By a violent effort, conquering his emotion, he approached her, and answered, in a low, broken voice—

"Minnie, my sister, our brother we shall never again see on earth. The all-merciful Father has taken him, I trust, into a life of eternal and infinite joy; but he has left me very sad and desolate."

"Oh, my brother, how mournful! Did you then love him so deeply?"

"Love him? Better than aught else on earth. Minnie, pardon me, not that you are less beloved; but for years he has been my constant companion and guide, for his clear judgment saw the right at a glance, and his pure, strong soul had power to strengthen and soothe mine when I felt restless and weary. We had never parted for a single day. We were bound together by the closest ties of sympathy and mutual love."

"Alas, how sadly you must miss him! But when did he die, and how?"

"Yesterday he left me, and—"

"How fortunate that we have arrived so soon!" interrupted Minnie. "Can we not assist to make your life less lonely without him? Dear Frank," she added, fervently, throwing her arms around him, "I may not fill his place in your heart or life; but oh, I will love you better than he could have done! for I will love you as friend, sister, mother, all combined."

"God bless you!" ejaculated Frank. "But will you never leave me? You are so lovely! Oh, promise me that you will not forsake me so long as we both live!"

"Brother, how can you doubt that? I do promise I will never leave you until you send me away." Then, in a tone of sadness, she added: "Why, Frank, to whom should I go? a poor blind girl. Where should I seek other protection?"

"You shall never need other, my sweet sister, so long as heaven grants me strength."

"I am sure of that, Frank, and I rejoice to be dependent upon you; but even a weak blind girl need not be utterly helpless. I have no doubt I can procure a few pupils for the harp, and thus aid you a little."

"Minnie, you insult me!" exclaimed Frank, in a tone of distress. "Do you not believe me capable and willing to support you, without requiring labour from those delicate little fingers?"

"Oh, brother, I did not mean to wound you! I only would—"

"Minnie," he interrupted, seizing her hands, "do not speak of such things. For the present, at all events, your duties are around that couch, they will not be light or easy. I shall not be able to aid you much in them. Are you strong enough to tend alone that dying old man?"

"Dying? Frank, do you think him dying? Is there no hope of his recovery?" asked the young girl, eagerly.

"I fear not," answered Frank; "but while life remains, there is still hope. Be not downhearted. You must keep yourself cheerful and strong for his sake," but, as he said this, he glanced doubtfully at the slight figure beside him.

"I will! I will! Poor, dear, old father!" murmured the young girl, in a sorrowful voice.

"And now, Minnie, I must leave you. Can you do without my assistance?"

"Oh, yes, brother! My good Ann is with me," answered Minnie; "you forget her. But you will surely return to us to-night! Father has been so feeble that he has had no opportunity of talking with you; and we have not yet spoken of our mother," she added, turning her sightless face toward the couch where the old man lay sleeping quietly as an infant.

Frank returned, with a bursting heart, to his own chamber. There, where each object which met his eye was sacred from association with his lost friend, where space itself seemed filled with his presence, the young man knelt and prayed God's pardon for the deceit he had been tempted to practise towards the father and sister of his friend, that it might work good, and not evil unto them. He again renewed his vow to serve and protect them until they should be beyond his aid, and besought the all-wise Father to instruct him how he might best and most faithfully perform that vow, that when the proper moment came for him to cast aside his disguise, strength might be granted him to make the confession, and power to soothe and console the sorrow he must cause. And no monitor within warned him that now was the time, that he ought at once to confess his deceit, even at the risk, nay, almost with the certainty, that the sudden blow would hasten the death of the old father, and leave the young girl desolate and alone (for the young man judged rightly, that his protection, under such circumstances, she would not accept), that a continuation in deception, no matter for what end, was unpardonable in the sight of God. On the contrary, he arose strengthened in his course, and with renewed courage to stifle the emotion which had so nearly betrayed him in his first interview with those who were henceforth to look upon him as their sole earthly stay. For their sakes, he must, at least for a few months, wear the mask he had donned.

Frank returned in the evening to his newly-adopted relatives, and listened, with apparent calmness, to the old man as he spoke of his lost Minnie, his wife—the only subject which had now power to rouse him from the mental weakness into which long physical suffering had thrown him.

Neither father nor daughter could see the changes which rapidly passed over the young man's face when the old man would say: "My son, your mother," or when the fair girl laid her gentle arm around his neck, and said: "Oh, brother, she loved you so well! One of her last wishes was that we might be again united, that our father might have the happiness, which was denied her, of seeing you again. Her last breath blest you!" then, bending her head, allowed her tears silently to flow, a weakness in which, despite his self-restraint, he could not help joining her.

Days passed into weeks, weeks to months, and still old Mr. Howard, although more helpless daily, lingered under the watchful care of his son and fair daughter. The physician, Dr. Hall, could do nothing for him; nevertheless, he persisted in paying almost daily visits to the old man. The true object of these visits was, however, the gentle girl, who sat so patiently at her sick father's side, busy, in her quiet way, with her needle, which she used with dexterity, notwithstanding her blindness, or moved noiselessly around the bed or through the chamber, performing various little necessary duties of a housekeeper with the precision and neatness of a keen-sighted matron. The young doctor would sometimes forget his patients for hours together, watching the quiet motions of her slight form, or listening to her soft, heart-touching voice. At times, he would unconsciously gaze upon her pure face with an adoration which, although she could not see it (by that species of magnetic influence which, inexplicable, is still undeniable), she felt, and which would bring the blush to her cheeks, tingling them with the pure hue which the morning sun spreads over the freshly fallen snow upon a mountain side.

They had already been nearly six months in Bombay when, about sunset one evening, the old man, after having lain for several hours in a state of unconsciousness, called his children to him, intrusted Minnie anew to her brother's care, blessed them both, and requested Frank to read to him certain portions of Scripture, after which, he desired Minnie to sing a hymn which her mother had composed and taught her. The poor girl seated herself upon the bed beside him, and, taking his hand within hers, began in a trembling voice. Frank saw that the old man was dying, and, ere she had sung the concluding line of the hymn, his spirit passed away.

Minnie lay for some time speechless, tearless, embracing the stiff form of her father; then, with a sudden burst of grief, she threw her arms around Frank, who stood at the bedside.

"Sister!" exclaimed he, pressing her fervently to him, "we stand alone now! We must be all in all to each other. Oh, love me, Minnie!"

"Brother, whom have I now but you to love?"

"Minnie, will you cling to me, love me, whatever the future may bring?"

Her tears choked her utterance; but a fond embrace answered him.

"God in heaven bless you, my Minnie!" he said, in a tone which was almost a groan, as he thought of the startling, mournful revelation he must make to her ere many hours.

Meanwhile he must attend to the present emergencies. With the assistance of Ann and her friend, the landlord's wife, all arrangements were made for the burial, and the next day, followed by Frank, Dr. Hall, and the brothers Robson, the old man was laid by the side of his son; this fact was, however, known to Frank alone.

Poor Minnie's grief was so intense that Frank's heart was wrung. He could not summon fortitude to add to her misery, or rather to withdraw from her her only consolation, which was her trust in him.

Thus a week passed, at the end of which, Dr. Hall sought our hero, told him he loved his sister, and begged his aid in proffering his suit. His aid! Frank was paralysed. The idea of Minnie's marrying had never entered his mind. The young physician spoke eloquently of his deep love for her, of the unceasing tenderness with which his affection should make bright her earthly path; each word found a wildly responsive echo in Frank's heart also. His own feelings were for the first time revealed to him. Now the truth flashed upon him; his love for Minnie was not the brother's love he had imagined, but a yearning, jealous devotion, which, during the intimate intercourse and seclusion of their life during the past few months, had taken deep root, and spread through every fibre of his heart with a strength which now overpowered him. Its stormy throbbing choked his voice as he attempted to stammer some reply; then, with a deep groan, he fell senseless.

As soon as he was sufficiently recovered, he abruptly left the astonished physician, rushed to his own home, and, passing rapidly through the room where Minnie sat, heedless of her question, "Brother, what has brought you home so early?" locked himself in his own chamber.

Who can picture the anguish with which his soul was torn? He raved wildly, until recalled to reason by Minnie's voice at the door, beseeching him, in tones of terror, to tell her what misfortune had so distressed him. The sound of the beloved voice sent a shudder through his frame; then, conquering himself, he replied, in a hollow tone, "Don't be alarmed, Minnie. Leave me alone for a while. I will come and speak with you afterwards."

Sorrowfully, the poor girl obeyed.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE REV. ANDREW REED, D.D. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

REV. ANDREW REED, D.D.

ENGLAND is pre-eminent among the nations of the earth: her people are in every land, her ships are upon every sea, her influence is felt in both hemispheres. It is no idle boast that upon her dominions the sun never sets. But there is one striking peculiarity which distinguishes England from other countries—she is essentially the land of charities. Benevolence is her characteristic. Far beyond the victories she has achieved, the colonies she has planted, the commerce she has extended, the trade she has opened, and the prosperity she has won, is the fact that England has accomplished more for the poor, the afflicted, and the oppressed than any other nation in the world.

Throughout the length and breadth of our land the practical influence of English benevolence is exhibited in asylums of every description, to meet the wants of all the objects of our charity. If we cannot unloose the tongue of the dumb, restore the ears of the deaf, and open the eyes of the blind, we can do much to alleviate the sufferings of the afflicted in blind schools and deaf and dumb asylums, and provide for the wants of those who stand so much in need of sympathy and assistance. Though we cannot restore reason to the maniac, nor impart intelligence to the idiot, there is much that we can accomplish for the comfort and safety of the former and the affectionate nurture of the latter. Though we can neither ward off the approach of old age nor extreme poverty, we can provide harbours of refuge for those who have been long buffeted in the stormy voyage of life. And though it is not within our power to stay the shaft of death, and to preserve the lives of parents so that they may train up their children in the path of rectitude, we may take the parents' place, and with tender solicitude provide for those destitute orphans.

To help the helpless is a duty incumbent upon us. England has been singularly faithful to this obligation. She has given her wealth with a liberal hand. She has sought out objects of benevolence, without waiting for misery and disease to be thrust before her sight. She has foreseen the evil and provided the remedy. Englishmen and Englishwomen have ever been ready for this good work. They have not spared their own personal exertions; they have not been content to make their charity simply to consist in a banker's check—they have worked hard and given time and toil in addition to their money. It was said by the great Napoleon that we English were a nation of shopkeepers, but we have earned a better title—we are a nation of philanthropists.

Amongst English philanthropists the name of Dr. Andrew Reed deserves a high place. He has spent his life in efforts of a purely benevolent character; and to him, and to his exertions, we as a people are deeply indebted. The victories of the soldier; the successful diplomacy of the statesman; the talent of the orator; the genius of the painter and of the poet, elicit our warmest admiration. But while their brilliant triumphs attract our attention and call forth our applause, we sometimes forget those quiet, unobtrusive workers who are building up our national prosperity on the best and surest foundations. Amongst these quiet workers we count our philanthropists, and in their ranks we are ready to accord a distinguished position to the subject of our sketch.

To the exertions of Dr. Andrew Reed we owe several of our most useful charitable institutions, amongst which may be mentioned the following:—the London Orphan Asylum, Clapton, established 1813, having been in operation five-and-forty years, maintaining, clothing, and educating during that period between two and three thousand children.

The Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, established 1827, consequently it has been in operation thirty-one years, during which period it has maintained, clothed, and educated from early infancy—some from the age of six weeks—till thirteen or fourteen years old, nearly two thousand children.

The Asylum for Fatherless Children, Stamford-hill, established 1844, thus being in active operation for fourteen years, and providing for destitute orphans a home and parental care.

Asylum for Idiots, established 1847, for the care and education of the idiot and imbecile—making a wide distinction between the two classes—and, by the gradually extended application of all the combined resources of an infirmary, a school, and a sanitarium, preparing the patients, as far as possible, for the duties and enjoyments of life. The operations of this institution—originally commenced at Highgate and Colchester, and afterwards at Reigate, Surrey—have been recently extended, and a very handsome and commodious building erected at Reigate.

The Royal Hospital, for patients discharged from the general hospitals as incurable, is another instance of Dr. Reed's charitable and successful exertions.

The most recent success achieved by this benevolent veteran in connection with other equally charitable gentlemen, is the establishment of a new orphan asylum at Coulsden, near Croydon, the opening of which was celebrated only a few days since, in the presence of a numerous and influential company, the Earl of Carlisle presiding.

These various efforts of Dr. Reed, for the sick, the orphan, the idiot, are far beyond our praise. He, and those with whom he has been so nobly associated, have not forgotten nor neglected the obligations resting upon them, and upon us all, as God's almoners.

Dr. Reed is an Independent minister, of Wycliffe

THE CHAPEL OF TRONS, IN THE GRISONS.

Chapel, Commercial-road, London. He was born November 27th, 1788, and is, therefore, in his seventy-first year. It was originally intended that he should follow the business of a watchmaker, but his predilection for the Christian ministry was so evident that it attracted the attention of his friends, and from the Rev. Matthew Wilkes he received instruction and encouragement. He completed his education at Hackney College, and entered on the duties of the ministry, in which he has since continued to labour with eminent success. In 1819 he published a work entitled "No Fiction," which attained considerable popularity, having passed through several editions. A visit to America, undertaken at the request of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, was the occasion of another work in two volumes, which possessed the recommendation of a faithful and complete account of his tour in the New World, and was not, as so many of such books are, a caricature of the Americans.

But it is not as Independent minister, nor as the author of some successful works, that we introduce the portrait of Dr. Andrew Reed in our "Living Celebrities." We regard him as a philanthropist—as one who has accomplished great things for the helpless, the poor, and the wretched. He has through life been thus engaged, and not only has he never received a salary in any case, but has in all instances been among the largest contributors to the funds. The practical benevolence of his life is worthy, not only of our approval, but of our imitation also. The best method of showing how much we appreciate his exertions is to assist him in carrying them out; so far as it is practicable, to do as he has done, that we may make the world the better by our precepts and by our practice.

GRISONS: THE CHAPEL AT TRONS.

THE Grisons, with the exception of Berne, is the most extensive canton of Switzerland. It ranks fiftieth in the confederation; its estimated area is three thousand square miles, with a population, three-fourths of which are protestants, of nearly a hundred thousand. In the greater part of its extent, it is inclosed by the Austrian territories, but is cut off from them, as well as from the rest of Switzerland, by lofty mountain ranges. Indeed, the whole canton is one mass of mountains and valleys: there is not a single plain worthy of notice.

The Grisons comprises a number of small republics, allied with one another, but exercising independent rights. These are united into what are called Hoch Gerichte, or high jurisdictions, which are again united into three leagues, respectively denominated, the Graü Bunden (Grey League), the Gotteshaus Bund (League of the House of God), and the Zehn-gerichte (Tenth Jurisdiction League). These leagues elect the members of the Supreme Federal Legislative Council, which meets every year at Chur. Chur, Mayenfeld, and Hanz are the chief towns of the canton, but there are smaller and less important places, which, nevertheless, possess a superior attraction on account of the historical interest associated with them.

The little town of Trons is situated in the valley of Vorder Rheinthal, which beginning in the Ober Alps, descends to Coire, protecting the infancy of the Rhine to that point where it becomes navigable.

A short distance from Trons, a small chapel attracts attention; it is half covered by the venerable branches of a plane tree, the age of which, according to the tradition of the neighbourhood, is seven hundred years. At the beginning of the fifteenth century the peasants of the country, seeking for some means of escaping from the yoke of their feudal lords—whose ruined castles still crown the heights—took refuge in the forest which surrounded Trons; and in 1424 the deputies of the commoners of the valley assembled under the old plantains, formed the federation known as the Grey League, which resulted in the establishment of the Grison republic.

In 1824 the fourth jubilee of this event was celebrated at Trons. In commemoration of the circumstance, a chapel was erected in immediate proximity to the tree, and dedicated to Saint Anne. In 1836, the edifice was restored by the Swiss confederation.

The walls of the church are ornamented with two frescoes, more curious than beautiful; the first represents the Duke of Brunner and Puttinger, Abbé of Dissentis, taking the oath of federation; the second is the renewal of the oath in 1778. Over the portico is the following inscription:—"To ye who invoke liberty: Where the spirit of God is, there is liberty; our fathers trusted in Thee, Lord, and Thou didst make them free."

CHAPTER LXXI.

Domestic happiness—thou only bliss
Of paradise that has survived the fall.

BOB BLOSSOM kept his word.

Of all the sober working men, whose wives were happy women, and whose children were rosy, well fed, well clad, well taught, none could beat Bob Blossom.

There soon was plenty in the late bare cupboard, peace and love at the hearth, and trust and confidence in the heart.

Sir Astley and Mr. G. were right: the swelling with the long, hard Latin name in Apple Blossom's breast proved not to be what the parish doctor called schirrus, or cancer. It yielded promptly to the remedies prescribed; and, ere long, Apple Blossom, as blooming, plump, and merry as ever, sat at her now well furnished, well frequented stall; and Bob Blossom never wanted for a day's work, or, better still, for the will and the power to do it.

Everything now went happily on; and Ada, having heard while at Pemberton with her father, and Ellen, while at Brighton with the convalescent Mrs. Golightly, of the happy change in Bob Blossom, had sent (the same idea striking both these kind and Christian minds) money and contributions for a feast in honour of this great event.

Ada had forwarded tempting fruit and tarts, Ellen a chicken pie and a noble cake. Ada begged that Apple Blossom would take a holiday, and go by train or steamer a few miles into the country, and have a happy day with her own little household and as many of her friends as she chose; and she had forwarded the funds for this little festival.

Ellen had also sent a sum to be spent in some commemoration of the blessed change in Bob.

Apple Blossom invited Jem Goodman, the Trudges, Mrs. Posset, and, at Larky's entreaty, Lame Luke; and at that of Hope and Merry, poor Potato Heels.

Little Ness was a young lady now, and at a boarding-school, or else she, too, would have been of the party.

A party more purely happy and innocently gay never sailed up the Thames to land at Richmond.

Apple Blossom looked very buxom in the crochet cap with the pink ribbons, that cap that had so offended the precise Mrs. Golightly.

The sky was unclouded, and so were the brows and hearts of the happy holiday folk.

Jem Goodman dearly loved the country—most good people do. There was a deep and double spring of joy in his good heart. He had saved Ben Darrell from the gallows, and Bob Blossom from perdition; and as he thought how his efforts had been blessed, his heart danced for joy, and the serious Jem danced and sported with the children in the gladness of his heart.

The Trudges were very good, quiet people. They had known bitter sorrow and pinching want, for Tom Trudge had not always been a sober man, nor his wife a well-dressed, happy woman; but they were so now, for Tom Trudge was one of the temperance party, and their children were enrolled in the Band of Hope.

The elder boy, about fourteen, "Young Tom," as he was called, was a good-looking, handy lad, apprenticed to a carpenter, and on this holiday he seemed, boy as he was, as much smitten with Merry Blossom's bright eyes, black hair, rosy cheeks, and white teeth as our Larky Grigg really was with the delicate beauty of little golden-haired Hope.

As for Potato Heels, she begged so hard to have Stunning Steenie invited, that, as there had been marked symptoms of a great improvement in that quarter, he was asked to join the party, and, for a week before it came off, he and Potato Heels were busily engaged in cleaning the waistcoat, rubbing up the buttons, and mending the button-holes; and one of the teachers at the Green Fields Schools presented Potato Heels with a new pair of black cotton stockings, and Mr. Stephens himself gave her a pair of new shoes. These articles added very much to her respectability, though perhaps not to her comfort. Those used to go barefoot or slipshod do not find it so great a hardship as the being neatly shod.

Hope insisted on Meg's washing her carrot head of spiral, matted curls, and in fact her face and person; and when that wild, porcupine head of hair was brushed, oiled, parted, and plaited neatly round her head, shining like copper in the bright spring sun, and when the real colour of Meg's skin appeared after several lathers of yellow soap, and proved to be very fair—white and pink, and when Apple Blossom had given her a light print dress, which had been her own in her girlhood, and Hope had cleaned up and trimmed an old straw bonnet, washing the ribbons herself, Potato Heels, alias Carrot Meg, looked rather a pretty girl—at least, Stunning Steenie seemed to think so.

Yes, there were three pairs of young lovers at this little fête.

First, in beauty and in virtue, Hope Evermore and her Larky Grigg; next, young Tom Trudge and laughing, nut-brown Merry Blossom; and last, though not least, Stunning Steenie and—on this occasion we will not call her Potato Heels or Carrot Meg—Margaret Grimes.

Hope and Merry were very neatly dressed in pretty lilac gingham frocks and capes which Ada had made for them, and pretty straw bonnets, trimmed with white, a present from Ellen St. Ange.

Of all the gay parties that have ever floated on the fair bosom of the silver Thames to sport upon the emerald sod of Richmond Park, none were ever more truly happy. Bob Blossom felt almost as much in love with his kind, "pretty Apple Blossom" as he had done when she was Betty Blythe; and never had she respected him so much, for never had he deserved her respect so well as now that he had done more than if he had conquered an army, since he had conquered an habitual vice.

In Apple Blossom's now bright and loving eyes her Bob was a hero.

Through long after years that holiday was one of the greenest of green spots in memory's waste; and they all rose the next day the happier and the better for their delightful holiday.

CHAPTER LXXII.

She grew sick as he grew well,
Ha! ha! The wooing o't.—BURNS.

ADA and Ellen returned as soon as they possibly could to town, and to their duties at the Green Fields Ragged School.

Ada was not in her wonted spirits; she was somewhat pale and restless, but more energetic than ever in the cause of temperance and the education of the destitute.

Mrs. Golightly was perfectly recovered, and a grand event engrossed her masculine mind. Her pamphlet was on the eve of publication.

After her rencontre with Sneer and Bluster, she wisely gave up all hopes of getting any fashionable publisher to have anything to do with it.

She resolved to get it printed, and then to announce it as to be had of the author only, at 301, Jermyn-street, St. James's.

Mr. St. Ange, a widower, and a very reserved, melancholy man, an antiquarian, who lived principally in his own study and in the British Museum, but who had a great respect for intellect in woman, and a great regard for one who had been a mother to his motherless girl, hearing from Ellen of her old friend's illness, disappointments, and rencontres with the publishers, and plans for being her own bookseller, gave Ellen a cheque for two hundred pounds, saying—

"Give this to Mrs. Golightly, with my kind regards and best wishes. Tell her I have long wished and intended to offer her a tribute of respect and esteem, and of gratitude for her constant care of you, my Ellen. Now, if she is really resolved to publish her pamphlet, (and why not, since she's a very clever woman?) tell her—from one who has published a great deal, and bought his experience very dear, as one always does that priceless commodity at first hand—that the great secret of success in a literary début is advertising. Any work can be advertised into a certain degree of fame, although none but a work of merit can achieve a permanent reputation. Many an admirable work has been crushed for want of advertising; and advertising must be done boldly, freely. Homœopathic advertising is of no avail at all; it is money quite thrown away. This sum, judiciously laid out in advertising, will go far to insure the success of our old friend's pamphlet, and I am sure nothing would please her so much as a brilliant success for her 'Rights and Wrongs of Woman.'

Ellen was of the same opinion. She thanked her kind and generous father; and, fondly embracing him, hastened off to Mrs. Golightly's with his advice and his contribution.

Mrs. Golightly gladly accepted a gift which she felt she had well deserved; and the advice Mr. St. Ange had sent her through Ellen agreeing exactly with her own opinion, she hastened to avail herself of it.

One day that Ada called at Mrs. Golightly's—having vainly sought Ellen in Belgrave-square—she was surprised to see the pavement of a great part of the street near Mrs. Golightly's blocked up by cripples of every description, male and female: the lame, the halt, the blind, the deaf and dumb, the man that had no legs, the man that had one,—all were there.

As she approached, she found the passage was full of them, and that they were being fitted up with enormous placards strung over their breasts and backs; and in the brightest colours, and largest type, announcing that—

This day is published, at No. 301, Jermyn-street, St. James's,
THE RIGHTS AND WRONGS OF WOMAN.

Price One Shilling.

"You see by this assembly," said Mrs. Golightly, "that I am ready for the battle."

"But why have you collected all these cripples and afflicted creatures?" asked Ada.

"To kill two birds with one stone," replied Mrs. Golightly. "Not only will they progress so slowly that all will have time to read the placard, but ambition and charity thus go hand in hand."

In due time all the placard-bearers were despatched, armed not only with the announcement of the pamphlet, but with numbers of copies of the pamphlet.

In addition to this device, every omnibus, as Mrs. Golightly had intended, bore her advertisement inside and out; every newspaper and magazine proclaimed the publication; every dead wall, post, gate, pillar, and hoarding had it in flaming colours and gigantic letters. Railway stations, piers, shops windows were alive with it. A large van paraded it all over London, and steamers sailing up and down the Thames paraded in giant letters the words,

Mr. St. Ange's two hundred pounds did not last long; Mrs. Golightly, fired with success, embarked in the same venture the savings of her life, and Ellen and Ada contributed fifty pounds each. But the money was not thrown away. It soon returned a thousand per cent. The result of Mrs. Golightly's advertising was a brilliant success.

At the end of the third day there was not one copy left of the first edition; at the end of a month the sale had reached half a million. Mrs. Golightly was famous.

Mrs. Golightly had an account at a banker's.

Mrs. Golightly had set to work on a new pamphlet, to be brought out on the same principle as her first, and to be called, "MAN: his Bodily Strength and Mental Debility; and, How to Subdue the One and Remedy the Other." By the author of 'The Rights and Wrongs of Woman.'

Mrs. Golightly was the author of the day, whose first work had commanded the largest sale, and the before one critic had dipped his pen in honey or in gall, to write her up, or cry her down; and Sneer said to Bluster, as they sat in the little office (the memorable scene of Mrs. Golightly's spirited defence), squaring their accounts, and sipping brandy and water—

"We've missed a good thing, Bluster, hang it! That old mad woman's pamphlet's a tremendous hit. I wish we could have foreseen it. The woman wasn't half as mad as we've been. Hang it! Half a million sale! Why, we might have each set up a Brougham."

"Yes," replied Bluster; "it's a bore, that's what it is; and an ugly scar you've got on your bald head, Sneer, and always will have into the bargain. You're a marked man, my boy."

"I wish I'd taken her pamphlet. She'd have let me have it, and thank ye, too, for forty pounds down."

"And I wish I'd had her off to the station-house after that assault, that's what we ought to have done; and if that policeman hadn't been quite a new hand, he'd have insisted on taking her there. That would have ended, perhaps, by her getting into a lunatic asylum, and then we should never have heard of her pamphlet, or its confounded success."

"Well, it can't be helped now. If one has a chance in this world one hasn't 'nous' to avail oneself of it."

"Exactly; that pamphlet would have been a great hit, and we refused it, and there's a loss on every book we've lately published; and I suppose it would be no use to try to get her next."

"Oh, no; we could never come up to her figure, now; besides, between ourselves, Sneer, I'm rather afraid of her."

"Well, here's to her downfall; take another glass, my boy."

CHAPTER LXXIII.

Oh love, what is it in this world of ours,
That makes it fatal to be loved? Ah, why
With cypress branches hast thou wreathed thy bowers,
And made thy best interpreter a sigh?—BYRON.

ONE morning at breakfast, Ada read in the Times the return of Gerald St. Maur to parliament, as member for his brother's borough of Arnsdale.

The colour, which latterly had forsaken her cheek, mounted to her temples, and the water sparkled in her eyes, for she thought, "I advised him to get into parliament; perhaps it is to please me he has done this." All that day Ada was absent, and rather melancholy; she sighed often, blushed without any apparent cause, and more than once, luckily when alone, burst into tears.

Pertinette was gone. She was installed at Lady Vacant Star's, and had such a very hard place of it, with a woman of fashion who had neither heart nor mind, that she regretted the mistress who had such a taste for the kennel.

Lord Glenlonely was in better health than he had been for years. He had taken his seat in the House of Lords. He continued to receive Jem Goodman, and to follow his advice; and the destitute classes had a warm, a powerful, and an eloquent advocate in the upper House, in Lord Glenlonely.

The asylum for reformed drunkards was founded by him, and the mastership was offered to Jem Goodman; but though he took a great interest in the charity, and spared no time or trouble in advising and arranging, he refused the office as requiring, in his opinion, a man of better education.

One great happiness and triumph awaited Jem Goodman and the temperance party, and that was, Lord Glenlonely's consenting to take the chair at a great meeting of the friends of temperance at Hall; and in a brilliant and most effective speech, giving the history of his own experience of both indulgence and abstinence, he told the whole story of his first interview with Jem Goodman, and its result; and that speech made many converts.

Lady Glenlonely was still bewailing her beloved Sultana. She had doubled and trebled the amount of the reward originally offered, but in vain.

Townley and Tarlatan were to quit her service unless Sultana were brought back within a week.

As they knew they should not change for the better, and heard from Pertinette at Lady Vacant Star's she had to work twice as hard, and did not live half as well as at Lord Glenlonely's, they tried all in their power to recover Sultana; but in vain.

Lady Glenlonely really felt the loss of the poor dog intensely. It had been her son's, her only boy's, and he had begged her to take care of Sultana till his return. The cross, over-fed, spoilt creature was so fond of her, and her only! And the doubt as to her fate was worse than any certainty could have been. This anxiety threw a cloud and a gloom over all her new glories, new honours.

One day that Ada was at the ragged school, and Lord Glenlonely in the House of Lords, Lady Glenlonely was sitting in her own boudoir, alone, a book in her hand, but her thoughts with her lost favourite, when in rushed Townley, followed by Tarlatan, with a dog in her arms. This dog sprang out of them at the sight of Lady Glenlonely, and the well-known bark of Sultana met her ear. But at first it was impossible to recognise the obese, waddling, puffy, broad-backed spaniel, in the lean, active, very thin, hungry-looking creature, who bounded on to Lady Glenlonely's lap, licked her face, her hands; jumped, frisked, frolicked, begged, danced; in short, though certainly half starved, she had reason to say, "Sweet are the uses of adversity," for she was cured of all her bodily ailments, and all her faults of temper; and from being one of the fattest, most snapping, snarling, dropsical, asthmatic, and inactive of canine favourites, was now as thin as a greyhound, as active as a roe, and the best-tempered, most willing and docile creature in the world.

It was very touching to see the poor wretch, looking so lank and chopfallen, sitting up to beg, dancing on her hind legs, bowing, opening and shutting the door, fetching and carrying, and practising a variety of accomplishments for which she had been famous in her puppyhood, and had resorted to as a chance of conciliating Blear-eyed Bet and old Blarney, and which now had become habitual with her.

Lady Glenlonely was in raptures at the return of her pet, but in tears, too, at these new accomplishments; at one moment rejoicing at beholding it, at another weeping over its dwindled body. She was very anxious to know all particulars connected with its abduction.

Townley and Tarlatan (now quite restored to favour) could only inform her that a young lad, who was a great favourite of Lady Ada's, and who had been there several times before, during her ladyship's absence, had brought that blessed Sultana back in a basket, and was waiting below, "in course," said Townley, "for the reward; but only professing to want to know if her ladyship wished to ask any particulars about the finding of her pet."

Lady Glenlonely was very anxious to know all about the recovery of her treasure; and Townley went to summon the lad, who proved to be no other than our dear young friend Larky Grigg, his fine black eyes blazing with triumph, his cheeks flushed, and his dress showing signs of a recent scuffle.

Lady Glenlonely's questions elicited the following account:—

"My lady," began Larky Grigg (having been duly impressed below in the servants' hall with the necessity of addressing the countess as "My lady," and "Your ladyship," and bringing in those magic words on all occasions—they knew how sweet were those labial liquid sounds to her ear.)

"My lady, I'm as glad as ever your ladyship be to have found your favourite, which, my lady, your ladyship being Miss, or rather my Lady Adar's mar, is the cause why every boy, and gal, too, in the Green Field's Ragged School would go through fire and water to serve her, and all as belongs to her."

Lady Glenlonely listened languidly to this tribute to Ada's merits, stroking her poor, thin, shrunken, soiled pet the while with her white, jewelled, taper fingers.

"To the point, my good boy," she said. "Where was the sweet pet hid?"

"If you means the dog, my lady—that 'ere Sooltaner—I found her tied up cral toight in an alley not very far from where we lives, but a very low, dirty, tumble-down place it is, and all bad characters living there. There's a wretched, drunken old 'ooman, which her name is Blear-eyed Bet, and she get her living by cat-skinning. And in the same house lives a dog-stealer—a vicious old man, as the boys calls old Blarney, 'cause he've got such a tongue, and he is such a false, canting old rogue, my lady, maning no offence. Well, my lady, hearing as how your ladyship's dog wor stole, I had my eyes open, and so had another boy at our school, called Stunning Steenie, which his feather's a rat-catcher, and quite thick, loike, with old Blarney and Blear-eyed Bet. In course, my ladyship, as Mr. Stephen says, there ain't no true friendships between bad people—'tain't loikely; but they smokes and gets drunk together; so I axed Stunning Steenie, my lady, whether his feather know'd of old Blarney having any dog in his yard answering the description of Sooltaner—them large eyes and short phiz, and with that 'ere spot on her forehead, and them very long, wavy ears, and them frills of hair round her feet, and that 'ere tail like the Oss Guards wears in their helmets; and so I heered there wor, only he was rather close, my lady, and not liking to peach about his dad's pal. I was just a-going to inform the peelers—leastways the police, my lady, when, going home first for a bit o' dinner, loike, I found Hope—our Hope, my lady—Hope Evermore—you've heered speak of Hope, maybe, my lady?"

Lady Glenlonely nodded; for even she had been much interested by Ada's account of that lovely child.

"In course you have, my lady—so fond as Miss—I mean Lady—Ada is of her. Well, she wor crying her blessed blue eyes out, and when she saw me—

"O Larky, Larky Grigg!" sobbed she, "my Truelove's gone—my pussy's stolen. I'll never see her more!" "Ah! but you shall, though," said I. "How long has she been missing?" "Since morning," said Hope; "and oh, Larky! Meg says it's wicked old Blear-eyed Bet's day for cat-skinning; and she met her hurrying along to her bad home, with her bag stuffed out ever so big."

And then, my lady, Hope sobbed worse nor ever. So says I, 'Don't ee fret, Hope; maybe I'll be in time yet to save Truelove.' So off I runs, Hope crying after me not to venture among them sepoys; for, though she loved her Truelove much, she loved me more; and they're a low, crool, bad lot, my lady, in that 'ere Paradise-row, as it's called. But I warn't afraid, my lady; I only thought of Hope's grief and poor Truelove's danger; and I rushed along, and I made such way, that I got to the old wretch's house, my lady, in no time. I knowed it by the cat-skins a-hanging out to dry, all fresh-loike. I looked in at the broken winder, my lady, and I saw what made my blood run cold—one poor dying cat nearly skinned, and the old hag forcing Truelove's head into an old boot, and Blarney—the vile old Blarney—a-helping of her. They got some good bites and scratches, that they did, though; for Truelove's got a spirit of her own, tho' she be such a fond, loving cretur; and doat so on our Hope. Lor! how them crool old creturs cussed and swore, and how Truelove fought, and kicked, and scratched, and mewed; but there wor two to one, and they mastered her. But I stole to the crazy old door, my lady. It wor fastened, but few locks can baffle me,—for I've studied their pedigree, my lady,—and least of all such a common, rusty old thing as that 'ere. I had it off in no time, my lady, and then I opened the door gently, and stole in; and before they knew I wor there, my lady, I'd tripped up Blear-eyed Bet, and knocked old Blarney over; and soon I had Truelove in my arms, with her head in the boot, and even in the boot purring for joy, for she's more sence than many human creturs, and she knowed me, and give a little fond mew she only gives in a general way when Hope strokes her; but lor! she know'd I come from Hope, my lady, and she got quiet in her mind—though, when fust I see her, her tail wor more like a muff nor a tail. She, my lady, is snow-white, and wuth no end to any one, but wuth thousands to Hope, and to me, for Hope's sake, my lady. Well, I soon got her head out, though I'd hard stripes to do it, my lady; and I believe in a little while she'd have been suffocated, strangled, or somehut.

"The two crool, vicious old brutes soon picked themselves up, my lady, and swore if I didn't give 'em the cat, and get out they'd do for me; and the old 'ooman took up a poker and the man a knife—the very knife they used for skinning alive; but just at this moment two peelers came in (that's policemen, my lady)—they knowed Hope's cat well enough, for we're on their beat, and they often stops to stroke it.

"It was Hope had sent them, fearing they'd do for me. They saw the other poor skinned cat, quivering in its dying agonies, and they took both them old ruffians in charge at onst; and just as we were going to leave their 'orrid, close 'ole of a house, a-smelling so of cats, and gin, and smoke, and all sorts, and not a breath of hair, Truelove, a-purring and rubbing herself agin my shoulder and lying in my breast, I heard a dog bark, my lady, in the little back room. I instantly remembered Sooltaner wor missing, and I looked in and there she wor, poor cretur, tied to a crazy old bed-post so tight, it's a wonder she warn't choked, my lady. And there was all the rewards you've offered, my lady, stuck up against the wall, just where she, poor heathen, could look up with her large, pitiful eyes, and see 'em all. Now, I'd had an 'int from Steenie that old Blarney was waiting for a larger reward, still—'twor only a 'int, 'cause of his being his feather's pal. I told one of the peelers all about it, and he agreed to loose the dog and chance it about the consequences, purvided he shared the reward, which it's no more nor his due, my lady, as he's a poor man with a large family; leastways, he married a cook double his age, as always waylaid him on his beat with somehut nice for supper, which she passed herself off for a widow with no incumbrances, and onst she got married to him nine children turned up, and he's a good father to 'em all; and mother's an old friend of his'n, my lady, and has a respect for him, considering his having made such a fool of hisself to go for to be taked in like that 'ere; and if he hadn't a-listened to Hope, and a-come'd arter me, they two old brutes 'nd maybe a-finished me off, and poor Truelove would have been skinned alive, and Sooltaner have stayed there half-starved, and been used cruelly till a higher reward wor offered, which, my lady, every one said you'd maybe offer a hundred pound, as you loved Sooltaner better nor a Christian. On the way back, my lady, we met Hope. Oh, how she jumped for joy, and hugged me first and Truelove next, and called me her dear, dear Larky and good lad! and we fed both Sooltaner and Truelove, and they wor so hungry, they seemed as if they'd never have done! and I'd have been here earlier, my lady, only I had to appear before the magistrate to prove the charge against 'Blear-eyed Bet' and 'Old Blarney,' and they've got their six months with hard labour, my lady."

"And serve them richly right!" said the countess. "Can there be such fiends in human shape as to skin cats alive?"

"Yes, lady; and brutes a'most as bad as won't buy no skins as ain't took off living dumb creatures; for they says they've not the same gloss off a dead cat as a living one. In that wretched little back parlour, my lady, where Sooltaner wor tied up, there wor a tub full of dead bodies of skinned cats, smelling dreadful, and ready to be throwed in the river at night; and there wor two other dogs tied up besides Sooltaner. The police is going to advertise them, my lady."

"You're a brave, noble boy," said the countess. "Here's the reward; share it with the policeman, and I shall consult Lord Glenlonely and Lady Ada what more I can do for you."

The countess rang the bell, and ordered Townley to see that Larky Grigg and the policeman had a good dinner; and then she sent for Tarlatan and ordered her to prepare a bath and some minced chicken for her recovered treasure, who in due time became almost as fat, diseased, unwieldy, and ill-tempered as before her abduction.

For some time past Ada had heard with intense interest, and a delight of which the vivacity surprised even herself, that Gerald St. Maur was treading in the steps of that great and good earl, to whom ragged schools owe their rise and progress.

He had enlisted in the great and holy cause of philanthropy. He had espoused that not less important, of temperance; he had subscribed largely to many institutions; he had been on the platform at many meetings connected with ragged schools and the temperance movement, and he had been in the chair more than once, and had spoken with a fervid eloquence which came straight from the heart, although his classical attainments lent a brilliant poetical beauty and logical power to his noble speech.

Ada heard all this with a beating heart, a glowing cheek, and rising tears.

He was becoming all she could wish, all she could love, all she could revere, but yet he came not. He had adopted her views, her suggestions, her advice, but he had resigned her. He was content to tread that upward path alone. He was good, happy; he, too, had "something to do." He no longer thought of her, loved her, sighed for her. She had refused him, as she now began to think, harshly, coldly, thanklessly. Why did she so long to tell him she was proud of him. Had she not rejected him; what was she to him, what was he to her?

"Here's Gerald St. Maur's maiden speech, Ada," said her father one morning at breakfast; "I heard him deliver it, and I never heard so good a maiden speech, and seldom so fine a one from experienced speakers. He was loudly and repeatedly cheered."

"What was the subject of his speech, papa?" asked Ada, trying to look unconcerned.

"One after your own heart, my love," said her father. "I almost thought you must have suggested it. Its object was twofold: to obtain a government grant for endowing a night refuge for all those whom the present refuges cannot accommodate, and an asylum for reformed drunkards of broken constitutions who are unfit for hard work. I can tell you, Ada, that he has already got the ear of the house. He held them all spell-bound for three hours, and the motion was carried by a large majority. He'll be another S— if he goes on in the same path. And by the time he's Lord Arncliffe, he'll be one of the few for whom the city may be saved. And Ada," said Lord Glenlonely, looking archly at her changing cheek, and noting the emotion she could not control or conceal, "I shook hands with him after his speech, and he asked me if he might call to-day to hear your opinion of it; and I gave him leave. I hope I have not done wrong, dearest?"

"Take the paper up-stairs with you, Ada," said Lady Glenlonely, "and read Gerald's speech through. It will seem so very odd if, when he calls, you know nothing about it."

Ada did so, glad to escape. The speech was a long one. Its perusal occupied at least an hour. It captivated her fancy; it enchanted her mind; it satisfied her heart. At the touching pictures of human misery and destitution her tears fell like rain; at the rousing appeals to a nation's help and sympathy her cheek glowed—her heart beat!

"O Gerald, how I do love thee!" burst involuntarily, unconsciously from her lips, as she dropped the paper and buried her tear-stained face in her hands, not dreaming that there was any one present but herself.

She started, then, when Gerald St. Maur, who had entered unperceived and had heard her impassioned exclamation, fell at her feet and said, "O Ada, angel of this dark and troublous world, repeat those blessed words!—say you love me, Ada!—say you will be mine!—say you think I am becoming more worthy of you!"

And Ada threw her arms round his neck and pressed him to her heart, as she said, "Yes, Gerald, I cannot only love, I revere you, now! Take me, dearest and best; and may I prove to be in every sense a help meet for thee! May we together so employ our time here that we may never, never be severed, but be united through all eternity!"

Lord and Lady Glenlonely cordially approved of their daughter's choice, and as there was on both sides that passionate yet pure love which always ought to warm and gladden the hearts of affianced lovers, there could be no reason for postponing the union ardently desired by both.

The Matron.

NO. XXXII.

PRESERVING and pickling have furnished the subjects of the last two numbers, and I have still a few words to say about pickles; but my readers need not fear that I have left off giving hints on that all-important question—how to live comfortably on small means. Such hints are generally very welcome; and even those who are rich, and who peruse these pages with interest, will be glad to have lessons in economy, not only that they may be the better able to advise their poorer brethren, but that on a large scale they may be assisted in practising it themselves.

I said I had not quite finished the subject of pickling. In summer and in early autumn there is a beautiful yellow flower that grows luxuriantly in the gardens of the rich and poor. It is the nasturtium. When the leaves or petals of the flower drop, a green knob is left behind. This is in reality the seed-vessel of the plant; but if a quantity of these nasturtium seed-vessels be collected and merely steeped in cold vinegar, they make a nice pickle, that keeps as long as any of those about which I have given directions.

I can fancy I hear a prudent housewife exclaim, "I have plenty of nasturtiums in my garden, and I should be glad enough to turn them to account as pickles, to make my husband and children relish the cold dinner I'm now and then obliged to give them; but, to tell you the truth, I grudge the money for the vinegar. Vinegar is now tencepence a quart, and I can do a great deal with tencepence."

In answer to this prudent mother, I am glad to say that I can give directions to enable her and others to make good vinegar at home for threepence a quart.

Set apart two or three black quart bottles, and allow half a pound of coarse brown sugar and a teaspoonful of solid yeast for each bottle. Then take a large stone jar and cover—mind it is clean, as you are to use it for the vinegar. Supposing three bottles of vinegar are required, let a pound and a half of coarse brown sugar be placed in the jar, and two quarts and a half of boiling water be poured over it. Stir it thoroughly. When nearly cold, let three spoonfuls of yeast also be stirred into it, and repeatedly dip up a little and pour it back, to make the whole mix well. Then cover it and put it in a warm place to work. A chimney corner is well suited for the purpose; but mind you do not place it too near a fierce fire. After working two or three days, it should be strained for bottling. Particular care should be taken to have the above-mentioned bottles clean and dry, and in the first instance a wineglassful of good common vinegar should be put into each bottle. Another thing to be observed is this:—Tie a bit of muslin over the tops of the bottles, to keep out the flies while admitting the air. It is necessary that the bottles should stand in a warm place, either near the fire, or in the heat of the sun. Of course they must be protected from rain. Under slates in a sunny aspect would not be a bad place for them. In a few weeks each bottle will contain excellent vinegar. And mark this, when the bottles are emptied and it is required to make more vinegar in a similar manner, mind you do not wash the bottles. You need not put a glassful of vinegar in them, as you did in the first instance, for what hangs around them will be sufficient to forward the new vinegar. And now I return to the subject of living well on a little.

One of the prime things that prevents those who are neither idle nor intemperate from getting into comfortable circumstances is illness, and one of the principal causes of illness is breathing a bad, impure air. Some weeks back, I entered into details respecting the best manner of ventilating or airing apartments, but I did not allude to the choice of a dwelling house. Many among us have it not in their power to pitch their tents where they please; but sometimes the family question is, "Where shall we go? We must leave this house. What neighbourhood shall we fix on next?"

Dear readers, should you be asking the question, let me prompt a reply. Supposing your abode must, of necessity, be in a town, let it be in an airy, open street, and by no means in a court or alley. As for the difference of the rent, this will be more than saved by the better health you will all enjoy through breathing a purer air: for, on good authority, I can tell you that the average duration of sickness among those who live in open streets is half a week each per year; but mark the difference, among those who live in courts it is two and a half weeks per year. Think of this. The inhabitants of courts and alleys suffer five times as much sickness as those who choose more open situations. Besides, one sad and solemn fact must be remembered, sickness leads to death, not improbably to the death of the husband, whose earnings may be the only support of the poor wife and helpless young ones. This husband may be a fine strong man in the very prime of life. What of this? Fever, the consequences of impure air in close crowded courts, so far from sparing the young and the strong, seems to have a preference for them. Judge, then, if there would be any economy in living in such courts, even if you were offered a house rent-free in one of them. The fact is, no such courts ought to exist, and I hope to see the day when the improved plan of dwelling houses for people of all classes will prevent the poorest from resorting to close, damp, unhealthy alleys. Half of the children born in them die before they become five years of age, while of those who are born and live in open streets only one-fourth die before that age, and I do not doubt that the greater proportion of these might be saved, if the advice of the friends of the working classes respecting food, cleanliness, and temperance were more heeded; but one thing is certain, that it is all important to health to make a sensible selection of a dwelling.

A THRILLING INCIDENT.

RETURNING from a visit to New Orleans, we were fortunate enough to secure a passage in a steam-boat with but few passengers. Among the ladies, one especially interested us. She was the widow of a wealthy planter, and was returning with only one child to her father's home. Her devotion to the child was very touching, and the eyes of her old black nurse would fill with tears as she besought her mistress "not to love that boy too much, or the Lord would take him away from her."

We passed through the canal at Louisville, and stopped for a few minutes at the wharf, when the nurse, wishing to see the city, walked out on the guard at the back of the boat, where, by a sudden effort, the child sprang from her arms into the terrible current that swept towards the falls, and disappeared immediately. The confusion which ensued attracted the attention of a gentleman who was in the front part of the boat quietly reading. Rising hastily, he asked for some article the child had worn. The nurse handed him a tiny apron she had torn off in her effort to retain the child in her arms. Turning to a splendid Newfoundland dog that was eagerly watching his countenance, he pointed first to the apron, and then to the spot where the child had gone under.

In an instant the noble dog leaped into the rushing water, and he also soon disappeared. By this time the excitement was intense, and some persons on shore supposing the dog was lost as well as the child, procured a boat and started off in search of the body. Just at this moment the dog was seen far away with something in his mouth. Bravely he struggled with the waves; but it was evident his strength was fast failing, and more than one breast gave a sigh of relief as the boat reached him, and it was announced that he had the child, and it was still alive. They were brought to the shore—the dog and the child. Giving a single glance to satisfy herself that the child was really living, the young mother rushed forward, and sinking beside the dog, threw her arms around his neck and burst into tears. Not many could view the sight unmoved, and as she caressed and kissed his shaggy head, she looked up to its owner and said—"Oh, sir, I must have this dog! I am rich; take all I have, everything, but give me my child's preserver!" The gentleman smiled, and patting his dog's head, said—"I am very glad he has been of service to you; but nothing could induce me to part with him."

A ROYAL SLUGGARD OF THE MEROVINGIAN RACE.

PICTURES FROM HISTORY.

THE "ROIS FAINÉANTS," OR SLUGGARD KINGS.

AFTER the death of Clovis, the powerful chief whose mode of administering justice we have already described, a succession of semi-barbarous kings reigned over France for about two centuries and a half. The history of the Merovingians, as they were called, from their supposed descent from Merovée, a Frankish chief (Merovée, or Mer-wig, meaning in the Frankish language Great Warrior), reigned in France during a period of about two centuries and a half, and their annals form one of the blackest pages in the annals of the human race. Our Saxon ancestors were neither refined nor gentle. Their laws were in many instances arbitrary and severe, and their rule despotic and heavy. But the history of the Saxon heptarchy appears as a record of mercy in comparison with the atrocities of the Merovingian Franks. Clovis chastised his subjects with whips; but his successors chastised them with scorpions. Clovis was unscrupulous and ferocious—in fact, a clever barbarian; but his descendants surpassed him by far in ferocity, while they never equalled him in administrative power. From the death of Clovis, in 511, to the accession of Charles Martel, the grandfather of Charlemagne, to the dignity of major-domo or mayor of the palace (about 718), the reader of French history has to wade through a dreary catalogue of barbarism and crime, without finding any great or glorious name to arrest his interest or enchain his attention.

Each monarch seems to have reigned, like Damocles, with a sword suspended over his head. The fear of assassination brooded like a dark shadow over every one of the early French kings; and that such a fear is no light thing is proved by its effects upon the iron frame even of such a man as Cromwell. The nearest relations of a king were his most deadly enemies: for it was from impatient heirs to the throne that the chief danger of assassination came. The precautions taken against this danger were as horrible and unnatural as the peril itself. The accession of each king was usually accompanied by the murder of all those of his family whom ambition or consanguinity rendered likely to attempt anything against the reigning monarch's safety. The hand of the father was raised against the son; brothers fought for supremacy, not by means of armies and generals, but personally, and with the rage of infuriated brutes. Women joined in the contest; and in one instance the long rivalry between two queens, Fredegunda and Brunehild, was terminated by the horrible death of the conquered princess, Brunehild. Fredegunda, with unheard-of barbarity, ordered that her rival should be torn to pieces by wild horses, which fearful sentence was literally executed. A single passage from the history of Fredegunda and her husband, Chilperic, will give the reader an idea of the state of government under the Merovingian kings in France.

This Chilperic has been called by historians the Nero of France; and though by his vices he well merited the appellation, his contemporaries seem equally with himself to have incurred the reproach of cruelty. Chilperic was not, however, an ordinary tyrant, who sacrifices everything to his personal interest, and listens only to the voice of his ambition or fear. He was an adept in wickedness, and seemed to inflict suffering for the mere pleasure of witnessing it. His modes of punishment were as various as they were horrible, and the invention of new tortures became one of his daily amusements. He would frequently order some grievous punishment to be inflicted upon an entire community. Whole districts and towns were by his command laid waste with fire and sword; and, far from feeling compassion for the innocent victims of his fury, he would take a pride in seeing his instructions carried out to the very letter. When he gave directions for the sacking of a town or the murder of a suspected nobleman, he generally concluded with the frightful injunction—"and should any one neglect to fulfil these commands, he is to be punished by having his eyes torn out."

This is how he ruled in his own family. In the year 680 a terrible disease had carried off many of the Franks. The plague was particularly fatal to children, and the two sons of Fredegunda had fallen victims to its ravages. The grief of the queen at their loss was increased by the thought that the Prince Clovis, a son of Chilperic by Andovera, a divorced queen, would succeed to the throne. Her rage and jealousy were increased by the imprudent conduct of the prince himself, who boasted of his good fortune in thus surviving his brothers. With refined cruelty Fredegunda prevailed on Chilperic to despatch his son to the Castle of Brain, where the plague was raging furiously. Her design failed—the young prince visited the infected region and returned unharmed. But Fredegunda was not to be baffled. She accused Andovera, Clovis's mother, of having employed the arts of sorcery to procure the death of her children; and it was but too easy to persuade the brutal Chilperic of the guilt of his discarded wife. By dint of torture, a confession was wrung from the unhappy Andovera, who was thereupon cruelly put to death, while Clovis was delivered, bound, to Fredegunda. Three days were employed in extracting from the captive prince the names of his chief friends and partisans. Then he was led away and stabbed to death with a dagger. The bleeding weapon was brought to Chilperic, with a false account that Clovis had stabbed himself. The tyrant smiled grimly at the transparent device; but made no remark. A cruel persecution of all the friends of Clovis was a fitting termination of the tragedy; and Chilperic and Fredegunda congratulated themselves on their prospects of at length reigning in safety.

The natural result of such a rule was the almost total extinction of the royal family. There ultimately remained but a very few youthful scions of the race chevelu, or long-haired race—for flowing locks were a sign of royalty among the Franks. Then it was that the German or Austrasian mayor of the palace gradually assumed the entire government of the country; the kings themselves becoming known only as "fainéants," or sluggards. The mayor of the palace was the real monarch. From him all authority emanated, and to him all appeals were made.

In one of the royal palaces or farms, surrounded by all the rude luxury of the seventh and eighth century, sat the nominal chief of the Franks, utterly unconscious of the progress of affairs, and entirely incapable of taking any part in the government. On public occasions only he was produced and shown to the people. Then the royal carriage or wagon drawn by oxen drove slowly through the Champ de Mars, the half idiotic king reclining listlessly on his cushions, or staring wildly about him, at the unaccustomed crowd of faces. At last Pepin, surnamed Le Bref, the Short, an energetic mayor of the palace, sent to Rome, and asked the pope Zachary to determine the pithy question: "Whether the man who had the power should be king, or the man who had merely the name?" "The name and the power should go together," answered the politic pope. "Whereupon," says the chronicler, "Pepin caused Childeric (the last Merovingian monarch) to have his long hair cut off, and to be immured in a convent for the rest of his days." Pepin assumed the regal title, and the rule of the sluggard kings was at an end.

TO MARY.

My Mary, many changeful years,
With all their smiles and all their tears,
With all their hopes and joys have past,
Like dreams, since I beheld thee last.
I am the child you loved no more,
And my light-hearted youth is o'er;
The eyes whose brightness won your praise,
Have quenched in floods of tears their rays;
And on the temples, once so fair,
Shines many a thread of silver hair;
And the young limbs that could not go
With any motion staid or slow,
Now bear me onward, sad and sage,
O'er the dull path of middle age.
Mary, your childhood's loving mate
Hath proved a strangely varied fate;
Hath wrestled oft with wasting care,
And hungry want, and cold despair;
But by God's grace her own right hand
Hath earned her place and power to stand,
Companion of the high and strong;
Acknowledged as a child of song;
She hath been hated and maligned
By those she thought were true and kind;
Been sought, and honoured, and caressed,
As dearest friend, and welcome guest,
By those who once but as a name
Sounded from the high hills of fame;
But weary, poor, and desolate,
Or gay amid the rich and great,
Mary, her heart was ne'er untrue
To her glad childhood's love for you.
I never think of you, beloved,
But other memories are moved.
I see my long-lost mother's smile,
And hear her loving voice the while;
And through the years I backward glide
To sit with Mary, at her side,
And dream that thou and I once more
Are children, as we were of yore.

THE MOCKER.

DEAR reader, believe me when I tell you that I am not one of those self-wise, conceited persons who are continually taxing people—better, perhaps, than themselves—with troublesome or impertinent precepts. I like to look at human nature on its fairest side; but alas! wherever in human character there is sunshine, there is sure to be shadow also. I was, not long since, painfully re-assured of this truth. It so chanced that I was paying a visit to a dear and valued friend, who resides in one of the prettiest of the pleasant D— villages, and she (who, in a quiet way, I observed, was the Sister of Charity and Lady Bountiful of the place) had not long before been called to visit a sick gentleman at the little hotel of the town. Let me tell the story as she told it to me. I use her own words:—

"He was weeping violently when I entered his room, but soon becoming calmer, he thanked me gratefully for my attention and sympathy, and, after a time, taking my hand, said, with mournful impressiveness: 'My dear madam, I feel impelled to speak, and your kindness inspires me with confidence. Devote ten minutes to me, and I will impart a lesson worth ten years' experience to any young man you may fall in with, who is taking the first step downwards.'"

"Wine is said in Scripture to 'make glad the heart of man.' Wine is said by the poets to be the balm of grief, the dew of beauty, the philter of love. What that is gracious and graceful is it not said to be? Clustering grapes entwined the brow of its divinity, and wine is said to be a libation worthy of the gods. Fools, fools, fools! They need to have poured forth their blood and tears like me, to know that it is a fountain of eternal destruction. Do not, dear madam, fancy that I allude to drunkenness; do not class me in your imagination with the sensual brute who degrades himself to the filthiness of intoxication. Against a vice so flagrant, how easy to arm one's virtue! No; the true danger lies many degrees within that fearful limit, and the Spartans who warned their sons against wine by the exhibition of their drunken Helots, fulfilled their duty blindly. Drunkenness implies, in fact, an extinction of the very faculties of evil. The enfeebled arm can deal no mortal blow; the staggering step retards the perpetration of sin. The drunkard is an idiot, a thing which children mock at, and women chastise. It is the man whose temperament is excited, not overpowered, by wine, to whom the snare is fatal. Do not suppose me the apostle of a temperance society, when I assert on my word, on my honour, that, after three glasses of wine, I am no longer master of my actions. Without being at the moment conscious of the change, I begin to see, feel, hear, and reason differently. The minor transitions between good and evil are forgotten; as some one says, 'The lava boils in my bosom.' Three more, and I become a madman.'

"But this constitutes a positive physical infirmity," said I. 'You must, of course, regard yourself as an exception.'

"No. I am convinced the case is common. Among my own acquaintance, I know fifty men who are pleasant companions in the morning, but intolerable after dinner,—men who neither like wine nor indulge in it, but who, while simply fulfilling the forms and ceremonies of society, frequently become odious to others, and a burden to themselves.'

"I expressed my belief that he was correct.

"I know that I am correct," he answered. 'Listen: At Christ Church, Oxford, I gained the distinction of "a double first," and was the acknowledged best scholar of my year. My last term over, all that remained for me was to preside over a farewell oyster-supper. I was unaccustomed to wine, for my parents had probably taken silent note of the infirmity of my nature, and wisely guarded me from any early intimacy with the maddening cup; but now a very small allowance of the fiery tavern liquid which forms the nectar of all similar festivities, sufficed to elevate my spirits to frenzy. A row ensued, and I lost caste.'

"I was 'the only son of my mother, and she was a widow.' Glad at length to escape from her pale face and gloomy weeds, I entered the army. At Christ Church, I was known as the 'peace-maker;' I never had a quarrel—I never had an enemy. Yet, twelve months after joining the army, I was considered a troublesome fellow. I had fought one of my brother officers, and was on the most uncomfortable terms with four others. I fancied I hated my profession, when in fact I only hated myself. I left the army, and went home to my mother. Here my peace of mind came back to me at once. There was no one to bear me company over the bottle. I was my mother's constant companion. I became healthy, happy, beloved.'

"Beloved in a lover's sense?"

"A pained expression overspread his face; but he continued, gravely:—

"A young and very beautiful girl deigned to encourage the veneration with which I regarded her. My mother assured her I was the best of sons; I readily promised to be the best of husbands. She believed in both, accepted me, married me, and in welcoming home my gentle, lovely Mary, all remembrance of past unhappiness seemed obliterated. 'Our position in the world, if not brilliant, was honourable. My mother's table renewed those hospitalities over which my father loved to preside. Mary's three brothers were our constant guests, and in entertaining them, I once more became irritable and ill at ease. My mother, who could conceive no fault in my disposition, ascribed to poor Mary all the discredit of the change. She took a dislike to her daughter-in-law—nay, even to Mrs. Wargrave's family, friends, and acquaintances. She saw, after they had been dining with me, that I grew morose and irritable, and attributed the fault to my guests, rather than to the wine their company compelled me to swallow.'

"Your wife was probably more discerning.'

"No. On such subjects, women are not enlightened by experience. Mary, perhaps, ascribed my irritability to infirmity of temper. She found me, perhaps, less good-humoured than she had expected, and more easily moved by trifles. The morning is the portion of the day in which married people live least in each other's society, and my evenings seldom passed without a political squabble, or a storm with the servants. The tea was cold; the newspaper did not arrive in time, or the minister had been guilty of some grave mistake in politics. I was in fault.

"Fortunately, poor Mary's time was engrossed by preparations for the arrival of her first child—a pledge of domestic happiness calculated to reconcile a woman to even greater vexations than those arising from her husband's irritability. Mary palliated all my bursts of temper by declaring that any man might possess the insipid quality of good-humour; but that Wargrave, if sometimes hasty, had the best heart and the best principles in the world. As soon as our little boy made his appearance, she excited the contempt of her lady acquaintances by trusting that Harry would in all respects resemble his father. Heaven bless her for her blindness!

"Among my wife's female friends, was a certain Marion Cavendish, her cousin, young, handsome, richer, and almost as handsome as herself, but gifted with that intemperate vivacity which health and prosperity inspired. Marion was a gay, fearless creature—the only person who did not shrink from my fits of ill-temper. When I scolded, she bantered; when I appeared sullen, she laughed me into cheerfulness. We usually met in morning visits, when I was in a mood to receive her raileries graciously.

To this playful girl it unluckily occurred to suggest to her cousin, 'Why don't you manage Wargrave as I do? Why don't you laugh and tease him out of his perversity?' And Mary, to whose disposition and manner all these tricks were foreign, soon began to assume a most provoking sportiveness in our domestic disputes; would seize me by the hair, the sleeve; point her fingers at me when I was sullen, and laugh heartily when I indulged in a reproof. I vow to Heaven there were moments when this innocent folly made me hate her. 'It does not become you to ape the monkey tricks of your cousin!' cried I, one night, when she had amused herself by fillying water at me across the table while I was engaged in an intemperate political debate with an old brother officer. 'In trying to make me look like a fool, you only make a fool of yourself!'—"Don't be intimidated by a few words," laughed Miss Cavendish, when this ebullition was reported to her. 'Men and nettles must be bullied into tameness. They have a sting only for those who are afraid of them. Persevere.'

"She did persevere; and on another occasion, equally ill-timed, again the angry husband retorted severely upon the wife he loved. 'You must not banter him in company,' said Marion; 'he is one of those men who hate being shown up before others. But when you are alone, take your revenge. Treat his anger as a jest. Prove to him you are not afraid of him; and since he chooses to behave like a child, argue with him as children are argued with.'

"It was on my return from a dinner at my club, that Mary attempted to put these mischievous precepts into practice. I was late, too late; for, against my will, I had been detained by the jovial party; but, instead of encouraging the apologies I was inclined to offer for having kept her watching, Mary, who had been beguiling the time of my absence in her dressing-room with an entertaining book, by which her spirits were considerably exhilarated, began to laugh at my excuses, to banter, to mock me. I begged her to desist. She persisted. I grew angry. She replied to my invectives by a thousand absurd accusations invented to justify her mirth. I bade her be silent. She only laughed more loudly. I stamped, swore, raved. She approached me in mimicry of my violence. I struck her.

"I know not what followed this act of brutality. I have a faint impression of kneeling, and imploring, and offering the sacrifice of my life in atonement. But I have a vivid one of the manner which, from that moment, poor Mary assumed in my presence. She jested no more; she never laughed again. I fancied that she sometimes betrayed an apprehension of leaving our child alone in the room with me. Perhaps she thought me mad. She was right. The brief insanity inspired by wine had alone caused me to raise my hand against her. I knew the secret had been kept from her brothers; but there was a person whose interference between me and my wife I dreaded more than theirs. A brother of Marion Cavendish, who had loved Mary from her childhood, wooed her, and been refused, shortly after her acquaintance with myself. This fellow I never could endure.

"Horace Cavendish was the reverse of his sister—grave, even to dejection, and cold and dignified in his demeanour. Mary had a high opinion of him, although she had preferred the vivacity of my manner and the impetuosity of my character. I began to hate him, for I felt little in his presence. I saw that he was my superior in temper and breeding—that he would have made a happier woman of my wife. Yet I had no pretext for dismissing him from my house. He came, and came, and was constantly there, day after day. He could not but have seen that he was odious to me, yet he had not the delicacy to withdraw from our society. Perhaps he thought his presence necessary to protect his cousin. Perhaps he thought I was not to be trusted with the deposit of her happiness. I now became guarded. My temperance was that of an anchorite. On the pretext of health, I refrained for many months from wine, and became myself again. I wanted to win back the confidence of my wife.

"At this period, there occurred a family festival, from which I could not absent myself—the wedding of Marion Cavendish. We met to eat, jest, and be merry. It was settled that I should drink the bride's health, and Mrs. Wargrave extended her glass towards me, as if to make a pledge of reconciliation. How eagerly I grasped it! Of my free will I took a second glass. The bridegroom was to be toasted; then the family into which Marion was marrying. At length the health of Mrs. Wargrave was proposed. Could I do otherwise than honour it in a bumper? I looked towards her for further kindness; but instead of the expected smile, I saw her pale, trembling, anxious. My kindling glances and heated countenance perhaps reminded her of the fatal night which had been the origin of our misunderstanding.

"Yes, she trembled, and I saw, or fancied I saw, a look of sympathy and intelligence pass between her and Horace Cavendish. I turned fiercely towards him. He regarded me with contempt; that look, at least, I did not misinterpret, but I revenged it. In the mood that then had possession of me, it was easy to give offence. We quarrelled. I saw that he regarded me as a venomous reptile to be crushed, and I looked upon him as the lover of Mary. We met at sunrise. Both were sober then. I shot him through the heart. I was arrested, tried for murder, and acquitted.

"On the plea of severe indisposition, Mary had refrained from visiting me in prison. Soon after my liberation, I received a letter. From my wife? No; it was a lawyer's letter, informing me with technical precision that his client, Mrs. Wargrave, had withdrawn herself from my roof, and proposed to reside with her brothers. I sought out her place of refuge, and forced myself into her presence. A terrible scene ensued, in the course of which I tore our child rudely from her arms, and in the struggle it fell violently to the floor, and became a cripple for life.

"For fourteen months I was confined in a mad-house, a raving maniac. The influence of wine, passion, horror, had superinduced epilepsy, from which I was only roused to a state of the wildest frenzy. Careful treatment and solitude gradually restored me. For some time after my recovery, I became a wanderer on the continent, with the intention of wasting the remnant of my blighted existence in restless obscurity. I at length returned, however, to England; and, in the course of my aimless travels, arrived at this place, where the illness under which I am now suffering seized me."

"I quitted this unfortunate man, after tendering him every consolation that lay in my power. That night the report of a pistol was heard in his room, and the poor sufferer was discovered dead upon the floor!"

Verily, "wine is a mocker."

Solutions of the QUESTION in Vol. II., p. 111.

I. Let $4x$ = number of people in gallery
 $2x$ = number of people in boxes
 $3x$ = number of people in pit
 Then $68x + 68x + 64x = 10,920$
 $195x = 10,920$
 $x = 56$

$56 \times 4 = 224$ in gallery
 $56 \times 2 = 112$ in boxes
 $56 \times 3 = 168$ in pit

A LAD OF ELEVEN.—We know nothing whatever of the game of double Chess. The Problem submitted shall be reported upon shortly.

J. C. A.—Problem No. 1 is much too easy for our column. No. 2 is defective; Black can delay the mate at the 3rd move by playing Kt to Q Kt 6.

Solutions by D. W. O. (Sligo), Nos. 51 and 52; Mona, Nos. 51 and 52; T. Martin, jun., Nos. 51 and 52; W. Ross, Nos. 51, 52, and 53; M. A. R., No. 52; Douglas, No. 53; G. T., No. 53; R. Wakelin, Nos. 52 and 53; R. T., No. 53; T. Potter, No. 53; G. Davie, Nos. 51, 52, and 53; E. Grant, Nos. 52 and 53; B. W., No. 53; C. Austin, No. 53; W. Helt, 50, 51, 52, and 53; and F. C. A., Nos. 52 and 53, correct.

63* In the game between Messrs. Pindar and Wormald, published in No. 33, Mr. Pindar was by an oversight represented as having played the black men. The game was clearly in his favour.

NOTICES OF CHESS CLUBS.

IPSWICH CHESS CLUB.

This club, which a few months back numbered about half a dozen members only, has lately received new life and spirit through the strenuous exertions of T. Gocher, Esq. The club now consists of 55 members, and is very strong in good players, Messrs. Gocher and C. White (C. W. of Salisbury) being able to contend on even terms with many of the best players in the kingdom. Messrs. Wallis, Vulliamy, Biddle, and Dr. Chevallier are also very strong players.

The members meet every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday in the Saloon at the Mechanics' Institute, Ipswich.

The Chairman is T. Gocher, Esq., and the Secretary, C. White, Esq.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

In order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I., New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

MARY BLIGH.—We can easily understand how much you have been enjoying yourself in the country during the harvest time, and how interesting it has been to you to be taken back to Scripture times while watching the gleaners. This ancient custom of gleaning has existed three thousand years and upwards, as testified by Ruth, who gathered three pecks and over in a day. It has well been observed (alluding to gleaning), that if it were not then first instituted, it was secured and regulated by an especial ordinance of the Almighty to the Israelites in the wilderness, as a privilege to be fully enjoyed by the poor of the land whenever their triumphant enemies should enter into Canaan. The corners were to be left unreaped, and even the forgotten sheaf was not to be fetched away by the owner, but to be left for the poor and the stranger, the fatherless and the widow. Far distant be the day when gleaners shall meet with discouragement in Old England. Nevertheless, the assertion of the surly landlord of whom you speak, is correct so far, leasing or gleaning is a permission, not a right. No one has by the common law of England a right to glean in a harvest field.

ONE WHO SEEKS INFORMATION.—You tell us the grottoes erected at the corners of our streets have attracted your attention, and that you much wish to know in what old rite or legend the custom of building them originates. Mr. Thomas, an excellent antiquarian, considers that in the grottoes formed of oyster shells and lighted with a candle, to which on St. James's Day (August the 5th) we are invited to contribute by cries of "Pray remember the grotto," we have a record of the celebrated shrine of St. James at Compostella. Such grottoes may have been formerly erected on the anniversary of St. James by persons as an invitation to those who could not visit Compostella to show their reverence for the saint by alms-giving to their poorer brethren. On St. James's Day oysters used to come into London, and there is a popular notion that whoever eats oysters on that day will never want money for the rest of the year.

ONE WHO KNOWS BUT LITTLE FRENCH.—The French celebrate the fête-day rather than the birth-day, so that there is not a very great choice of mottoes, such as you require. Since it is a friend you are addressing, perhaps this might please you: "L'amour passe, l'amitié reste." Love passes away, friendship remains; or, "Toujours fidèle," Ever constant. If your friend is at a distance this would not be inappropriate—"Loin des yeux, près du cœur." Of this our motto is a free translation: Though lost to sight to memory dear. If "One who knows but little French" perseveres with the "French Lessons" we are now publishing in this Paper, she will soon know a great deal, and be able to find out French phrases and mottoes for herself.

IGNORAMUS.—The Poet Laureate in Great Britain was formerly an officer of the king's household, whose business it was to compose an ode annually for the king's birthday and for the new year. The title was first given in the time of Edward IV. Under Queen Anne the appointment of laureate was part of the patronage of the Lord Chamberlain; at the close of the reign of George III. the custom of requiring annual odes was discontinued.

BESSIE.—"Bessie" gives us an account of a dreadful storm that has done great damage in her neighbourhood. She was at home with her mamma and sisters, but she felt very much frightened nevertheless. She tells us she once heard a lecture about thunder and lightning, and only wishes she could recollect what was said about the precautions people should take to protect themselves from thunder and lightning. "Bessie" should not talk of protecting herself from thunder and lightning. She has little to fear from the thunder; it is only the lightning that endangers. This we own sometimes strikes people blind, and mysteriously extinguishes life. Dr. Franklin recommends people to avoid the neighbourhood of fire-places. Lightning often enters by the chimney, on account of the internal coating of soot, which is one of the bodies for which, as for metals, lightning evinces a preference. For the same reason, "Bessie" should avoid as much as possible metals, gildings, and mirrors, on account of their quicksilver. The best place is in the middle of the room; unless, indeed, there should be a lamp or chandelier hanging from the ceiling. Mattresses and feather beds are not conductors of lightning, therefore in a very violent storm it would not be a bad plan for "Bessie" to go off to bed. If she has not a feather bed, the more mattresses she has under her the safer she will be.

ADOLPHUS BEST.—Since you have some interest in the unclaimed dividends, you had better consult the list at Herbert's Library in Cheapside; but the arrangement of the work makes it difficult for a stranger to search it with accuracy. There are several lists, and the information given in the one is not repeated in the next. Then there are several sorts of stock lists in each, and an alphabetical arrangement under each head.

LYDIA LAVENDER.—A good pot pourri may be made thus:—Take one handful of each of the following: damask roses, jasmine, clove, gilliflowers, knotted marjoram, lemon thyme, lavender, rosemary, and myrtle; a few sprigs of mint, two or three bay leaves the rind of half a lemon; a tea-spoonful of powdered cloves; and a few sprigs of balm of Gilead. Chop them all up together, and put them in layers, sprinkling each layer with pounded bay salt, till the pot is filled. About half a handful of orange-blossoms will be a valuable addition. If all the ingredients cannot be obtained at once, put them in as you get them, but throw in a little salt with every new article.

EMILY.—The term pansy, in French pensée, was probably applied to this flower (also called "heart's-ease") from its fanciful or variegated appearance. If this etymology be correct, pansy is from the French penser, which is derived from the Latin pensare, "to weigh," "to ponder," "to think;" or, more simply, from the "odoriferous panacea" of Virgil. Our Shakespeare makes Ophelia say,

"There are pansies, that's for thought."

And Milton speaks of "the pansy peaked (that is, fancifully tinged) with jet." Panacea properly means, "a remedy for all diseases;" and hence, perhaps, the term "heart's-ease."

A YOUNG MODELLEE.—Antonio Canova was born at Possagno, Venice, November 1, 1757. His parents were poor, his father being a stone-cutter, and his mother a humble rustic. At a very tender age he began to make models in clay. His merit being discovered, he was patronised by the Senator Falier, and rose, by degrees, to the highest eminence in the profession of a sculptor. He died, October 13, 1822, in the 65th year of his age, at his native place, where he was buried, amidst great demonstrations of general respect.

RUS.—Warburton relates that "Roland" and "Oliver" were two of the most famous in the list of Charlemagne's twelve peers; and their exploits were rendered so ridiculously and equally extravagant by the old romancers, that from thence arose the saying, "a Roland for an Oliver," amongst our plain and sensible ancestors, to signify the matching one incredible lie with another.

A. FIELDING.—We are sorry to find you complaining so bitterly of your shortness of stature; we do not, however, think that "change of diet," much less "considerable pain and anxiety of mind," or even "smoking moderately," will increase your height. But why such "pain and anxiety?" We have had many great men who were small in size. To say nothing of living celebrities, we call to mind Dr. Isaac Watts, who, when, on one occasion, twitted on account of his diminutive stature, repeated the following impromptu:

"Were I so tall to reach the pole,
Or grasp the ocean with my span;
I must be measured by my soul—
The mind's the standard of the man."

G. DINNING.—If your kid gloves are not so soiled as to require wetting, rub them well with powdered French chalk. Put on the gloves, place a little of the chalk in the palm of each hand, and rub them in the same way that you would wash your hands with soap and water. If they require washing, have ready a little new milk in one saucer, and a piece of brown soap in another, and a clean towel folded twice double. Dip a piece of flannel in the milk, rub a good quantity of soap on the wetted flannel, and rub the glove downwards towards the tips of the fingers, holding it firmly with the left hand. Then lay flat to dry.

CAROLINE.—"Caroline" wishes to know if music could be taught in a manner similar to that in which we are giving instruction in the French language. The theory might thus be acquired, but of course, for the practice of instrumental music, the pupil must possess an instrument. "Caroline's" second request is, to be furnished with a cure for nervousness, "without long, hard-named medicines." We comply with "Caroline's" wish, and confidently recommend plenty of fresh air and exercise, as the best remedy for nervousness, and supposing the exercise was taken with a lively, pleasant companion, it would be all the more efficacious, as cheerfulness would be promoted; and cheerfulness is an excellent remedy for nervous patients.

VIRMEW RIVER.—We recommend neither the one nor the other of the rash measures you propose. Parents are not inexorable tyrants. When they oppose the wishes of their children, it is generally forecasting love that prompts the opposition. Is there anything in your own habits or conduct to cause dislike or mistrust? If on close examination you find that there is, immediately set about reforming it. At any rate

"Beware of desperate steps; the darkest day, Live till to-morrow, will have passed away."

MONTGOMERIE.—The oldest newspapers now in circulation are The London Gazette, first issued in 1665; the St. James's Chronicle, issued about 1715, and the Leeds Mercury, issued about 1720.

D. KNIGHT.—You will find the solution in No. 23, page 367.

C. K. B.—The passage to which you refer occurs in the second part of Shakespeare's Henry VI., act iv., scene vi. Jack Cade and his followers enter Cannon-street; he strikes his staff on London Stone, saying—"Now is Mortimer lord of this city. And here, sitting upon London Stone, I charge and command that at the city's cost the conduits run nothing but claret wine this first year of our reign. And now henceforth it shall be treason for any that calls me other than Lord Mortimer." We are obliged to our correspondent J. R. Bruce.

B. C. M. asks us "what the Baptist believes?" The distinguishing peculiarity of Baptists from other Dissenters is chiefly with regard to baptism. Baptists contend that believers are proper subjects for baptism, consequently they administer the rite to adults only. They found their opinion on the language of the commission—"He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved;" and they declare that infant baptism was never practiced by the Apostles. They also argue that immersing the whole body in water is according to the Apostolic practice, and not sprinkling, as is the ordinary method adopted by the majority of Christians. They do not hold that baptism is essential to salvation.

W. G. R. M., O. C. H., J. H., S. N. B., LILY, NORVAL, FIDLER DICK, JACK, X. Y. Z., A SUBSCRIBER, ANOTHER SUBSCRIBER.—The prices of the volumes may be readily obtained from any respectable bookseller. We cannot too frequently refer to books in our Editorial Table.

G. TOBY.—Your first cousin's children would be your first cousins, first remove.

J. H. J.—The saccharine principle is found in all vegetables that contain starch, but chiefly in the sugar cane, maple, &c.

P. A. W.—A good blacking for harness, &c., is made as follows:—Melt two ounces of mutton suet with six ounces of beeswax; add six ounces of sugar-candy, two ounces of soft soap dissolved in water, and one ounce of indigo finely powdered. When melted and well mixed, add a gill of turpentine. Lay it on the harness with a sponge, and polish off with a brush.

SOUTHPORTIAN.—The cost of a university education varies considerably according to tastes and habits. With strict economy, the ordinary expenses may be met for about £90 a year.

A YOUNGSTER.—If the "abusive language" by which you are annoyed be libellous, and is "published," by being uttered in the presence of a witness, you can indict the offender by what is called a criminal information. It is not necessary for this purpose that any assault should have been committed.

MARIA B.—English court plaster, commonly called "sticking plaster," is made thus:—Stretch upon a frame a piece of black silk, and with a camel's hair brush pass over it three or more coats of isinglass dissolved in boiling water. To give it an agreeable odour, it is usual, when applying the last coat, to mix in a little compound tincture of benzoin with the isinglass. The colour can be varied by taking silk of any desired shade. The intervals between the application of the coats should be sufficiently long to admit of a thorough drying of each.

A FARMER'S SON, ELLEN SUTTON, C. F. V., H. ROSE, ALESSANDRO BRUCANI, AN OLD SUBSCRIBER, FLORA MACDONALD, BOOTS, JAMES ROWE.—These have all put questions to us as to cures for various bodily ailments. They require medical advice, which we do not undertake to furnish.

MIRZA ALGEE.—"Excelsior" means more lofty, or more elevated. The anaconda is a large snake, a species of boa; it is used by some of the inhabitants of Ceylon for food.

SALAD SAUCES.—A correspondent strongly recommends the following:—Take the yolks of two eggs boiled hard, a dessert-spoonful of old Cheshire cheese grated, a little made mustard, a table-spoonful of ketchup, and a table-spoonful of good vinegar. When these are well mixed together, add four table-spoonfuls of salad oil, and beat till the oil is intimately mixed with the other ingredients.

JACQUES JAFFER.—A "power of attorney" will cost a guinea. If you obtain the proper form you can fill it up without the aid of a solicitor.

AN OLD SOLDIER.—You may certainly reside in Guernsey at a considerably less cost than in London, but you will not be able by such residence to free yourself from the obligations incurred by debts contracted in England.

NARBERTHAN.—The specimens you have sent us appear to be copper pyrites.

G. I. H.—It is usual, in suddenly discharging a servant, to give him a month's wages, unless in cases of dishonesty or gross misconduct. Masters and mistresses can be compelled to give a discharged servant a character when applied to for that purpose.

L. JOICE.—We are admirers of pewter dishes and plates, and can quite understand the feeling that makes your grand-mamma set such a value on the pewter service left by her father. Until within the last century pewter was in common use for the table among the middle and even the upper classes of society, wooden trenchers and bowls being used among the poor. A good stock of pewter was considered a mark of wealth. It was an heir-loom in families for several generations. Pewter is still used in many farm houses, but, we are sorry to say, it is becoming more and more rare.

DUBITAS, J. H. A., BEAVER.—The regiment spoken of in Mr. J. F. Smith's tale as the 01st, is so named for obvious reasons. The circumstances have some foundation in fact; the names, of course, are assumed.

IGNORAMUS.—A discussion as to the merits of "church rates, state grants, and patronage," is not suited to our columns.

APPLE BLOSSOM.—The injury done to your green silk dress by lime can only be repaired by a regular dyer.

DECLINED, WITH THANKS.—H. Pressly; J. M. Kent; A Tradesman's Wife; E. Lewin; Poet; C. S.; W. X.; G. J. Dixon; V. North; J. Reid; C. Shephard; Charles; W. Liddal; E. O. F.; Fidella; Patience Hope; W. G. C. Woods; J. S.; A Subscriber (Torquay); Ross; G. Clark; S. Stone (Nottingham); Doubtful; R. P. T.; J. Lugdin; Poetica; John Halifax.

W. E. T. C.—The stocking loom was invented by Mr. Lea, of Woodboro', near Nottingham, in the year 1590.

N. B. W. RAWLINS, AN INTENDING EMIGRANT.—Apply to the Emigration Commissioners, Westminster.

VANITAS.—"Vanitas" complains of hairs growing on the tip of his nose. If he be resolved upon removing them, it must be done, one by one, with a minute pair of tweezers. In the thirty-second number of the "New Series" of this Paper he will find an excellent recipe for clearing his complexion.

FAIRPLAY.—We beg to thank "Fairplay" for his courteous communication, and, at the same time, to acknowledge that the poem in No. 23, New Series, which forms part of the article entitled "Children at Play," is from the pen of the gifted Eliza Cook.

F.K.—You may tell the friend with whom you have had the argument, that it is legal for a lady or gentleman to marry either his first or second cousin; and it is quite a vulgar error to suppose that first cousins may lawfully marry and second cousins may not. Whether such marriages, we mean marriages between near relatives, are advisable, is another question.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXX.

Hear me; for I will speak, and build up all
My sorrows with my song; as yonder walls
Rose slowly to a music slowly breathed—
A cloud that gathered shape; for it may be
That while I speak of it, a little while,
My heart may wander from its deeper woe.

TENNISON.

FROM the day when the beleaguered garrison beheld the destruction of the tower in which their countrymen had taken refuge, a feeling of despondency fell on them—a sad foreboding that their own fate was not far distant—that the promised succour, if ever it did arrive, would make its appearance only to avenge their fall, and not in time to save them.

The men pined although they did not murmur at the inactivity to which the stern necessity of their position condemned them. Theirs was the courage which preferred to brave death in the open field—confront the grisly monarch face to face, amid the pomp and panoply of glorious war, the trumpet's clang, the cannon's roar, and all the mad excitement of the battle scene. The monotony of their present life—the dull, unvarying round of guard, relief, and drill—fatigued their spirits more than the severest active service could have done.

With all the defects of our military system, there is this peculiar merit in the British soldier—the hour of danger always finds him prepared. It is in vain that sullen routine, a mongrel cross between prejudice and the martinet, confines his limbs in a uniform that cripples action—half chokes him by the torture of the collar—or does all it can to superinduce apoplexy by compelling him to bear the weight of an enormous bearskin upon his aching brow under a burning sun. Let the bugle sound to action, and he rises from his bed of fever, ague, or pestilence, ready to shed his blood for the honour of the country which abandons him to the tender mercies of ignorance, obstinacy, and incapacity.

England has too long been prodigal of the muscles and sinews of her sons; and, probably, will continue so as long as the anvil and the plough furnish the supply demanded. Once let that supply fail, and she will perceive her error; probably as most errors are perceived—when it is too late.

Those two last words have often set the seal upon the fortunes of an individual; and why not on a nation's fate?

The commander of the 61st was more to be pitied than the hardest worked soldier in his regiment. Independent of the vast weight of responsibility cast upon him, he had the burden of a double and personal sorrow to bear—to console his heartbroken wife for the loss of her adopted child, and stifle the emotions of regret in his own manly breast, not to add poignancy to hers.

"Were I but assured that she were dead!" Lady Bell would frequently exclaim;—"dead in unsullied purity and honour, I might support the blow; time would reconcile me to her loss; but the dread—the nameless dread—that haunts me, waking or sleeping! I see her in the hands of ferocious sepoy; imagination conjures up terrors that blanch my cheek to dwell upon,—which it would kill me to find words to utter."

Sometimes in the bitterness of her grief she would call upon Wharton to rescue the bride of his friend—reproach him with coldness, inactivity; and when made sensible of her injustice by the sorrowful silence of the young officer, hastily repair her error and implore his forgiveness.

It was a bereavement that all sympathised in save one—Dawlish; but even he affected to do so, especially since the error which had proved so fatal to our hero and his companions; for the men began to look coldly on him, as if they suspected his courage.

"But for his prudence," they drily repeated, and it was extraordinary how they dwelt upon the word, "our comrade, Mark Rayner, and those who were with him, might have been saved."

As for Corporal Stock, he held him in positive aversion, and barely condescended to salute him when he passed in the quadrangle.

"He may be my officer, colonel," said the old man, sullenly, in answer to a reproof which Sir Charles addressed to him on the subject, "but he is no man; he has never once spoken a word of consolation or regret to poor Rose, although his obstinacy caused the death of her husband."

"It was an error on the side of prudence," observed the baronet; "some men are guided by the head, others by the heart."

The corporal gave a dry, inarticulate humph!

"Discipline must be kept up," continued the speaker; "as an old soldier, no one knows its necessity better than yourself; do not let me have to find fault with you again."

Stock promised, and made one or two ineffectual attempts to keep his word; but, finding that to be impossible, he did the next best thing—avoided all occasions of meeting Dawlish, by confining himself to the quarters of the colonel and Lady Bell.

Sir Charles and his wife were seated in the sanctuary of the temple, on the evening of the third day after the fall of the tower. They were speaking of their lost one, so loved and mourned, when the officer who commanded the guard sent to inform him that an aged fakir demanded admittance at the gate; adding that, from the old man's signs, he suspected he had some communication to make respecting Mark Rayner and his companions.

"Admit him!" exclaimed Rose, whose heart bounded with that lingering hope which woman clings to, almost against reason—"pray admit him! Heaven, in its mercy, may have interposed to save him!"

The colonel shook his head, despondingly. He knew how unwise it was to encourage so improbable a supposition.

"I will see the man," he said.

"Lose not an instant," urged his wife, with a sigh. "I can feel for poor Rose's agonies; there is no pang like uncertainty, when it regards the fate of those we love."

The gallant veteran waited only for the arrival of the corporal—for since the mysterious disappearance of Lillian he had never permitted her ladyship to remain alone or without protection for a single instant—and then quitted the place.

"Oh, my lady," sobbed Rose, "do you think there is any chance, any hope that I shall ever see my husband again?"

"All things are possible," replied her mistress, forgetting for an instant her own sorrow. "If not on earth," she added, "at least in heaven—there, where I trust soon to rejoin my own lost Lillian."

In the hour of their mutual anguish, the distinction of rank—the artificial ties by which the world separates the children of one common family—marks the select with the word society, and brands the less favoured ones with the pariah's stamp—were forgotten; and, true to the instincts of humanity, the two speakers, each born in a widely different sphere of life, mingled their sorrows together.

Grief is a sad leveller: we have heard of genteel poverty, genteel distress, but never of genteel tears.

Perhaps some genteel lexicographer, shocked at the poverty of our language, will invent a word to meet the difficulty. When he has done so, we promise to give it publicity through the medium of our widely circulated pages.

On reaching the gates, the commander of the garrison found Fred Wharton, Burke, and a group of officers parleying with an aged fakir, who obstinately refused to impart the object of his visit to any but the colonel himself.

"Here is the sahib," said the doctor, who had acted as interpreter to the others.

The Hindoo did not appear to doubt him, for Sir Charles Fourreau was one of those men who bear the impress of command; nature had written "gentleman" upon his brow, the accident of birth merely confirmed it.

By his directions the gates were opened, the visitor admitted, and Burke directed to examine him.

"Who are you?" demanded the latter, eyeing the old man with a scrutinising glance.

"As thou seest—a follower of Vishnu—devoted to prayer, penance, and poverty; a thing of dust and sin."

"All is not that is," replied the doctor, quoting from one of the Brahminical writers, who, generally speaking, are so full of paradoxes and conceits, that it would seem the highest efforts of their genius have been devoted to puzzle instead of instruct their votaries.

This was done, not to display his own learning, but to ascertain whether the fakir would understand him or not—for he somewhat doubted his claim to the garb he wore.

If an impostor, the fellow was, at any rate, a clever one, for he never moved a single muscle of his wrinkled countenance.

"The sahib speaks, doubtless, with the wisdom of his own land," he observed, in a tone of apathy, as if he did not comprehend him.

The next question was to call upon him to explain the motive of his visit.

"The feringees," answered the old man, "are rich. If they live in the land of mist and clouds, they know how to win the gold and gems of India." And, trusting to their liberality, he had brought them several papers which had belonged to their countrymen who were so lately crushed beneath the ruins of the tower.

"Where did you obtain them?" demanded the doctor.

"From the saddle-bags of one of their horses."

As most of his hearers had seen Mark and his companions dismount and abandon their steeds to the enemy, the assertion was not doubted. The papers were given up, and a suitable reward paid to the speaker.

"Great heavens!" exclaimed Sir Charles, as he glanced rapidly over the leaves of a rough diary which Richard had kept; "so young and good, to have perished by such a death!"

The attention of Fred Wharton became painfully excited. He had never been able to shake off the impression that our hero might be one of the fugitives, and his old feeling of hatred against Dawlish began to revive in all its intensity.

"You speak of Tyrrell?" he said.

"Poor Tyrrell!" repeated the colonel; "one pang at least was spared him: he died without knowing the sad fate of her he so truly loved. I must conceal this last blow," he added, "from my wife; her heart is too severely wrung already."

The interview which we have just described, took place by torchlight at the gates of the temple. As the speaker was turning away, the fakir begged to be permitted to pass the night within the walls, urging as a plea his great age, and the ill-usage he would be certain to experience from his countrymen should they discover he had been in communication with the English.

"Gold pays for all risks," observed Burke, pointing to the bag of rupees the fellow still held in his hand.

"Except the risk of life," replied the man.

"Even for that," added the former; "you urge a useless prayer."

The real or pretended fakir—for not even the doctor could come to a satisfactory conclusion on the point—renewed his entreaties, but the colonel was inexorable. There was too much at stake to risk the safety, not only of the men, but the helpless females within the walls by allowing him to remain.

As the aged hypocrite—for hypocrite he was—slowly retraced his steps, a half-naked man, wounded and covered with dust, dashed through the still open gates. A dozen carbines were levelled at him; but before a trigger could be pulled, he called out, in excellent English—

"Close them! the enemy are at my heels!"

It needed no second order from the commander to cause the direction thus strangely given to be obeyed. The gates were rolled back, the bolts drawn, and the alarm sounded.

"Safe!" shouted the new-comer, wildly, "safe!" as he fell, exhausted with fatigue and loss of blood, upon the ground.

Several of the soldiers raised him, and were in the act of bearing him to the guard-house, when the Hindoo, who in the confusion and surprise had remained unnoticed, drawing a long knife from his girdle, sprang upon the senseless man, and would have buried the blade in his throat, had not the quick eye of Wharton perceived his murderous intention. Darting between them, he turned his arm aside, at the cost of a slight wound to himself.

"Do not harm him," he exclaimed to the troopers; "but bind him securely."

The treacherous Hindoo, whose character and intentions no longer admitted of any doubt, was speedily placed beyond the possibility of effecting any further injury, either to himself or others, by his captors binding his arms behind his back with their sword belts.

In their indignation, they would far more willingly have placed them round his neck.

Expecting an immediate attack, Sir Charles Fourreau gave orders to man the walls, and in a few minutes every soldier of the gallant 01st was at his post, ready and eager for action. The alarm, however, proved a false one, for the party of rebels who had followed the fugitive were neither sufficiently strong nor brave enough to approach within gun-shot of the temple; but finding their prey had escaped them, sullenly returned to the fort.

Leaving a sufficient number of men to prevent a surprise, the colonel and most of his officers repaired to the guard-house, to hear the examination of the prisoner and their rescued countryman, who proved to be a soldier whom General Anson had despatched to announce the approach of a portion of his force to relieve them.

Unfortunately he had fallen into the hands of the barbarous rajah Acbar, been wounded, and stripped of everything.

"In three days, you say, we may expect the arrival of our friends?" observed the commander.

"You may rely upon it, colonel," answered the man, who, thanks to the care of Doctor Burke, had recovered perfect consciousness. "Shoot me like a dog if I deceive you."

On hearing this welcome intelligence, it was impossible to repress a hearty cheer. The eyes of the prisoner sparkled like those of a serpent. There was something absolutely terrible in their expression of hate.

"And who are you?" demanded the doctor, addressing him.

The fakir made no answer.

"There are means," added his questioner, "to force you to speak. Where the lives of brave men are at stake, a false pity cannot be listened to."

"I can tell your honour who he is," exclaimed the messenger of General Anson, regarding the Hindoo with no very amicable expression; "I know the old rascal again, though he is dressed in rags. He was rigged in other colours this morning," he added, "when he promised the rajah to blow up the temple and the garrison."

At these words a thrill of horror ran through the veins of all who heard them.

"He thought," continued the speaker, "that I did not understand his lingo; but I did. I haven't been in the Company's service twenty years for nothing."

"You forget, my good fellow," observed Sir Charles, "to inform us who or what he is."

"I can't tell your honour his name," answered the man, saluting him; "but this—I know, he is the head priest of this very temple, and escaped from it after you took possession."

"By what means?" hastily demanded the baronet, a sudden light breaking in upon him.

"He didn't say that, your honour."

Sir Charles turned aside to conceal his disappointment.

"You have heard," said Doctor Burke, addressing Nadir—for the prisoner was no other than the chief Brahmin, who had taken the desperate step of disguising himself as a fakir in order to return to his subterranean abode, from which the fall of the tower had excluded him.

"You need not speak Hindostani," interrupted the soldier; "he speaks English as naturally as you or I can."

"Does he?" exclaimed Major Plinlimmon, who had been compelled to observe an unwilling silence, from the supposition that the prisoner understood no other language than his own; "then, by the colonel's permission, I propose that we blow the old rascal from one of our guns, unless he explains by what means he quitted the place."

Nadir smiled disdainfully. If ambitious, he was also a fanatic, and death for him had no terrors. Besides, he had long since prepared himself for an hour like the present.

"I have sworn my tongue should never reveal it," he replied, "or my finger point the way, and I dare not break my oath; but promise to me that living or dead no outrage shall be offered to my caste, or insult to my person, and I will find the means to indicate it."

"We promise you," answered the colonel and his officers.

"It must be by the only deity I ever could discover that you worshipped."

"And that is?"

"Honour," replied the Hindoo, scornfully; for even in the condition to which he found himself reduced, he could not refrain from marking his sense of the incompatibility of the lives of most Englishmen in India with their professions as Christians.

The pledge was given in the form he desired it.

"Now," said Nadir, after a few moments' reflection, "remove from my waist this ragged cloak and vest, and lay bare my body."

His directions were complied with; when, in addition to the Brahminical cord which those of his caste never part from, there appeared a broad belt around his waist. It was inscribed with a variety of characters, some having an astronomical, and others a religious, signification: amongst others, the sacred triangle was the most conspicuous. Strange that the Hebrew and the Hindoo should symbolise the Supreme Deity by the same sign.

The clasp which confined the belt was of jewel-work; in the centre of it glittered a large emerald, polished but uncut, like most of the gems of the East.

"Press the stone," said the Brahmin, in a firm voice.

The doctor did so, when a slight click was heard, as if a spring had been suddenly acted upon, and the blood gushed over his hand. A small blade, artfully concealed within the clasp, had penetrated the wearer's heart, who expired without uttering a groan or word, with a smile of proud defiance on his withered lips.

"The cunning rascal!" exclaimed the major.

"He has kept faith with us," observed Burke; "this belt contains, I doubt not, every secret connected with the temple and his order."

"We shall defeat him yet," observed the colonel.

"Alas, no; none but a Brahmin of the highest caste can read it."

CHAPTER LXXXI.

Affection's ear is prompt, and swift to catch
The faintest echo of the voice it loves;
Grief quickens every sense.—OLD PLAY.

WHILE the scene, which terminated in the death of the Brahmin Nadir, was taking place, Lady Bell and Rose, guarded by Corporal Stock, who had strict orders not to quit or lose sight of them for an instant, remained in the sanctuary, impatiently awaiting the return of Sir Charles, whose prolonged absence began to alarm his anxious wife; for affection hath as many fears as joys—and grief for the loss of her adopted child had not rendered her less sensible to the danger of one who was, if possible, still dearer to her.

"I hear the hurrying tread of men," she exclaimed, starting from the couch on which Rose had persuaded her to repose herself; "something unusual must have occurred."

Her companions listened, but all was once more still. "The enemy may have approached the place," added her ladyship, with increased excitement, "haste and see."

This was addressed to the old soldier, who, faithful to his consign, shook his head.

"You forget, my lady, that I am on guard," he replied, "and dare not quit my post till the colonel relieves me."

"This suspense is killing me," murmured the wife of his commander, impatiently. "I feel the fever of impatience in my heart—in every vein; I am treated like a child; even Stock no longer obeys me—he, too, is like the rest."

The wrinkled features of the corporal became yet more wrinkled on hearing this reproach, so little merited—for he would have died to prove his fidelity, either to her or his master; and for an instant he felt inclined to obey her. His hesitation, however, like his emotion, lasted only for an instant; he recollected his orders, and, shouldering his carbine, began to pace the narrow limits of the sanctuary.

"I will go," said Rose, advancing towards the door, but the old man barred her passage.

"Can't pass," he exclaimed, with military sternness.

"Prisoners!" ejaculated both the females.

"Must obey the consign; the colonel's commands were, not to lose sight of either of you."

"Stock," whispered Rose, "this to our dear lady!"

"I will go," exclaimed Lady Bell, with sudden energy; "only violence shall detain me here."

The corporal closed the gates and placed himself before them.

"Dare you oppose me?" added the excited woman.

"A word—a last word," replied the sentinel, mournfully; "for if you pass the threshold before Sir Charles arrives, you will never hear me utter another. My dear master shall never accuse me of disobedience as a soldier, or treachery as a man. He has trusted me with the dearest thing he has on earth. I never deceived him yet; you wouldn't disgrace an old soldier's gray hairs, and break his heart?"

"Forgive me, Stock," replied his mistress, her better feelings returning at his simple appeal. "I did not intend to be so cruel, but grief—grief has distracted me. I will wait, and, if reason holds out against this agony of suspense—wait patiently my husband's return. You are not angry with me?"

"Angry, my lady!" repeated the faithful fellow, at the same time letting the butt of his carbine fall upon the marble pavement; "an angel could not be angry with you, however much he might weep to see you suffer. This time," he added, "I feel assured your fears for the colonel are groundless. Had the enemy ventured to attack the place, we must have heard their guns ere this."

"The bugle call!" replied his mistress, incredulously; "you forget that, Stock."

"A false alarm, my lady; nothing more. See how calm I am."

These words, and the stillness which reigned within the temple, somewhat reassured the anxious wife.

"I never enter this place," she observed, addressing her companion, "but a feeling of terror and breathless expectation creeps over me. The minutes I pass here appear hours. Here it was I last beheld my child—kissed her as she lay sleeping by my side, and blessed her with affection's fondest blessing. Here it was that she was torn from me; and the mystery which shrouds her fate adds to the agony of the bereavement. Had I seen her dead, dead in her purity and innocence," she continued, wringing her hands, "I could have borne it: the thought that heaven had received one angel more would have consoled me."

"Dear lady, let us pray for her," said Rose; "it is all that is left us now."

"My life has been one prayer since I lost her," sobbed Lady Bell, yielding to a passionate flood of tears; "but it has not been answered—it has not been answered. By day she is never absent from my thoughts. At night I see her in my dreams—pale, struggling against ruffian hands that—. Her shrieks—I hear them now. Reason, mock me not! They pierce my brain! Lillian! my child! Lillian!"

Overcome by the intense emotion which imagination, as those who heard her supposed, alone had conjured up, Lady Bell staggered towards the altar, from which the grim statue of the goddess frowned as if in mockery of her sorrows, and would have fallen had not the wife of Mark Rayner caught her in her arms.

"This is terrible," she said, addressing the corporal; "we must remove her from this place, or madness may ensue. Her mind is giving way."

"No!" gasped the sufferer, pointing towards the idol; "there, there—Lillian—there!"

The old soldier and Rose both listened, not a sound was to be heard. The latter raised her mistress in her arms, and would have borne her to the couch; but, with a sudden effort, she broke from her and sprang towards the altar, which she clasped frantically. Her companion followed, and for the first time fancied she could distinguish a faint cry.

"Hark!" she said.

"You, too!" exclaimed Stock; "I thought you had more firmness."

"My mistress is not deceived!" said Rose. "I heard a cry; there," she added, her eyes dilating with terror, "it came from that accursed idol!"

On hearing this confirmation of her own impression, Lady Bell, who was too greatly agitated to speak, grasped her hand, and drew her yet nearer to the stone.

The report of firearms was now heard, followed by shouts. The corporal felt bewildered, for the sounds appeared to rise from beneath the pavement. Without further hesitation, he fired off his own piece, to alarm the garrison; and in a few moments, Sir Charles, followed by several officers, and a party of his men, came rushing hastily into the sanctuary.

"What has occurred?" demanded the baronet.

At the sound of his voice, his wife threw herself into his arms, and gasped forth the name of Lillian. She was unable to utter more, but stood like some statue, spell-bound, one arm extended towards the altar.

"We have heard voices from beneath the earth," said Rose.

"Firearms, colonel," added the corporal.

The report, which sounded like subterranean thunder, was again heard, followed by shouts and cries: there was no mistaking the yells of the Hindoos.

"Down with the idol!" exclaimed the baronet.

In an instant, the soldiers, who were greatly excited, commenced an attack, with the butt ends of their carbines and muskets, for they were variously armed, upon the statue of the goddess, which for a time resisted their utmost efforts, till Fred Wharton, who actively superintended the affair, observed that it vibrated on one side, sprang on the altar, and, calling to Stock to hand him his carbine, began dealing a succession of blows with it at the feet of the statue.

"Strike only in this direction!" he cried.

The men obeyed him, and in a few minutes the ponderous figure reeled.

A piercing shriek, which seemed to rise from the bowels of the earth, added fresh energy to their efforts, and, with a hideous crash, the idol fell, disclosing the entrance to the secret passage.

"Give them a volley!" shouted the major, who began to feel greatly excited.

A dozen men leaped upon the altar and levelled their carbines down the yawning opening.

"Recover arms!" exclaimed Wharton, in a voice of thunder; and, such was the force of discipline, that the men involuntarily obeyed. "There is a female," he added; "some appear to be defending her, and—"

With a cry of agony, which sounded as if wrung from his very heart, he sprang into the opening and disappeared.

A dozen brave and resolute fellows followed him.

The few minutes which followed appeared an age of agony to Sir Charles and Lady Bell; neither knew what to hope or fear. At last the figure of a man, whose features were so disfigured by smoke and blood the eye of hate or affection could not have recognised him, emerged from the passage, bearing a female. With one last effort of remaining strength he leaped from the altar, placed his insensible burden in the arms of Lady Bell, and sank exhausted at her feet.

"Lillian!" shrieked the agitated woman, clasping her recovered treasure fondly to her breast, "my child, my child!"

The first sign of returning consciousness given by the fair girl was faintly murmuring the name of her lover.

"By heavens!" exclaimed Doctor Burke, who had been busied in wiping the blood from the features of our hero, "but it is Mr. Tyrrell!"

Surprise followed upon surprise, and a cry of mingled terror and joy broke from Rose as she threw her arms round the neck of her husband, who, severely wounded, staggered from the subterranean den.

His three companions quickly followed, the lieutenant being the last.

"More men," he said, pointing to the secret passage.

The loud cries and report of firearms explained more rapidly than words could have done the nature of the deadly contest that was taking place below, and the soldiers, who by this time crowded the place to suffocation, hastened to support their comrades; it was a contest which should descend the first. Their colonel would have headed them, but for once Major Plinlimmon proved insubordinate to that discipline it had been the pride and study of his life to maintain.

"My duty!" he exclaimed. "You, colonel, command the garrison, I lead the sortie. You must not deprive me of the honour, positively you must not."

And, with an agility which, considering his years and obesity, had something in it almost miraculous—in fact, the speaker, in after life, never clearly understood himself how he accomplished such a feat—the generous-hearted Welshman sprang with a single bound upon the altar, and, before a word of reply or remonstrance could reach him, disappeared.

"Mark," murmured the agitated Rose, "restored to me from the grave; look up! Providence has cleared your name; your hands are free from the blood of Springthorp. Sanders on his death-bed confessed everything. He it was who on New Year's night loaded his gun with the leaf torn from my Bible. Look up," she repeated; "you have one."

more a country—a home—a wife who has ever loved you, who will die with you."

The eyes of the wounded man met hers, and a faint smile proved that he fully comprehended the blest intelligence.

Meanwhile the doctor and his active little wife were anything but idle. With the assistance of Lady Bell, who seemed to have recovered all her former presence of mind and energy of character, she had removed Lillian to her own apartment, and succeeded in restoring her to perfect consciousness.

Again the sufferer murmured the name of Richard. "Safe, love, quite safe," said Mrs. Burke; "the doctor is with him."

"Dying! And for me! for me!"

"No, no," answered Lady Bell, who would once more have pressed her to her heart and wept over her, had not her companion, who had more presence of mind, wisely restrained her.

"Lillian," she said, taking the hands of the fair girl in hers, and at the same time looking earnestly into her eyes, "you know I never deceive any one; you can believe me?"

"Yes, yes."

"Well, then, Mr. Tyrrell is neither dying nor dead, only hurt—a flesh wound or two, which I would undertake to cure myself without troubling the doctor. Compose yourself for his sake—for all our sakes, and you shall see him—presently," she added, for in her eagerness to calm the agitated spirits of Lillian, the kind-hearted woman had asserted all that she hoped, rather than knew to be true.

The firm and almost stern tone in which these assurances were given did more to satisfy the sufferer than the most tender endearments could have done. Believing that her lover was no longer in danger, the rescued girl threw her arms round the neck of her adopted parent, and wept upon her bosom.

This time her tears were those of joy.

"Restored to you and my dear father!" she sobbed; "once more in the arms of those who love me! Is it real? Let me hear your voice, to prove to me that it is not a happy dream. Mother, pronounce the name of your child: call me Lillian—your own Lillian!"

The warm tears which fell fast upon her neck were the only answer she received.

"Real," cried Lillian, with a burst of gratitude, "real, and not a dream. Heaven has heard my prayers, and snatched me from the depths of the earth to light and happiness once more, restored me to you," she added, "still worthy of your love."

These words relieved her second parent from a doubt which wrung her heart with anguish to reflect upon; and for a time they continued to mingle their tears and caresses in silence.

Intense joy, like intense sorrow, seldom finds expression in language; its eloquence consists in tears.

Meanwhile the gallant 01st, under the command of the major, were far from idle; but continued to maintain a desperate contest with the Brahmins and numerous servitors of the goddess, who, to do them justice, fought bravely, though vainly; for the soldiers, excited by the carnage, and maddened by the recollection of Cawnpore, attacked them with irresistible fury—quarter being neither given nor taken on either side. In less than an hour they succeeded in driving them from hall to hall, from shrine to shrine, till everything like serious opposition was at an end, and the subterranean abode of cruelty and superstition completely in their power.

Amongst the dead was the Nautch girl, Kehoda, who in her jealous madness at seeing her former mistress rescued, and in the arms of our hero, had been the loddest in urging on her countrymen to interrupt their flight. A shot, fired at random, had ended her crimes and sorrows together.

"Well," said the major, seating himself upon one of the numerous idols which the soldiers had battered down, in order to recover his all but exhausted breath, "this is a discovery! Who would have imagined that such a nest of hornets existed so near to us, or that poor Lillian was their prisoner."

"Not the only discovery we have made," observed Wharton, at the same time pointing to the guns of the rajah, arranged systematically in order at the entrance end of the hall.

Plinlimmon started up half frantic with delight.

"Twenty-four pounders, by the harp of Hoel!" he exclaimed, patting them fondly; "talk of music, I would not exchange the music they can discourse for the sweetest singers of Italy. In capital order, too," he added, after examining them carefully, "and fit for service; the fools had not even the sense to spike them."

Two persons alone had been spared—the collector and the police magistrate, and they owed their lives to the interference of one of the officers, rather than the pity of the men.

"Why bring them to me?" demanded the major, angrily, as they were dragged before him each with his arms bound behind his back.

"We were here against our will!" exclaimed both the terrified wretches.

"No doubt of it," answered the Welshman, drily.

"And are servants, faithful servants of the Company," added the collector.

"Take them to the colonel, and see if he will believe 'em," said Major Plinlimmon, who, despite his fiery temper, did not like to give the order for taking their lives in cold blood.

"We can render you an immense service, and, at the same time, prove our fidelity," observed the magistrate, for the first time breaking silence.

"Bah!" replied the old soldier, angrily; "our swords had already done all the service we require. Take them away."

The Hindoo pointed to the guns.

Fred Wharton whispered a few words in the ear of his superior officer, who heard him at first impatiently, but gradually appeared to yield to his representations.

"Well," he exclaimed, addressing his prisoner, "what is it?"

"You have the cannon," said the collector.

"No thanks to you for that," interrupted the major.

"But you have neither balls nor sufficient ammunition," added the police magistrate, "to render them available."

This was one of those disagreeable truths there was no parrying. The supply of both was fearfully low.

"We can supply you with both," continued the speaker, "on condition that our lives are spared. More," he added, in a whisper: "point out to you the secret treasury of the temple."

"Hang the treasure!" interrupted the old soldier; "it's the powder and balls I require. Keep your promise respecting them, and, although it goes against my heart's grain to let two such sneaking, cowardly, shuffling, rascally curs escape the cord they so richly merit, I pass my word for your miserable safety."

The two Hindoos, eager to seal the compact beyond the power of recalling it with honour, proceeded at once to explain how Nadir had caused the passage leading from the ruined tower to the temple to be undermined, and had buried a vast quantity of ammunition there.

"Now then, for the treasure," said the major, as soon as he had satisfied himself, by actual inspection, that his prisoners had spoken truly.

The Hindoos hesitated; they imagined that the speaker had rescinded that part of the arrangement, and hoped to appropriate it to their own use.

"What!" exclaimed the speaker, "do you imagine that I will consent to rob my brave fellows of their prize to enrich a couple of traitorous rebels? No, no; the promise must be kept to the letter on either side, or not at all."

With bitter reluctance, which nothing but the fear of death could have overcome, the magistrate and collector led them to the cell formerly occupied by the chief Brahmin, and pointed to a stone in the centre of the pavement. By the united exertions of the soldiers the huge block was raised, discovering a recess, in which the vast accumulations of years of fraud and superstition were stored; jewels of widows who had perished by the infamous suttee, bags of coined gold, heap after heap, were handed up, and last of all a packet of papers.

"I will take charge of these," observed the major. "Burke will be able to make something out of them"—a supposition which proved correct, for the doctor with very little difficulty succeeded in deciphering the characters in which they were written, and the discovery afforded one of the hundred clues to the plans and movements of the rebel sepoys.

To guard against all possibility of a surprise, a guard was left in the lower temple whilst Plinlimmon and the rest of the party proceeded to rejoin their comrades in the one above.

Leaving the major to report the discovery they had made to Sir Charles, Fred Wharton hastened to seek out his friend, whose voice he had recognised in time to prevent the order, so incautiously given, to fire down the secret staircase, from being carried into effect. By his presence of mind he had saved not only the life of Richard, but, in all probability, that of Lillian.

As he anticipated, he found our hero in the quarters of the colonel, who, with Burke, were watching by his side. The latter had just finished dressing the numerous wounds of his patient when the young soldier entered the cell.

The features of the sufferer, now that the blood and smoke had been washed from them, appeared pale, rivalling the sculptured marble in their whiteness; still there was a feeling of content, nay, almost of happiness, in their expression; for, whether he lived or died, the lover knew that Lillian was rescued from the hands of her oppressor, and guarded by the jealous vigilance of affection, not a second time to be deceived, and ready, as he had proved himself, to die, if necessary, in her defence.

On seeing Wharton, he tried to hold out his hand, but it fell helplessly by his side, loss of blood had so weakened him.

"Not a word, my dear boy," said the doctor, placing his finger upon his lips: "I must positively forbid it. I am commander here; all must obey my orders now."

Wharton could not resist the melancholy satisfaction of grasping his friend's hand: it gently returned the pressure.

"You must see the major," whispered the young officer in the ear of his commander: "he has intelligence of importance."

Sir Charles rose at the call of duty, and, though his heart was wrung with grief, calmly quitted his seat by the side of the wounded sufferer and left the place.

"Lillian!" faintly murmured our hero, at the same time fixing his eyes imploringly upon his friend, as if assured that from his lips he would be sure to hear the truth.

"Is uninjured," said Burke; "my wife has assured me so. Strange," he muttered to himself, "that the opiate has taken no effect."

Still the eyes of Richard remained riveted upon those of Wharton.

"I can understand why it has not," observed the latter. "The pangs of doubt are stronger than your drugs, or even the agony of his wounds. I will satisfy him," he added, "at any risk."

So saying, he disappeared, and in a few moments returned with Lady Bell, who, bending over the couch of our hero, gently kissed him.

"Lillian sleeps," she whispered, soothingly; "the terrors she has passed through have exhausted her."

The poor fellow, unable to speak, pointed to her tears.

"They are for you, Richard," she added, "for is not the life of Lillian entwined with yours? Live for her dear sake—for the sake of home and all who love you; and in the morning, provided the doctor does not oppose it, I will bring her to you. Think what her heart must suffer, should she see you thus pale and feeble."

"Not a syllable," said Burke, addressing the wounded youth; "I can forgive his doubting my assertion—for doctors are permitted sometimes to deceive their patients; but nothing can excuse a doubt of words uttered by such lips."

A faint smile rested for an instant on the pale features of his patient, who soon afterwards fell into a gentle slumber, his hand resting in that of his faithful friend.

"What hope?" whispered Wharton to the doctor. "But a slender one," answered the kind-hearted man, in the same under tone. "Should fever set in no earthly skill can save him. It was a bold experiment you tried," he added, "but it has so far been successful that it calmed the agitation of his mind. The rest depends on Providence."

So saying, the speaker withdrew to attend to the wounded men who claimed his care. During the remaining hours of the night, the young soldier remained anxiously watching by the sleeper's side.

OUR HOMES SHOULD BE BEAUTIFUL.

NOT only should we cultivate such tempers as serve to render the intercourse of home amiable and affectionate, but we should strive to adorn it with those charms which good sense and refinement so easily impart to it. We say easily, for there are persons who think that a home cannot be benefited without a considerable outlay of money. Such people are in error. It costs little to have a neat flower-garden, and to surround your dwelling with those simple beauties which delight the eye far more than expensive objects. If you will let the sunshine and the dew adorn your yard, they will do more for you than any artist. Nature delights in beauty. She loves to brighten the landscape and make it agreeable to the eye. She hangs ivy around the ruin, and over the stump of a withered tree twines the graceful vine. A thousand arts she practises to animate the sense and please the mind. Follow her example, and do for yourself what she is always labouring to do for you. Beauty is one of God's chosen forms of power.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

WRITING is one of the most marvellous inventions—if it be an invention—to which the human intellect ever gave birth. That one should write, and another should read—should comprehend the meaning attaching to that remarkable combination of signs, and by means of them should understand the intentions of their writer, is something almost miraculous. It is common to us; and thus familiarised to the nature and power of letters, we enjoy the benefit without astonishment.

You can read. Perhaps your education is very limited. At a day school, for a short time in your early life, you learned to read, or perhaps this privilege was obtained at a Sunday school—all the week days being occupied in hard toil. Well; no matter how you acquired the art, you can read. And that, you say, is all. That is all! Is this the utterance of despondency? Is it the language of complaint? Do you sigh because you never enjoyed the happy shade of academic bowers? Do you imagine because you were never trained in the seminaries or colleges of our land, that the highway of knowledge is closed against you; and that you can never attain any position of excellence? Banish that thought. Look at the matter fairly. Observe how many there are who, notwithstanding their so-called advantages, have never risen above mediocrity; and how many there are who, without other help than that of a strong will, have reached the loftiest pinnacle of fame. You can read, and that is all. Instead of this being an occasion for despondency, let it be the key-note of a jubilant song. You can read, and that is all; for he who can read can accomplish all. In his own hand he holds the key of the temple of learning—a key that will open every lock, and admit to all the hidden chambers of its secret penetralia, that will thereby disclose to his enraptured gaze jewels more precious than Golconda yields, and gold more valuable and more durable than that of Australia. You can read. Step by step this leads you forward, and affords new pleasures at every turn. The stars in their courses above, the earth with its marvels beneath, the versatility and grandeur of nature around, the history of the world, the lore of the sage, the science of the philosopher, the dream of the poet, are all yours. You follow them into their own land, and hear them in their own language. But the key which admits you to all this is of homely form and of common material: you can read, and that is all.

If you can read, you want books. If you are bent on improvement, you require good books. Formerly the tolls on the highway of learning were so expensive that few could afford to travel that road. Good books were dear, so dear that only the wealthy could buy them. But we live in an age of cheap literature. The tolls are reduced so much that anybody can afford to pay them. Good books are cheap.

Now, if you can read, and are really anxious about improvement, you will naturally desire to begin with your own language, and to acquaint yourself thoroughly with the English grammar. There are thousands of Englishmen and Englishwomen who do not understand English. Why is this? Because they never gave themselves the trouble to study an English grammar. Because they considered English grammar a hard and uninviting pursuit, and because the grammarians, or writers of grammar, fortified them in this opinion by making the grammar as dull, and dry, and dreary as it was possible for them to do. This suggests the question which many of our correspondents have submitted—What grammar can I read, so as to understand it? Is there an intelligible grammar to be had?

We answer in the affirmative. Of all the books issued on this important subject, we can confidently recommend that of Professor Fowler, published in "The Educational Course." This work treats of the "English Language, in its Elements and Forms; with a History of its Origin and Development." In addition to the ordinary matter of an English grammar, viz., the laws and structure of our language, which will be found full of valuable instruction, the work treats of the historical elements of the language, describing all its various forms; with ample illustrations from the best writers. Such a work is worthy the attention of all conditions—of that of the ripe scholar, as well as the youthful pupil; but it is especially adapted for the use of those who are bent on self-improvement. To such the book is a real boon, as it is published at a price which places it within the reach of all.* As the depository of the wisdom and experience of past generations, the English language has come to us by inheritance, to be transmitted to the ages to come, enlarged and, if possible, improved. To the self-improver, therefore, the English language should form the first subject of study, as we should all venerate our native tongue as the first of our benefactors—the awakener and stirrer of our spiritual thoughts.

* It may be had complete, neatly bound, for 3s. 6d.; in weekly numbers, at 1d.; or in monthly parts, 7d.

The fiftieth.	Le cinquantième.
The sixtieth.	Le soixantième.
The seventieth.	Le soixante-dixième.
The eightieth.	Le quatre-vingtième.
The ninetieth.	Le quatre-vingt-dixième.
The hundredth.	Le centième.
The thousandth.	Le millième.
The millionth.	Le millionième.
The last but one.	L'avant-dernier.
The last.	Le dernier.

"Now for the date of the year. For instance, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight. Of course, in figures the French would represent this date in the same manner as we do; but with letters they write it thus, 'Mil huit cent cinquante-huit.' Observe that this mille is contracted into mil, and that there is not any s to cent, as there would be if cent were used in a common sense, thus, 'Deux cents hommes,' 'Two hundred men.'

"In speaking of the day of the month, the French use cardinal where we use ordinal numbers; but there is one exception,—they do not say le un, for the first of the month, but le premier. An example will explain this best. Supposing, on the first day of the month, I ask you, 'Quel jour du mois avons nous?' 'What day of the month is it?' you would answer, 'C'est le premier jour du mois'; but if it were the second, third, or fourth, &c. you would have to answer, 'C'est le deux, le trois, le quatre,' &c. 'C'est le vingt-et-un' is the correct expression for 'It is the twenty-first.' 'C'est le vingt-deux, le vingt-trois,' &c. for 'It is the twenty-second, the twenty-third,' &c.; but, for 'The last day of the month,' you should say, 'Le dernier jour du mois.'

"These idioms relating to the date of the year, and the day of the month, are so important, that I shall refer to them again when, in the course of things, we come to the numeral adjectives; but the rules I have given you to-day will be very useful to you; and as they have taken up a good portion of the time I can spare you to-day, we must put off the continuation of the 'Voyage à Paris' till next lesson. In doing this, I follow the plan I have pursued with you from the beginning; namely, that of making you dwell on whatever became most important in your pursuit of the attainment of French. You have sometimes been obliged to neglect one or other department, according to circumstances; but until you had mastered it, I have never allowed you to lose sight of any branch of study in the French language.

"The formation of the plural of nouns is our next consideration. Generally speaking, the French, like ourselves, form the plural by adding an s to the singular; but this remark does not apply to any French nouns that end in s, x, or z. They are the same in the singular and the plural. Thus—le fils, the son; les fils, the sons; la voix, the voice; les voix, the voices; le nez, the nose; les nez, the noses. Nouns ending in au, eu, and ou, form their plural by adding an x to the singular; for instance, le bateau, the boat; les bateaux, the boats; le feu, the fire; les feux, the fires; le vœu, the vow; les vœux, the vows. Nouns of one syllable ending in al, form their plural by adding s to the singular, but you must except mal, evil, which makes maux, evils; and nouns, of more than one syllable, ending in al also change this final for aux in the plural, thus, le cheval, the horse; les chevaux, the horses. The simple addition of an s forms the plural of words ending in ou, but there are exceptions to this rule, for instance, chou, cabbage; caillou, pebble; bijou, jewel; genou, knee; hibou, owl; and joujou, plaything; form their plural by adding x to the singular; and email, enamel; bail, bail; soupirail, vent-hole; and travail, labour, form their plural by changing ail into aux.

"Words of more than one syllable, ending in nt, become plural by exchanging the t for an s, but words of only one syllable, ending in nt, do not drop the t, but add an s to the original word. Now for an example of these rules—le moment, the moment; les moments, the moments; le gant, the glove; les gants, the gloves.

"The French, like ourselves, have some words that form their plural, irrespective of all rules. For instance, ail, garlic; aule, heads of garlic; bétail, cattle; bestiaux, cattle (when not used as collective nouns); aïeul, grandfather; aïeux, ancestors; ciel, heaven; cieux, heavens.

"In the exercise I am about to give you, observe that where a line is placed under a word, it signifies that the said word is the same in French as it is in English. Until you have committed to memory the rules for the formation of the plural, you will often have to refer to them, and also to recollect that some words written the same, form their plural differently, if used in a different sense. Thus the grandfathers, if not meaning the ancestors, should be written aïeuls, not aïeux. The skies of a picture should be les ciels, not les cieux. The word enfant, child (contrary to the general rule of words of more than one syllable ending in nt), forms its plural by the addition of s to the singular.

"Another thing I wrote for you to observe is, that in the 'corrigé,' this semicircular mark ˘ indicates that the final letter blends with the beginning of the next word.

OF THE SOUND i.

This sound is similar to that of the English letter i in the word heat, &c.

This sound has no difficulty when represented by the letter i; but it is also produced by y, and then some explanations are necessary.

The letter y is preceded either by a vowel or a consonant; when preceded by a consonant, y sounds exactly like i: as in the words symétrie, symmetry;

sybille, sybil, &c.; but when this letter is preceded by a vowel, then it takes sometimes the place of i; the first i is joined with the preceding vowel, and forms a diphthong with it, as we shall see hereafter, in speaking of these sounds; and the other i either forms a syllable by itself or is joined to the next letter or letters to form a syllable with them; as in the words abbaye, convent, which is pronounced as if written abbai-ye; moyen, which is pronounced moi-ien, in which oi and ien form two diphthongs; but there are words in which y, although placed between two vowels, keeps its natural sound of i, as in payen.

In the verbs whose infinitive is written with a y, as envoyer, to send, payer, to pay, &c., the letter y may be followed by a mute syllable; if the next syllable is mute, y is replaced by i, which then sounds as this letter would, according to the formation of the syllable; as in the words je paie, I pay, j'envoie,

I send, ils paient, they pay, ils envoient, they send; if the next syllable is not mute, then y sounds as i, as we have already said; as in the words nous payons, nous pai-ions, we pay; vous essayez, vous essayez (the two sounds ("i") must be pronounced quickly).

In some tenses of these verbs, as the imperfect and present of the subjunctive, the letter y is followed by an i; as nous envoyions, we sent; que nous essayions, then y sounds as a single i, and the words, being written as with i, are pronounced, as has been stated above; nous envoi-ions, que nous essayi-ions—oi, ion, forming two diphthongs.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XV.

MECHANICS OF FLUIDS.

THE SIPHON.

406. What is a siphon?—It is a bent tube, having its two branches of unequal length. Fig. 32.

407. To what general purpose is it applied?—To draw water and other liquids from vessels.

408. How does it operate?—The shorter leg is plunged into the vessel of water, the mouth is then applied to the lower end, and the siphon filled with water by suction.

409. Will the water continue to run after the mouth is taken away?—It will.

410. The pressure of the air on the water in the vessel should fill the siphon with water as soon as the air is sucked out of it—but why should the water afterward flow steadily out at the lower end?—

Fig. 32.

Because there is a pressure in all parts of the tube to keep it flowing in that direction.

411. Show that this is the case at the top of the siphon.—The pressure of the air acts upward at both ends of the siphon; and the pressure at each end is loaded with the weight of water in that leg.

412. What follows from that?—The pressure at the end of the short leg has the smallest load upon it, therefore the pressure transmitted from that end to the top of the siphon will be the greatest.

SOUND.

NATURE AND PRODUCTION OF SOUND.

413. What kind of motion has a stretched cord when it is drawn to one side, and suddenly let go?—It vibrates to and fro, like a pendulum. This is represented in Fig. 33. The dotted lines show the extent of the vibrations.

Fig. 33.

414. How is the nature of sonorous vibrations illustrated in the diagram?—The central line in the figure represents an extended cord or wire. Suppose this cord to be forcibly drawn out to A, and let go, it would immediately recover its original position by virtue of its elasticity; but when it reached the central point it would have acquired so much momentum as to pass onward to a; thence it would vibrate back in the same manner to B, and back again to b; so on with the other letters, until it at length returned to a state of rest.

415. What happens during each vibration of the cord?—The cord acts against the air with a certain force, and sound is produced.

416. How is sound produced by a vibrating cord, or any other vibrating body?—The vibrations of the sounding body are communicated to the surrounding air; and spreading in all directions through the air, reach the ear.

417. What is the impression they make on the nerves within the ear called?—The Sensation of Sound.

418. What does the vibratory or trembling motion imparted to the air, and spreading out in all directions from the body, form?—A spherical Wave of Sound.

419. Do the particles rise and fall in a wave of sound, as in a wave of water?—They do not; they move forward and backward through a very short distance—that is, directly from and toward the sounding body.

420. Does a sounding body send out a regular succession of waves, corresponding to the successive vibrations?—It does.

421. What does each wave convey to the ear?—The slight impulse with which the body acts against the air, and originates the wave.

422. If we consider only the trembling movement that is conveyed, or propagated, by a single line of particles reaching from the body to the ear—what have we?—What is sometimes called a Ray of Sound.

423. Does a sounding body send out rays of sound in all directions?—It does; and they all proceed with the same velocity.

424. Do sounds differ in their character or quality?—They do. We distinguish between the crack of a whip, the report of a pistol, and the blow of a hammer; the sounds produced by the filing of a saw are harsh and grating to the ear, while the notes of a flute are soft and pleasing.

425. How is it that the ear thus distinguishes between sounds?—The vibrations of sounding bodies are all faithfully repeated in the ear; and all their peculiarities are impressed on the delicate nerves of the ear.

426. Mention a fact or two in illustration of the great delicacy of the human ear.—A practised ear can distinguish between two sounds, the one having 80 vibrations in a second, and the other 81. It can also distinguish the different instruments of a band, when playing together the same note.

427. When a larp string is struck, or an empty glass tumbler tapped with the finger-nail, why do we hear a MUSICAL SOUND?—Because the vibrations of the string or glass are repeated with perfect regularity.

428. When the impulses on the ear succeed each other at exactly equal intervals, the sound is then a pleasing one—does the ear take notice of the rapidity of the vibrations?—It does, with the greatest nicety. If one musical string vibrates more rapidly than another, it produces a sound of a higher Pitch.

BLIND MINNIE.

FRANK strove to calm himself to think of what was now before him—of the disclosures he must now make. A feeling of utter despair crept over him as he anticipated the consequences of his confession. He felt sure that Minnie's guileless soul would not alone not approve of, but would not comprehend the train of reasoning which had been so powerful upon his mind—that she would never consent to receive his protection as a husband, whom she had so long considered as a brother. Would she not rather turn shudderingly from one who had so deceived her? Would she not, to escape him, turn gladly to the honest, manly affection of the young physician? She might perchance even now return his regard! The thought was maddening. In fevered fancy, he saw her turn from him with abhorrence, and take refuge in the strong, loving arms of his rival. He felt that Dr. Hall was worthy of her trust, while he, by his fault, although committed through an earnest, however misguided desire for her happiness, had forfeited his claim to her respect and confidence. The punishment was, perhaps, merited; but it seemed too severe to bear. He sat with clenched hands, and groaned in speechless agony; he could not pray. His mind was paralysed; his heart alone spoke loudly in its terrible forebodings. Thus the dreadful hours passed until twilight, when Minnie, who had been eagerly waiting for him, and anxiously listening to every sound from his chamber, unable longer to bear this painful suspense, again knocked upon his door, and entreated of him, in mercy, to come and tell her what had happened, that she could not wait longer. He mechanically rose, opened the door, and suffered the young girl to lead him to their accustomed seat; then, clinging to him, she said—

"Brother, dearest brother, tell me your misfortune! Let me share your sorrow!"

Shrinking from her, in a hasty voice he replied— "Ah, yes! sadly you must share it." Then, gathering sudden energy, he began: "Minnie, Dr. Hall came to me to-day, and said—Minnie, he wishes to marry you."

"To marry me, brother! Why do you jest in this strange fashion?"

"Jest," repeated the young man, bitterly; "'tis no jest. He loves you; he has asked me to tell you so, and I—here his voice became broken, and he convulsively exclaimed—"oh, how can I part from you!"

"Frank, can it be that you have given yourself and me so much needless distress for such a cause? I will not leave you. I marry? No, no—never! You surely would not have me do so!"

"Minnie, do you not love him?"

"Love him! Why do you speak so?" cried the young girl. "He is so good—so generous! I esteem him; but love! I love no one but you, my own dear brother! I will stay with you, and no one else shall serve me so long as we both live."

These words brought life and warmth again to Frank's heart, but not happiness. He felt that he must go on, and hoarsely asked—

"If you had no brother, Minnie, would you then—"

"Then would I?" slowly repeated the young girl. "How can I answer such an absurd supposition? Then—then—yes, he is so true, so noble; perhaps his love would win mine. Yes, I should then probably accept the protection so generously offered. But God be praised that no such alternative is necessary! How happy I am that I have a brother willing to cherish me—nay, loving me so intensely that the bare possibility of losing my valuable self overwhelms him with misery so violent that I had prepared myself to hear of some calamity, such as the world had never before suffered!"

Frank pressed her hands to his lips and eyes, without attempting a reply. Minnie continued—

"But that good Dr. Hall! How sorry I am! How could he fancy me? A blind girl may do well enough for a sister; but for one voluntarily to select as a wife—'tis incomprehensible! Frank, do you know I think his offer to me may have been prompted rather by the romantic generosity of his character than by any idea that I can make him happy? I understand it now. He imagines my situation a cheerless one; he wishes to bring comfort and tender care to lighten my darkness. Ah, the noble soul! But we will show him, while we thank him, and bless his goodness, how happy we are together—that my brother so surrounds me with his thoughtful kindness, and so fills my heart, that I need no one else. Oh, Frank!" she exclaimed, after a pause, "how relieved I feel! You have made me very wretched this afternoon."

"And do you forgive me?" he asked.

"Yes; that is on condition that you promise never no wrong me again by such evil imaginings. And now let us no longer talk of these things. Oh, I feel 'to happy!' and, for the first time since the death of her father, the young girl's face beamed with an expression of joyful-heartedness.

Frank watched her with most agitated emotions. She was so lovely, so confiding in her happiness, he had no courage to check her childlike trust. He allowed her to ramble on, uninterruptedly, from one subject to another, until he, too, gradually became calm, and at length lively. The evening stole away; they parted for the night, his bitter secret still confined to his own breast.

Day after day passed, each filled with business cares to the young man; for each evening, Minnie had some plan of amusement. Either she wished to hear Frank read aloud, or he must walk out with her; then she would sing to him one of the ballads which, as she told him, their mother had loved. She would suddenly cease singing to relate to him some scene which her song awakened in her memory; often some incident of pain or want which had befallen her parents during past years; and the tears would flow fast upon her soft cheek. At such times, Frank would even rejoice that he had kept his secret, that thus he might ever save the fair girl from such suffering in the future; but in the quiet of his own chamber, the feeling that sooner or later she must know the truth would startle him, and he would struggle with himself for courage to confess it at once; but the recollection that she had told him that, had her brother not sent for them, they should have gone to one of the asylums for the poor and sick in England, since they would never consent to accept of private charities, &c., opened to his view such a train of miseries to the young girl, as the consequence of his confession, that he felt almost persuaded that he was not wrong in continuing to deceive her, since thus alone could he fulfil his promises and her brother's wishes. Often, too, his ever-increasing love for her would urge him to tell her, and entreat her to become his wife; but a glance at the guileless purity of her face, would send his secret shrinking back into the home where it had so long lain hidden. I do not defend him—I say not that he was right; but, reader, let those alone who have been tempted on all points as sorely as was our hero, and who have withstood the temptation, judge him. We must pity him.

During this time, Frank received from America some astonishing and pleasing news. Some acres of land, which his own father had purchased in one of the western territories, and had presented to his son while the latter was an infant, having become necessary to the government for public use, had been bought for a very considerable sum of money from Mr. Elm, his step-father. Mr. Elm was a man of the strictest integrity, notwithstanding his uncharitable judgment against his step-son (though, in the affair which separated them, Frank afterwards acknowledged that he himself had been most in fault), and made unceasing efforts, private and public, to discover the young man, if he were alive.

Frank had, on his arrival in India, written a letter to his little half-sister (his mother had been dead three years), and intrusted it to one of the sailors of the vessel which had brought him over, to be delivered to her; this the good sailor had faithfully done. The child, fearing her father's displeasure, had never dared tell him of the receipt of this letter until now, when she knew that his anxiety to hear of the young man would make her communication welcome. His step-father had at once written to him, informing him of his unexpected wealth.

Poor Frank! He could ask sympathy of no one in his good fortune. How he longed to call upon Minnie to share his joy! but it was impossible. Frank wrote to Mr. Elm, thanking him for his kindness, and requesting him to send him a specified amount, and to make profitable investment of the balance in the United States, whither he hoped some future day to return.

If Minnie might not share the knowledge of his new wealth, at least she should enjoy the benefits it could confer. He delighted to surround her with comfort and luxury—to indulge her fondness for books—to gratify her tastes in every way. Hearing that there was an excellent harp to be bought at a private sale, he purchased it, and enjoyed Minnie's delicious surprise as he noiselessly placed it before her, and begged her to strike a few chords for him. He describes it as the happiest moment he had ever yet known, when, with a cry of joy, and a gush of tears, Minnie alternately embraced the harp and the donor.

Nor did Frank forget their faithful attendant, Ann. He rejoiced her heart by many a gift for her comfort or pleasure, and enabled her to give many a pleasant tea-party to the select circle of friends she had made during her residence in Bombay. Ann sometimes received these favours with grateful thanks; but, at others, she would seriously reproach the young man for his waste of money, "just as if he had a gold mine," she said. Minnie, too, would often rebel against what she called his "extravagant fondness" for herself, declaring that he must stint himself to lavish upon her luxuries which were suited to a princess; but the young man would merrily protest that she was a princess, and that he could afford far more than she could ever require.

Frank's greatest enjoyment was to deck their cheerful, airy parlour like a fairy bower with all the most lovely flowers that luxuriant land afforded; then to watch her angelic smile, her sylph-like form, as she floated among them, the "fairest lily of all the bower;" or to sit at her feet, with the soft, balmy breeze playing around them, and read to her, or hear her sing, or listen to the unworldly expression of her serene, heavenly-pure thoughts. They received no visitors; the past was forgotten in the dream-like present. True, each day, life presented to Frank its most unromantic business-face; but at twilight he entered the charmed atmosphere of his home, there to dream himself in Paradise until the morrow's sun.

Minnie, too, felt perfectly contented with her seclusion from the world. From childhood, she had been accustomed to few companions; she, therefore, missed them not. If, during the warm, long day, she felt fatigued by her usual light occupations, she would listen to her good Ann as she told the legends of India, which had taken great hold upon the poor woman's fancy—of the strange, heathenish, yet poetical customs of the people, which her friends had witnessed. Minnie would while away many hours with her harp, either in practising, or recalling the dear old melodies her mother had taught her in her childhood, or she would improvise melody and words, awakened by the feelings of the moment; then, in the evening, her brother was always there, loving and kind. What could she desire more? Naught, save that now and then a sigh would escape her that she could not see the beautiful objects by which her brother had surrounded her—that she could not look upon his face, nor upon the luxuriant nature around them; for she felt that the perfumed breeze which so gently waved her hair, and which she could hear softly rustling through the apartment, must come over a land enchanting to behold, of which her brother gave her such glowing descriptions. But she murmured not, feeling how mercifully Providence had provided for her need in the tender care of her brother. They were both very, very happy.

One evening, their quiet, dreamy life was disturbed by a knock at the door, and then the hearty voice of the younger Mr. Robson, asking for Frank Howard, who started to his feet just in time to greet his employer.

"Frank, my lad, and my fair young lady," said the latter, "excuse my intrusion. I have just read in one of my European papers something which I thought might be of interest to you both. But bless me, Frank, if this is not the fairest bit of God's handiwork I ever set eyes upon!" cried the old gentleman, gazing in admiring surprise upon Minnie. "You are a cunning fellow to keep your sister so quietly hidden here, and wise, too; otherwise such a pearl would not long be yours."

Frank bent down his head, and kissed Minnie's fair hands to conceal the painful emotion these words awakened; then answered, hastily—

"Truly, sir, she is to me a pearl beyond all price. Life would be a weary journey without her brightening, cheering presence."

"I can well believe it, my boy. May you never lose her, unless, indeed, you give her to me. I am positively in love with her already. Don't seize her poor little hands so vehemently. She is in no danger from me now; but were my years and gray hairs fewer—then—then—"

The old gentleman imprinted a kiss upon the hand of the fair girl which spoke of tender interest.

So thought Frank, and he replied in a tone half jest, half earnest: "Tis lucky for me, my dear sir, that you do consider yourself beyond being my rival—otherwise you might do incalculable mischief."

"I should try it, I promise you; yet I don't know that you would be in much danger, for she could not have a more adoring lover than you seem to be," said Mr. Robson, glancing at the young couple before him and then around the room with an approving smile. Turning to Minnie, he added: "He proves how deeply he values his jewel, by the tasteful casket in which he has enshrined it. You remind me, lovely lady, of an enchanted princess, in your flower-decked prison."

ALONE.

Patient and faithful, and tender and true,
Praying, and thinking, and working for you—
Bearing all-silently sorrow for years—
Hopefully striving to conquer my fears;
Say, did my patience, my tenderness, truth,
Merit not more than the blight of my youth?

Give me once more my wild energy back,
Give me the hopes that illumined life's track;
Give me the faith that I wasted on you—
Give me the love that I squandered thereto.
You cannot: too lightly you cast them aside,
And for you and all others those feelings have died.

Yet, though the hopes that I cherished are dead,
And though the light from my spirit hath fled,
Though 'twas doubting in God when I doubted in you—
As my standard and type of the real and the true;
O'er the wreck of my life I would never repine,
If the peace I have lost were but added to thine.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE, K.C., P.C.

We have much gratification in presenting to our readers the accompanying portrait of the Earl of Carlisle. It is a faithful copy of an excellent photograph by Mayall, and will no doubt be recognised as a very successful likeness. The distinguished nobleman whom we are thus enabled to introduce enjoys a widely-extended popularity; and while as a peer of the realm he is entitled to respectful homage, while as a statesman he has claims on the gratitude of his countrymen, his nobler claim is that of his hearty sympathy with all that concerns the welfare and progress of the people, and on this account we offer him our best tribute of thanks.

The Earl of Carlisle has invariably shown his attachment to the people. He has not estranged himself from the multitude, nor prided himself in his inherited nobility. In him the labours of the educationist have met with a warm friend and an earnest and indefatigable supporter; and, whether giving liberally from his purse, or advocating the popular cause in the senate, or lecturing on some interesting topic to an audience of mechanics, he has co-operated manfully in the good work of human progress, and has won for himself a brighter glory than can be conferred by a coronet.

The earldom of Carlisle dates from the thirteenth year of the reign of King Charles II. (1661.) The present earl is the seventh inheritor of the title. He was born in the year 1802, but until his accession to the earldom in 1848, he bore by courtesy the title of Lord Morpeth. At an early age he entered on public life, and was for several years attached to the British embassy at St. Petersburg. He was subsequently returned to parliament for Yorkshire, and was nominated to the chief secretaryship for Ireland under the Melbourne ministry.

In Ireland Lord Morpeth won golden opinions of all men. He was universally beloved. And he well deserved all the favourable things which were said of him, all the sympathy of his friends, and all the concessions frankly made by his political opponents. He was an earnest, truthful man, unwilling to shirk any responsibility, and keenly alive to the obligations which rested upon him.

When the Whigs were reinstated in 1846, the Earl of Carlisle was appointed Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and succeeded Lord Campbell as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. On the accession of Lord Palmerston to the premiership in 1855, he received the appointment of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. When the advisability of abolishing this office was debated last year in the house, Mr. Disraeli tendered a delicate but well-earned compliment to the earl, a compliment all the more valuable on account of their political antagonism.

"Now, we are told," said he, "that Lord Carlisle is a dancer, and that he knows the difference between a bull and a pig. I sat in this house for ten years with Lord Carlisle; and let me remind the house that these were not ordinary times. This house then reckoned amongst its members probably a greater number of celebrated men than it ever contained at any other time. At other times, indeed, there may have been individual examples of higher intellectual powers, but a greater number of great men never flourished than during these ten years. Lord Morpeth met them upon equal terms. Lord Morpeth took a great part in our greatest debates. Lord Morpeth was a man remarkable by his knowledge, his accomplishments, and his commanding eloquence. Lord Morpeth had been secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and these honourable gentlemen pay no compliment to the House of Commons, where he filled so considerable a space, when they say that having come to Ireland, it is found out that Lord Morpeth is only a dancer, and one who can decide between the merits of bulls and pigs."

The idle and trivial objections urged against the noble earl were unworthy of the dignified position held by those who made them; and the charge made against the vice-royalty, namely, that it was corrupt in its influence, was one which could never be maintained while the office was held by a nobleman so far above suspicion as the Earl of Carlisle. No single instance could be alleged of a corrupt exercise of the patronage attached to that dignity. What was said of another viceroy may fairly be said of Carlisle: "He lives in the hearts and recollections of the people, whose interests he laboured to promote, and whose affairs he administered."

The Earl of Carlisle is an eloquent and impressive speaker. His oratory is chaste and elegant; his illustrations appropriately selected, and his arguments clear and logical. He possesses the ability of adapting himself to his audience in no ordinary degree; and, whether addressing his peers or lecturing at a mechanics' institute, he is comprehensive without diffuseness, polished without affectation, and forcible without violence.

As a man of letters, the Earl of Carlisle has acquired an honourable reputation. He travelled in America a few years ago, and, in the form of lectures, has given the result of his experience to the world. He has since visited the East, and has published his impressions of his tour under the title of "Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters." His lordship is also a munificent patron of art, and his family seat, Castle Howard, contains a splendid collection of pictures, and is especially rich in the works of English masters.

Less than an hour's journey from Baden, by the green lanes and the pine and oak forest, are the ruins of an old castle covering the summit of the Schlossberg, and inviting the attention of all pleasure-seeking tourists.

Long ago, when the world was eighteen centuries younger, the Romans built a tower on that mountain; and their work has formed the nucleus of all the subsequent erections, enlarged, rebuilt, or modified by the margraves of the duchy. One of these, in the fifteenth century, built a strong bastion and surrounded it with walls; later, the Margrave Christopher began and completed a noble castle, imposing in appearance, commodious in arrangement, and of almost invulnerable strength. The margrave was proud of his work. Baden regarded it with admiration. The stony strength of the castle would "laugh a siege to scorn." So it maintained its reputation till 1689, when the French generals looking on the structure with anything but favour, and believing that its destruction would be conducive to the success of their own operations, brought to bear upon it the united efforts of a siege train and a well-contrived mine, the result of which is seen in the picturesque ruin which it is the bounden duty of all tourists to visit.

Vanitas vanitatum. Behold it is written everywhere. Old Roman tower, mediæval structure, modern castle, blown into a romantic ruin by French guns, and coming to be nothing more than a place for holiday resort. The builders of these old castles little anticipated the result of their labours. The grand old knights of chivalry, and the fair ladies who inflamed their love, they thought not of the tribes that would come up to quaff champagne or drink bottled porter in their baronial mansions.

But the romantic ruin on the top of the Schlossberg, after being blown into a picturesque chaos by the French guns, gradually crumbled in decay, until its condition rendered it unsafe for visitors to inspect its tottering walls. Therefore, in 1833, the Grand-duke Leopold drew the attention of the inspector of the Heidelberg gardens to the state of matters at Schlossberg, and empowered that gentleman to undertake such alterations and repairs as would render the venerable structure convenient and secure. To manufacture a ruin, is an art; to restore a ruin, is an art also. Artificial ruins are frequently constructed to add to the attractions of parks and gardens; mutilated Grecian temples, dilapidated Gothic chapels, half hidden by trees, and overgrown with creeping plants, add to the beauty of a landscape. Much taste and ingenuity has been shown in their construction. To some people they may suggest poetical and romantic imaginings, but to most of us they are too theatrical to suggest anything but footlights and painted canvas. But when we cannot obtain real ruins, artificial ruins are in request. On the banks of the Rhine, no such artifice is necessary. There are ruins on every height. They cover the ground. They encounter you at every turn of the road; frown upon you as you glide down the stream—grim old castles, which are so old that they have no record of their own age. The castle of which we give an engraving is only one of a hundred. Here the Imagination may wander, in company with History for its grave and truthful cicerone; and while it beholds "in the mind's eye" the feudal glory of the old margraves, it may rest assured that it is actually within the place which they once tenanted. We may ascend the tower, and look out upon a quiet and varied landscape, over the Black Forest and the Rhine-plain, to where the gray mountains of the Vosges mark the horizon. To the poet and the painter, the antiquarian, or the mere idler, there is, therefore, much to interest—much to enjoy.

Amongst the good things to be enjoyed is the collation spread—a place of all others the most inappropriate—in the ancient chapel of the castle. Surely this must be offensive to the intelligent visitor: the clatter of knives and forks, or the popping of champagne corks by obsequious attendants, jar on the ear. But so it is: crusaders, anchorites, captive ladies rescued by invincible champions,—battles, triumphs, and defeats—all pass away, and are no more than "the dream of the shadow of smoke," at that important English query—what shall we have for dinner?

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

See, she comes forth like the sun of the morning—
Joy on her lip and deep love in her eye;
Bright orange-blossoms her beauty adorning;
And if she sighs, it is pleasure's soft sigh.—ANON.

LADY GLENLONELY wished that the wedding should be a gay one; for the world of fashion was still pent up in London. The season was a protracted one, and people with noble halls and castles and fine parks and gardens were still glad to be cooped in stone walls and crowded streets—every night half suffocated, crushed, elbowed, torn, to show themselves at parties that gave them no pleasure, and to meet people for whom they cared not a pin.

Lady Glenlonely wished Ada's marriage to be a very brilliant affair.

"If we can but get the duke to give you away, as he did Lady Vacant Stare's daughter," she said, "and the Bishop of London to marry you, and you have twelve bridesmaids, all peers' daughters; if Gunter supplies the breakfast, and your wedding dress comes from that Parisian milliner so much in vogue, your maiden career, which has been such a failure hitherto, will end with great éclat; and I shall feel a little proud of you after all."

But Ada's views were very different, and so were Gerald's.

"Why should I be given away by 'the duke,'" she said, "mamma, when his grace would think it a great bore (as I hear he always does), and papa, whose province it is, will be so happy to give me to Gerald? I have no friend a peer's daughter, and I think a bridesmaid should love one as a sister. The dear old rector at Pemberton has always promised to marry me, and I always said he should. He will be proud and glad to do so, and, I dare say, the bishop would think it a great condescension. I think a bride should be elegantly dressed in white, and a veil, an orange-wreath becomes her well, but I do not like display on such occasions, nor does Gerald. I wish to have no bridesmaid but Ellen St. Ange. I should like my wedding to be as quiet and private as possible, and I wish to have only a few old friends invited, who take a real interest in our happiness."

Lady Glenlonely had scarcely patience to hear Ada out. When she had ceased speaking, her ladyship said—

"I am not at all surprised, after the low tastes I have remarked in you of late, and with which you have infected Gerald, that you should wish to wind up your maiden career in the contemptible, humdrum manner in which you have for some months past delighted to live. You have long been, in my opinion, a disgrace to your family. You were so when your father was only a baronet; now that he is a peer of the realm, your conduct is more than ever reprehensible in its odious and abject singularity, and the contrast it offers to that of all other young ladies of rank and fashion. I think, considering that Gerald and yourself seem to me to be 'New Lights,' or Methodists, or Mormonites, or something of that kind, that the more private your wedding, and, indeed, all your arrangements are, the better; and though, as I am a great enemy to vulgar family quarrels, I shall not refuse to be present at your wedding—for I used to like Gerald, and as he is sure to be Lord Arncliffe, I highly approve of the connection—I shall give myself no trouble at all about it, and you can have it all your own way."

Lady Glenlonely kept her word and her temper; she did not interfere at all.

The old rector of Pemberton, who had christened Ada and prepared her for confirmation, pronounced the nuptial blessing; Lord Glenlonely gave the beautiful, blushing bride away, and the few who saw her in her spotless white robes, her orange-wreath, and bridal veil, which did not conceal her tears, her smiles, and blushes, said a fairer bride had never said, "I will."

Ellen St. Ange, her father, and the now celebrated Mrs. Golightly were the only people at Ada's wedding, except the old rector and his son the curate, who were not near relations; but several hundred happy ones met to celebrate the event on Wimbledon Common. Lord Arncliffe, Gerald's brother, had a beautiful villa at Wimbledon, and, as his dairy there was famous, Gerald, at Ada's suggestion, had asked him to place the cows at their disposal for one afternoon, that of the wedding-day, in order that the assembled happy party might enjoy syllabubs from the cows, and all other luxuries connected with a dairy.

Lord Arncliffe, who was an invalid, and staying at Harrogate, which he was not strong enough to leave, even for his brother's wedding, gave his consent, and placed everything at the villa at the disposal of his fair sister-in-law, Lady Ada, the bride of his brother.

And who were those hundreds of guests who were to meet on Wimbledon Common, or rather to repair thither in a body, to enjoy a merry holiday in honour of Ada's nuptials? The children of the Green Fields Ragged School, and not the children alone, the adult pupils, the teachers, every one connected with that admirable, that invaluable institution. The members of the mothers' meetings, and indeed of all its departments were invited; vans wreathed with flowers and decorated with flags and ribbon of every colour of the rainbow, conveyed the poor little ones, "the ragged tidied up a bit," as their poor mothers would have said, many of whom saw the country, and breathed the fresh air, and plucked a wild flower for the first time in their clouded, blighted lives.

Mr. Stephen, who was never so happy as when diffusing happiness, managed the whole business, and it required a good head to manage it.

Larky Grigg, Hope Evermore, Merry Blossom, Carrotty Meg, and Stunning Steenie were in one of the vans, as belonging to the Green Fields Ragged School, and Apple Blossom, Bob, Jem Goodman, Lame Luke, the old Trudges, Mrs. Posset, and young Tom Trudge (Merry Blossom's beau) had a jaunting car to themselves.

It was a glorious summer day. The sun, who often withholds his rays from a royal marriage, and pours forth his flood of radiance on "a penny wedding," seemed to shine with unwonted lustre in honour of Ada and the ragged school festival.

Ada was married in town, and even her ambitious and fastidious mother was obliged to own that a lovelier bride never hid her tears and blushes beneath a bridal veil.

Her dress was simple, but it was an elegant simplicity. The daughter of Lord Glenlonely, and the bride of the Honourable Gerald St. Maur, M.P., heir presumptive to the Arncliffe peerage, did not affect to dress like a village bride. The only difference between Ada and the other young daughters of rank, wealth, and fashion who kneel at the same altar, was in the quiet and chastened elegance of her adornment. She did not look as too many brides do—as if they were going to a ball, and were coquettishly arrayed for universal conquest. There was no display—which is always objectionable in the morning, and on so solemn an occasion—of her beautiful neck and arms. She did not rustle about in rich silk or satin. As it was summer, a richly-embroidered Indian muslin rose to her fair throat, and was there fastened by a pearl brooch. An orange wreath crowned her pure and noble brow, and a veil of Honiton lace, thrown over her head and face, fell round her graceful form, even to her feet.

She was the very beau idéal of a bride; and even her mother thought so, and felt proud of her, and regretted that none but nobodies—or those she considered such—were present to greet her.

Gerald St. Maur could not absent himself long from his parliamentary duties; and the honeymoon was to be spent at Lord Arncliffe's villa at Wimbledon.

As the day was so fine, the excellent dinner provided for the ragged school children was spread out of doors. The bride and bridegroom presided.

Ellen St. Ange was a little paler even than her wont. Perhaps the sight of her friend's happiness brought back memories of an early dream: but she exerted herself; she would not be sad on Ada's wedding-day; and, after the repast—which was a very merry one, though nothing fermented or distilled appeared on the table—Ellen set the enraptured little ones to play all kinds of games; and even Lady Glenlonely—though she had at first resolved to stay in town, and had only joined the party with the determination of finding fault with everything—was extremely fascinated by the innocent, delicate loveliness of little Hope Evermore, and twined the child's long, golden ringlets round her own delicate, jewelled fingers and sighed, for they reminded her of some fair locks hid for ever from the light of day by a coffin-lid (at least, she feared so), and a feeling of remorse stung her as she recalled them—those locks so bright! the memories that surrounded them so dark and dreary! And little Hope seemed to like Lady Glenlonely. She did not try to get away to join the others in their games. Lady Glenlonely had a look of Ada, and Hope loved Ada with all her little, warm, loyal, affectionate heart. It was not till the fine lady grew weary of the noise and the emui, and entered the house to lie down on a sofa and amuse herself with the last new novel, that little Hope yielded to Larky's wish, and darted off with him in search of wild flowers.

Oh, what delight to these town children did every daisy, with its yellow face and neat white-frilled nightcap, impart; how every green spiral plume of fern, every delicately scented cuckoo's-bed and ladies'-finger, filled their little hearts with a rapture never to be forgotten!—what bright-looking stones they collected from a clear brook, and what dull things they looked when they got them home! What games they had, what races, what gambols!—touch-wood, French and English, wolf and shepherd. And the cows and the syllabubs; such fine, fat, fragrant cows!—their glossy backs hung with wreaths, and their horns adorned with white ribbons.

Mr. Stephen delighted in the enjoyment of these poor little ones, to whom a holiday in the country was a peep into Elysium. By presiding and regulating the sports, he prevented liberty from degenerating into license.

Jem Goodman was very happy. Lord Glenlonely was there, convalescent, and in excellent spirits; and that was owing to Jem and temperance.

Bob Blossom and his excellent wife were lovers again. Happiness was smiling in her eyes, and a faint rose-bud was dawning on her cheek. Bob was saved, and, that, too, under Heaven, was Jem Goodman's doing.

Then came the thought of Ben Darrell and his respite, and again tears of gratitude rose to his eyes.

Then, too, there were all those little ones, early trained in the way they should go; and the prophecy of Him whose wisdom never deceived those who acted upon it, that when they are old they shall not depart from it. There was bold, brave Larky gathering flowers for little Hope, young Tom Trudge playing at hide and seek with pretty, nut-brown Merry Blossom, and Stunning Steenie arm in arm with Carrotty Meg.

And but for temperance and the ragged school, what would have become of all these loving, happy little ones?

Well might Jem Goodman be happy; every thought brought with it some pleasant cause of self-gratulation. To the unselfish Christian, active for the good of others, it is ever thus.

The children had tea as well as dinner, and buns were dealt out liberally.

There was only one little incident to cause the slightest interruption to the general happiness, and that was owing to Stunning Steenie and Carrotty Meg slipping away slyly into their pockets the buns they had received, and then holding out their hands as if they had none.

In vain Hope Evermore, who saw it all, shook her little golden head, and raised her rosy index, they would not be deterred; but Mr. Stephen saw what they were doing, and when Stunning Steenie and Carrotty Meg extended their hands for the third time, he put his hand into their pockets, and produced the hidden buns.

They were rather ashamed and very downcast after this, and Stunning Steenie tempting Meg to a little distance, began, as she said, to pitch into her, declaring that but for her he should never have done such a thing. However, Hope hearing Meg cry, sent Larky to her rescue, and Stunning Steenie was no match for brave Larky.

At length the sun began to set, and the shades of evening to close in. The children sang the evening hymn, the vans were filled, so were the other carriages. With many a huzza and hoorah, the children were borne along, the guests returned to town, and the bride and bridegroom were alone—happy as the first pair, ere the serpent crept among the flowers of Paradise.

CHAPTER LXXV.

The boy was sprung to manhood.

BYRON'S DREAM.

WITH Lady Ada's happy marriage closed an eventful epoch in the history of all our dramatis personæ, and things went on very smoothly with all of them for some years.

Ada and her husband were a very happy couple,—a truly Christian pair, who tried in all things to take the Bible as their guide. Therefore, he loved and cherished his wife, and she loved and revered her husband.

He was as much interested as herself in ragged schools, and when his parliamentary duties allowed of his doing so, he always accompanied her to the Green Fields School.

The poor and reformed drunkards had eloquent champions in both Houses.

Lord Glenlonely never lost an opportunity of urging their claims in the Upper, and Gerald St. Maur in the Lower House.

Bob Blossom kept his word. He became, indeed, as Hope had prophesied, "A never-touch lad."

Apple Blossom, perfectly happy in her mind, soon recovered her health and spirits.

Everything prospered with the Blossoms: from keeping a fruit stall, they rose to a greengrocer's shop, and thence to a fruiterer's and florist's, not in a blind alley, but in Holborn itself.

Larky Grigg was apprenticed to an ironmonger; and, though the magistrate, before whom he had appeared when accused by Mr. Chete of breaking his windows, did not forget him, but sent for him to offer to take him into his lady's service as a page, Larky Grigg—who had an honest ambition, and knew that trade and mechanics offer the best and surest opening to genius when poor and lowly born—declined service, and stuck to his business.

Hope continued with her foster-mother whenever she was not with Lady Ada or her mother, the proud Countess of Glenlonely, who conceived a lively affection for Hope Evermore.

Had there been any young men in the Glenlonely family, both Apple Blossom and Jem Goodman would have considered it a duty they owed to Hope's mother to keep her from society she, poor victim! had so dreaded for her unborn child. But the old Earl and Countess, Gerald St. Maur—now Lord Arnelcliffe—Ada, Lady Arnelcliffe, Ellen St. Ange, and Mrs. Golightly, formed the home circle to which Hope was introduced; and Jem Goodman and Apple Blossom thought they could not do better for the sweet girl than to fall into the views and wishes of the old countess and the young one—that Hope should be a sort of companion to them both.

Ada then undertook to fit her for this situation. She procured masters and mistresses to impart the necessary accomplishments; she took Hope with her to Arnelcliffe Manor, and by constantly associating her with herself and her husband, she cured her of her errors of pronunciation and grammar, without in the least impairing the exquisite simplicity and candour of her lovely nature.

"What better can we do for Hope, Jem?" Apple Blossom would ask. "She arn't made for hard work; her mother—bless her!—wor a lady, her feather wor a gentleman. 'What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh.' I couldn't bring her up to sarvice, like our Merry—'twouldn't seem right. When she comes to be of age, or to want to marry, you know, Jem, you're to unlock that ere box her poor dear mother gave ye, and to read a sort of a will she've left, and then Hope'll know all about her friends. But not till then, and I think by that time our Larky Grigg, with his genus, 'll have made his way up in the world; and it's my idea if he do want to rise, it's for the sake of Hope; and more nor that, there's no love lost between them. They wor lovers, Jem, when she wor seven and he ten; and now she's sixteen and he noineteen, if I ever seed sweethearts downright fond and true, it's them two."

"She haven't a bit of pride about her; she's as happy here as she ever is at the countess's, and it's 'Hopy, dear,' and 'Larky Grigg, good lad,' between them two, the same as ever it wor when they went hand in hand together to the Green Fields Ragged School."

"I hope," Jem would say, "I hope, Apple Blossom, we've not done wrong to let Hope learn to talk like a lady, and speak the French, and play the music. It's quite true she's born to these things, but we musn't forget her poor dead mother's wishes. And if I didn't believe she's a girl as can't be spoiled, and that she loves Larky Grigg, and will be his wife, I'd not rest well in my bed, to think I'd gone counter to her mother's dying will."

"But if Larky gets up in the world, Jem," said Apple Blossom, "he'll be able to keep Hope like a lady; and then it'll be well she've had the taching of one. Lower than our Larky Grigg have come to be Lord Mayor—think o' Dick Whittington."

"Ah, I am thinking of more recent cases, old friend," said Jem. "But I fear it ain't going on as Larky's going on he'll rise in the world. 'Tain't his fault; he's a good lad; but he's not in good hands. His master keeps him back for his own ends. He knows he haven't such another hand as Larky; and he keeps that fine, clever, spirited chap making shovels twelve hours round, when he might be pushing a higher branch of the trade, and getting on in mechanics. He sacrifices the lad's future prospects to his own present gain; and Larky sees it, too, and he won't stand it much longer. There'll be a blow up soon, and I for one shan't be sorry."

"Well, Larky's coming home to tea this evening early, to meet Hope; she've got a holiday, and so have Merry. We shall hear more about it then."

Lor! Jem, what a fine gal Merry do grow! I wish she wor steadier though. There's Tom Trudge do doat on her; and she lead him a foine life, pretending to loike this one and that one; but I don't think in her heart she do loike any but Tom, and so I told un,—for when she heerd of that accident of his, nigh chopping his finger off, she fell down in a dead swoon, and we wor ever so long a-bringing of her to."

It was a merry tea-party. Hope came, brought by Ada, Ellen, and Mrs. Golightly. Ellen was more pale and pensive even than of yore; and Mrs. Golightly rather sterner, and somewhat more grim and gaunt. Ada was a little fuller in face and form, the beau ideal of a young matron of the highest order; and beside the coachman on the dickey there rode a stately, voluminous person, who held in her arms a noble boy—Ada's firstborn. She had been married several years before he came to fill her cup of bliss to the brim. And Hope doated on him, and could scarcely bear to give him up to his mamma or his nurse. He was at this time one year old, and he knew and loved Hope. And who did not love Hope? No one that knew her could behold her with indifference. She was not only so lovely, so loveable, but, what is far more important, she was so loving!

In form and face she was a perfect Psyche; the rose had redeemed the promise of the bud! Indeed she was, if possible, lovelier as a young woman than she had been as a little child. Then there was a little homeliness, the result, of course, of her lowly training.

Now, although her heart was as true and as pure as ever, her manners and her language were delicate and refined. Her dress, too, though simple, was that of a lady—suitable to one whose office it was to sit with, read to, play to, sing to, write for, talk, ride, walk with, the stately old Countess of Glenlonely; or, what she infinitely preferred, pass long happy days with Ada and her darling boy.

Hope was always in white when the weather was not very cold; and white set off the radiant gold of her lustrous and abundant hair. In form, she was a Grace—a Muse—a sylph. But lovely beyond description as she was, it was her expression, her smile that made her so endearing. There was so much heart, mind, soul, feeling, sympathy, and earnestness about her.

No wonder that every one loved, and that Larky Grigg almost idolised her! for if she was kind to others, to him she was something more; for him the rose on her cheek deepened or grew pale; for him the love-light in her eyes dawned, and was often veiled by the drooping lids, or moistened by rising tears whose source was not sadness.

She had never resigned her pretty little habit of dictating to and controlling the great, bold, brave, handsome, clever Larky Grigg.

Still Hope's gentle "Well done, Larky; good lad!" was the sweetest praise he could hear; and still Hope's raised forefinger had power to warn and to deter.

But there was a great change in their feelings; they had always loved with affection, now passion had waked in each young heart—timid, tender, shrinking in Hope, fearless, ardent, intense, and almost proud in Larky Grigg's now manly breast.

Larky was a noble-looking fellow, too—very tall, broad-chested, muscular; black-haired, dark-eyed, active, energetic, with a head to plan, and a hand to execute; ambitious, because he wished to offer Hope a destiny worthy of her, but thoroughly good. Even to win her he would not have done anything he would have blushed to own to her and to his conscience.

Jem Goodman was still his adviser and his friend.

He was still at nineteen as he had been at nine—a dutiful, fond, good son, obedient to his mother.

He still frequented the Green Fields Ragged School, but as a voluntary teacher now; and he had delighted Mr. Stephen, and astounded the whole school only a week before the evening we describe, by arriving there with Lane Luke—a greater cripple than ever—on his back, won over at last to become a pupil in the adult class.

This was indeed a triumph; and one Larky, who never gave up or gave in, had been aiming at for years.

Lane Luke was so pleased with what he saw and heard, that he ever after frequented the ragged school of his own accord.

And now the tea is ready set out in a neat little parlour, on a snow-white cloth.

It is summer; and there is fruit, and salad, and new-laid eggs, and ham.

Plenty smiles at Bob Blossom's board, for Bob is a sober man now.

Apple Blossom is again a nursing mother; and this time it is a healthy babe, not the large-headed, tiny-bodied victim of water on the brain—a complaint so common to the children of drunken fathers. Apple Blossom looks handsomer than ever, and is so well dressed, and Bob looks so respectable; and Jem Goodman is so happy; and the Countess of Arnelcliffe's carriage drives up, and Hope springs out, just as Larky, panting and flushed with haste, arrives at the door.

CHAPTER LXXVI.

Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house;
Thy children like olive plants round about thy table.

PSALM CXXVIII.

But Hope, the charmer, lingered still behind.

CAMPBELL.

THERE was comfort now, and order, and plenty in Apple Blossom's home. Bob had never broken his promise, or rather his vow; he had never forgotten the agony he had felt when he had seen the young surgeon's knife raised, and had beheld the wife of his bosom, the woman he had sworn to love and cherish, the choice of his youth, the mother of his children, sitting, white and rigid as marble, her snowy breast, disfigured by a livid lump, bared; her eyes dilate, her lips apart; grasping with one hand the arm of the chair, with the other the wrist of Mrs. Posset, and awaiting, with the fortitude of a martyr, the patience of a saint, and the courage of a heroine, the sharp incision of that shining blade.

And all through him and his vile, sordid, swinish drunkenness! Bob had not been drunk since that day, now more than eight years ago!

And oh, how the little family thrive and prospered! how Apple Blossom smiled and bloomed! how "ilka year a bonny wee ane" came to add to their household treasures! They were not rich: we are not writing romance, but reality; but they had in a small way a good business. They were not gentle-folks; they had no wish to be what nature and education had not intended them to be, and what they would have been miserable in being—idlers. They had to rise early, to work hard, to eat the bread of carefulness, and to bring up their children to earn their own living by the sweat of their brow; but they were loved, respected, trusted.

Country-bred, vegetables, fruit, and flowers were what they both understood.

Honesty, which is the best policy, was their policy.

All who dealt with them once dealt with them always. They never lost a customer through any fault or deception of their own. They had a little capital, the result of presents of money made them by Lord Glenlonely, Ada, Ellen St. Ange, and Mrs. Golightly, and by contributions of savings from Hope, Larky, and Merry.

This capital enabled them to purchase the fresh produce of Covent Garden Market daily.

Bob was a very early riser now.

He always went to bed sober; he was not obliged to lie groaning and parched with thirst, and fever-sick, and ashamed. Bob never had a head-ache now, nor a heart-ache either.

Apple Blossom looked handsomer than ever. Her smile was like sunshine. Her cheek was the rival of her own peaches. And then she had such good clothes, and such a stock of them. Not trumpery artificial flowers, and beads, and bugles, and sham jewelry. No, all she had was good.

For high-days and holidays she had a fine silk dress or two, and a handsome shawl, or cloak, or mantle; and a gold watch and chain; but no frippery, no finery.

There was a fair, plump, lovely baby at her breast when Hope arrived. Its sweet round face was as clear and white as porcelain, and it had large loving black eyes, and rosy dimpled lips.

It was the last,—just three months old.

No child of Apple Blossom's had died of water on the brain since Bob had given up drink.

"Welcome, my Hope! welcome, my Larky Grigg!" said sweet, kind Apple Blossom, laying the baby, who had dropped asleep, in the cradle, and clasping them alternately to her heart. "Why, Hopy, thee be growed, lass! Thee'll be a foine grand lady soon, and then, maybe, thee'll be ashamed of thy poor mammy."

"And of Larky Grigg, too," said the fine, handsome young fellow, archly.

"Oh, don't say so!" said Hope, laying her sweet face on Apple Blossom's bosom, while she held out her little white taper hand to bold Larky.

He was shy enough then, poor lad; all of a tremble, and alternately red, and white, and hot, and cold. Poor Larky! he had not seen Hope for months; she had been in Scotland with Ada.

She was so lovely—so very lovely! so much more lovely than ever he had pictured her—fairer, brighter softer, more delicate, loving, graceful, and much more womanly than that fair image enshrined in his heart. And then there was a grace, a dignity, a lady-like elegance in her voice, tone, dress, manner. That little lily-white hand, so taper, with its rose-tipped fingers, and pink velvet palm; it seemed so soft and silken compared to his, hardened by work, bronzed by exposure; naturally a large, strong, well-made hand, but spread by the use of heavy implements and the habit of coarse labour.

He thought of this as he held it.

Yet it seemed willing to be held, and returned the pressure of his; and when she looked up from his mother's bosom, there was no mistaking the deep love of her tearful eyes, or the mantling blushes of her beautiful cheeks.

But the thought had crossed Larky Grigg's mind that he was not worthy of her. It was a bitter thought! it had occurred to him before, throwing a passing shadow over his heart, but he had driven it out; it would not be driven out now.

Larky Grigg suddenly left the room; while Hope took off her scarf and bonnet, and helped her foster-mother to set out the tea, adorning the table with a rich bouquet of clustering purple, and crimson, and white stocks, and sweet briar, and enriching the repast with strawberries (all out of the shop).

CHAPTER LXXVII.

Then, with such jewels as th' exploring mind
Brings from the caves of knowledge, did he buy
His ransom of those twin gaiders of th' aspiring mind—
Low birth and iron fortune. BULWER LYTTON.

LARKY GRIGG stole up into his own little room at the top of the house.

Strange inconsistency of human hearts—loving hearts especially!

He had seen Hope—Hope whom he had so longed, so pined, so panted for months to see.

He had seen her more beautiful, more loving, more lovable than ever; seen her hide her sweet face in his mother's bosom—that fair foster-bosom, from which she had derived her first sweet sustenance; seen her stretch out her lovely little hand in search of his.

He had held it.

He had felt its warm, velvet pressure.

He had seen tears of love in those large blue eyes, and yet Larky Grigg was miserable!

"I am not worthy of her," he murmured to himself, as he bolted his door; and folding his arms over his broad, young, panting, heaving chest, paced up and down the little room. "She is a lady! she speaks like a lady—dresses, thinks, walks, feels, moves like a lady! And what am I? a working man!—nay, that's not all. A working man may rise, has ris, to be equal to lords. But I'm a slave—I can't rise! How can a working man rise? by education, by cultivating his mind; and how can I cultivate my mind, when that 'ere master of mine, Nailor, keeps me twelve hours round making shovels? And yet I've got it in me—I know I have, I feel I have! Why, while I'm hammering at them shovels, thoughts come crowding thick into my brain that, if I'd knowledge enough to put 'em to any use, would make the world wonder. And I'm to drive 'em away, and drudge and slave on at shovel-making, to put a few more pounds a week into Nailor's pocket! And Hope—angel Hope!—whom I love as never man loved before, is growing more and more a perfect lady; and Nailor keeps me down—a coarse, common working man, when I might, by janus, and industry, and education, rise to be a gentleman, and fit to court her. She loves me—I see she does, sweet, sweet Hope! But shall I for that take advantage to drag her down to my level, and make her the wife of an ironmonger's journeyman? Not I! I'll rise to her level; I'll speak my mind to Nailor—I'll have it out with him, and if he won't come into my views, and give me higher work and better wages, and time to study, I'll never make another shovel in his workshop, so help me love and Hope! Half the greatest men of the day have ris from a lower state than mine, to be company for princes, and lights of the age—Faraday, Stephenson, Cubitt, and countless others. AND SO WILL I!" he added, turning pale with the strong spasmodic energy of his nature, and the water sparkling in his fine black eyes from the passionate intensity of his feelings.

"Delicate, beautiful little Lady Hope!" he cried, "you shall be the pride of my life, the love of my heart! and, with God's blessing on true love, you shall be the honoured, cherished wife of my bosom; but you shall not be ashamed of your choice. Your fine lady friends shall not open those cold eyes and draw down their pale lips and say, 'See what a rough Hope Evermore has married.' Education, that's what it is that makes the only real difference between man and man! Take the son of a lord and bring him up in ignorance and the lowest kind of labour, teach him no grammar, no manners, and he's a rough. Take the son of a street-sweeper and give him learning and polite breeding—he's a gentleman. I will be a gentleman. Hope is a lady. What has made Hope a lady? Education. Hope used to speak as I do; her manners were like mine; her ways like mine! They shall be so again, for I will make mine like hers! I'll consult Jem Goodman; he told me of books I ought to read—books with which I, a young working man who know only those rudiments taught me at a ragged school, can educate myself as well as if I had, like young gentlemen of fortune, tutors at my elbow and colleges to live in. Aye, and Jem Goodman said I might beat 'em out and out, if I give my whole heart and mind to it; for when pupil and master pull together and makes common cause, they gits over the ground in no time. Now when a man's learner an' teacher in one they must pull together, and that's why self-taught genius often tops the tree, spite of all impediments. Yes, I'll learn to speak Hope's language—the language of educated people. Knowledge is power! I'll have power; for I'll acquire knowledge. If Hope isn't ashamed of me, I'm ashamed of myself in her company. But I'll make her proud of me yet. I wasn't born a gentleman, but it's in the power of every 'cute lad to make himself a gentleman; and before I marry Hope I'll be a gentleman; and all the world shall own me for one. I know my parents cannot afford to keep me and give me tachers; I must tache myself of evenings and go on earning my own living by days. And what of that? The most eminent men have been self-taught. Others have pined for fame as an end; with me it's only a means to an end. What I wants is to feel, and to seem, and to be worthy of Hope. And now, already I do feel more worthier of her; and I'll go and listen to her sweet talk, and try to catch her way of pronouncing, and her grammar. I won't talk much myself till I've taught myself grammar. I did begin grammar at the ragged school. Ah! maybe Mr. Stephen can help me; I'll ax him, anyways. My heart feels lighter, now. It's a comfort to have made up one's mind, anyways; and mine is made up. With God's blessing, I'll be worthy of Hope, if any man can be worthy of such a jewel." So saying, Larky turned to the little, old-fashioned, oval glass on the oaken chest of drawers, that had been his great grandmother's.

It was some little comfort to poor Larky to see reflected in that glass a face of a stamp peculiarly calculated to interest a woman of imagination and sentiment.

Larky inherited his mother's beauty, but ennobled by an intellect which was a chance gift to Larky, since there was no trace of genius like his in either of his parents. Larky Grigg in his twentieth year was as fine a young man as London could boast. His clustering locks were of a brown so dark as to be all but black. His forehead was very broad, high, and massive, pale, nay, white, compared to the lower part of his face, which was bronzed by the sun.

His eyes were beautiful, large, dark, and deep set beneath fine, black, rather horizontal eye-brows. They looked black as jet, and were fringed all round, like his mother's, with black, silken lashes. His nose was not long, but straight, and well-formed. His upper lip short, curved, and a dark shade of silky down gave a character of youthful manliness to the fine chiselled mouth, whose deep, peculiar red set off his even dazzling teeth.

The expression of the mouth and the rounded chin was resolute, decisive, firm; the shape of the head and throat, with its close clusters of jet black hair, was worthy of Antinous, and his form might have served for a model of Hercules, at nineteen.

He rapidly washed and dressed himself, exchanging his working dress for clean linen, with the collar open. As it was summer, a little neat tie and a holland blouse, fresh from the wash, formed, with a pair of light trousers, his whole costume.

The resolution he had taken lent fire to his eye, radiance to his brow, a flush to his cheek, and pride to his tall form; and, when he joined Hope and his mother, Apple Blossom exclaimed, "How handsome thee do look, Larky!" and Hope thought so in her heart, and said so with her blue eyes.

In a private conversation, the late Earl of Chatham asked Dr. Henniker, among other questions, how he defined wit. The Doctor replied, "My lord, wit is like what a pension would be, given by your lordship to your humble servant—a good thing well applied."

The Matron.

NO. XXXIII.

I HOPE that in the last chapter I convinced my readers that there is no economy in living in the cheapest house, supposing it is in an unhealthy situation. But in making a judicious choice of a dwelling, an airy, healthy spot is not the only consideration: a respectable neighbourhood should also be sought. Let those who are parents bear in mind that children are partly educated by what is going on around them, and that example is stronger than precept. Good, industrious neighbours, trying to bring up their children industriously and in the fear of God, are great helps to those who wish to do the same. Generally where there is one worthy family there are more; for none will deny the truth of the proverb, "birds of a feather flock together," and, though this saying generally applies to badly disposed people, it is equally true as regards good ones. Another consideration in choosing a dwelling should be to fix on a house, or apartments in a house, within a comfortable walking distance of a place of worship; and you among my readers who are mothers will, if you study your real good, make a point of attending this place of worship every Sunday with your children, and with your husband too, if you can induce him to go. Worshipping together in public unites the members of a family as well as the different classes of society.

In your choice of a dwelling, you should take care that it is at a convenient distance from good markets or shops, and should only settle in a place where you can be plentifully supplied with fresh water,—for fresh water and fresh air are all-important to health. And now that I am speaking of air, I may as well observe that the nature of the air we breathe is greatly influenced by the soil. If it is in the country you are fixing on a house or a cottage to live in, give the preference (where other things are equal) to a dwelling on a gravelly soil; it is more conducive to health than any other, though the soils that prevail in our country, namely, the sandy and chalky, are not unhealthy; but the damp and clayey soils should be avoided.

Now I hope my readers will not misunderstand me. The hints I have just given are merely for the advantage of those who are debating where they had best live: they may also be useful to young wives, who are consulted by their husbands as to where they had best settle.

Many of us have no option about our abode. Where this is the case, let us be satisfied with any home it has pleased Providence to give us, and, though its neighbourhood may not be desirable, we individually can do our duty in it; and should its soil be unhealthy, cleanliness and activity may go a great way to counteract the evil influences of soil.

And now I return to the subject of living comfortably on very little. Let us bear in mind that, in order to do this, every member of the family should not only save, but gain. Of course, I except very young children. Some attempts to make money are more productive of harm than good—I mean those of a wife to procure employment out of doors, at the risk of allowing her husband (when he comes home from his occupation) to want a good warm dinner. If the mistress of a family can maintain an orderly, cheerful, comfortable home, and earn something towards the family income besides, there is not any doubt that she should do so, and that she will feel happier and more respectable through the power of increasing the domestic means; but it will be no economy for her to be gaining a few shillings at home, while a good, industrious husband is left exposed to want and discomfort through her absence. Still, I know from experience, that there are cases in which the husband can procure no work, and the wife can get more than she can undertake; then of course she should accept of work, for the father or mother must earn money if the children are to be fed and clothed. But, generally speaking, the husband is the prop of the house, and his comfort is the all-important consideration; and though the wife may not have the satisfaction of actually gaining money, she will feel herself of great importance, and a most useful member of the household, if the goodness of the food, the nice cleanly appearance of her husband and children, and the arrangement and comfort of the house are all her doing. Such a wife rarely wants for money. From what I have observed, she is generally in possession of it all. The husband trusts his gains to her with unlimited confidence, certain that the money (with her) is in better hands than his own; and on the part of the husband this plan of conduct is the most judicious

GROUP OF TYROLESE PEASANTS.

THE TYROL.

THE accompanying group of Tyrolean peasants, from a recent sketch, forms an appropriate sequel to the view in the Tyrol which we introduced in a former number.*

It has been conjectured, from the fossil aquatic animals discovered upon the loftiest mountains of the Tyrol, that at some remote period of the world's history the whole of that country was covered by the ocean. Musset, by poetical intuition, long since divined this geological question; and in speaking of the Tyrol in one of his verses describes it as "a tranquil ocean whose mountains are waves."

Three chains of mountains traverse the Tyrol between Germany and Italy, forming three extensive valleys; while three principal rivers, the Inn, the Etsch, and the Rhine, water the country and render it in some parts exceedingly fruitful.

This number three appears to exercise a marked and fatal influence over the Tyrol, which we recognise in the phenomena of the avalanche. Of this there are three varieties, each of them remarkable for their destructive agency. The staublawine sweeps over the blue hills like the simoom of the desert, whirling the particles of sand which it there collects into a cloudy column, and carrying destruction wherever it falls. The schneelawine is formed by the recently fallen snow, or the snows of the last spring, partially melted by the approach of summer, and detached from the mountain. These slips are gradual, but extremely dangerous, and frequently overwhelm whole districts. But the windlawine is the most terrible of all; it is produced by the setting in of a west wind. Its prognostics are few, and its destructive power is therefore much increased by the suddenness with which it acts. Snow and rain partially melted, ice-blocks blended in inextricable confusion, suddenly rush forth from the mountain summit, and pour down an irresistible torrent on everything below, carrying away trees, cottages, fences, and even immense pieces of rock. The spectacle presented by the windlawine is magnificent, but the fatal results, the waste of property, the misery entailed, render it truly awful. The unhappy peasants, with their wives, children, flocks, and herds, are seen flying before the pitiless foe—forgetful of everything but self-preservation in the common peril. Very different is the aspect of the Tyrol in the summer time. It is a picture full of pastoral enchantment; the green valleys, the picturesque cots, the grazing herds, the Arcadian shepherds, the murmuring waterfall of silver as it hastens to the azure lake, the gray rocks, with an old castle or a modern chapel here and there, and high above them all the snow-capped mountains, which in the sun's bright rays glitter like a crown of diamonds.

Near Innsbruck—that pleasant city, so well beloved of tourists—is a mountain of singular form, called the Frauhut, and to which a strange old legend belongs. After the subsidence of the deluge, so the people say, the king and queen of a race of giants established themselves at Innthal. Before they arrived at that district they had crossed some splendid country; but during their long migration they had beheld nothing more charming than the valley of the Inn. There they definitely fixed their abode, and the king of the giants built a gorgeous palace of marble and gold. They had a son, who was still young, and whom his mother idolised. One day as he was playing in the valley, he fell into a deep morass, and though he escaped uninjured, his clothes were much soiled, and he returned in deep affliction to the palace. His mother, concerned at the trouble of her child, attempted—but in vain—to cleanse the garments. At last, after resorting to various expedients, she procured a large piece of pure wheaten bread, and began to rub the spotted habiliments. Bread, the staff of life, the produce of patient labour, the gift of God, was never intended for so base a purpose; and as a punishment for this profanation, the palace crumbled into dust, the race of giants, with the king and the young prince, were swept away, and the guilty giantess was transformed into a mountain, for ever to remain a memorial of the indignation of Heaven against those who outrage the liberality of Providence and the labours of the husbandman.

Many similar stories are told in the Tyrol. Every mountain has its legend, every valley its tradition.

To those who find pleasure in studying national character under various phases, the hills and vales of the Tyrol afford abundant facilities. The hospitality of the peasantry is one of their most remarkable and gratifying characteristics. They are prompt to welcome the stranger, and to offer their kind services to the traveller, which are doubly acceptable in a strange land. They are an industrious people, but, remaining religiously faithful to the traditional practices of their forefathers, they have made little progress in the cultivation of modern science.

The accompanying illustration represents a group of Tyroleans, and requires no explanation. The materials of which the dresses both of males and females are composed, are simple, and chiefly remarkable for durability. The picturesque costume of the Tyrolese, however singular it appears when seen in the streets of a crowded city, is in excellent keeping with the scenery of their native lands, and there is scarcely any scene of peasant life better adapted for the canvas than those which are witnessed in the forests and mountains of the Tyrol.

UNEXPECTED EVIDENCE.

"I ONCE had an adventure," said my friend, "which I think is worth printing; and if you will write it out I'll tell it to you."

"Go on," said I, "and, if it suits, the printer shall have it."

"Well—I'll give it to you," he resumed, as he threw his cigar away, and tipped his chair back against the wall. "It may not have been so startling an adventure as some, but the train of circumstances connected with it were very curious, and, in my opinion, remarkable. My brother James, who is two years older than myself, had gone out into the West, intending to settle either in Missouri or Kentucky. He had been gone about three months when I received a letter from him, dated Columbia, Kentucky. He was in jail, and about to be tried for the crime of murder. He had been arrested for murdering a traveller, and the evidence was so strong, and so direct, against him, that no lawyer could be found who could give him any hope. He had stopped overnight at a small inn some twenty miles west of Columbia, and in the morning he sat out alone on his journey. As he was passing through a wood he saw a dead body lying by the road-side, and he stopped his horse, and dismounted. He found it to be the body of a middle-aged man, who had been killed with a knife, there being several deep wounds upon the breast; the corpse was still warm, and while he was in the act of turning it over, in order to get a better view of the face, he heard some one approaching, and upon looking up he saw two men, who seemed to have come from a little woodpath near at hand. He told them how he had found the body, and asked them if they knew who it was. But they only shook their heads, and told him that he was doing it very well. In short, they accused him of having done the deed, and, without further ado, apprehended him, and carried him to the next village, where they entered a complaint and gave in their evidence.

"At first my brother looked upon it as a light affair, and only considered the delay it would occasion him; but when the examination came on, he found things looking rather dark. It was proved that the murdered man had stopped at the inn where he stopped, having arrived late in the evening, and started off at daylight in the morning. The two men who had caused his arrest swore, point blank, that they saw him strike the fatal blow, and that he was pulling the murdered man's purse from his pocket as they came up! They told the story with such assurance and regularity that they were readily believed. And then James could not deny enough to help him. The people had become convinced that he was guilty, and the whole tide was against him.

"As soon as I got this letter I hurried off to Kentucky, hoping that I might be of some assistance to my unfortunate brother; and I wished to get there, if possible, before his trial came on. On the evening of the fourteenth day I reached an inn to which I had been directed, and had my weary horse put up. I knew that I was very near my journey's end, but I could go no further that night. After supper I went into the bar-room, where a few of the neighbours had assembled, and from their conversation I soon learned that this was the very house at which my brother had stopped on the night before his arrest, and of course I could not be far from the scene of the murder. I had made up my mind that I would not reveal my relationship to the prisoner until I had seen him, and conferred with his lawyer, if he had one—and, if he had none, with one whom I might engage for him. So I pretended to be entirely uninformed upon the subject, and asked what the circumstances were. The facts were related to me just as my brother had stated them, though somewhat heightened in colour.

"I felt the public pulse through these men. The prisoner was a Yankee, and a stranger, and the people believed him guilty. The two witnesses who had sworn to the fact of his doing the murder I learned were respected men, though not very valuable citizens. They were hunters and trappers, when hunting and trapping would pay; and sometimes they helped to tow flat-boats down the Mississippi. Their names were Matthew Harn and Isaac Croft, and they lived not far from the village; and I furthermore learned that they had both been at the inn on that very evening. I was told that the trial would come off in four days, and that the prisoner would surely be hanged.

"When I went to bed that night I felt uneasy. My brother's case seemed dubious. Of course I knew that he was innocent. And if that was so, how should I account for the evidence of Harn and Croft? They must either be mistaken, or they must have sworn falsely. If they had done the latter thing, then they might be more guilty still. From what I had seen and heard I judged that they enjoyed the confidence of their fellows more from their convivial and physical qualities than from any morality or fixed principles of honour; and I determined to know them better.

"I returned to my room at ten o'clock, and went to bed. I fell into a doze, but was not destined to enjoy much sleep. I lay pondering upon the fate of my brother for an hour or so, and then one of my teeth began to ache. I had got cold by exposure on the day before, and it had settled where such colds are apt to do, in my jaw. After suffering till my nerves were all unstrung, I got out of bed and dressed myself, for I could not endure to lie there. I hoped that a turn out of doors might relieve me. I made my way down with as little noise as possible, and gained the street without disturbing any one. The night was calm and clear, and I walked away without noticing or caring whither I went. The village was a small one, the houses being huddled together upon the left bank of the river, so I was not long in getting beyond the line of settlement. I had gone, perhaps, about half a mile beyond the village, and was thinking of turning back, when I heard some one groan as though in pain; and, as I stopped to look around the same voice cried out for help. By this time I had discovered from whence the sound came, and upon approaching the spot I found a female sitting by the roadside, apparently in deep agony. I asked her what was the matter, and she told me she had been thrown from her horse, and that her ankle was either broken or badly sprained. I stooped down, and found that the right ankle was out of joint, and I knew that the poor woman must be suffering intensely. I had seen a good many joints set, and had helped to perform the operation in some cases; so I told her that I would try to fix her ankle if she was willing. She was anxious that I should help her, and I made the trial. It was a tedious job, but she bore the pain like a martyr, and at length I had the satisfaction of believing that the bones were all in place. Of course the ankle was much swollen, and still very painful, but I bound it up as best I could, and then told the sufferer that I would help her home. She said she lived not far off, and as her horse had probably made his way to his stable, she would gladly accept of my assistance.

"She was not a heavy woman, and as I was a pretty powerful man, I easily lifted her in my arms, for I knew very well that she could not walk. As I bore her along thus I asked her what her name was, and she told me Matilda Harn. I then asked if she was married. She said she was—that her husband's name was Matthew Harn; and she asked me if I knew him. I told her no—that I was a stranger in those parts, only having stopped at the inn for the night. In a little while we came to a narrow path which led off to the right, and the woman bade me turn into it. I did so, and ere long we came to a small hut, which proved to be the home of my patient. I bore her into the dwelling, where I found only a young girl, who proved to be Harn's daughter. "Where is your father?" asked the woman.

"He's gone over to Ike Croft's, I guess," was the reply.

"I remarked to the sufferer that she had better have her ankle swathed with wet bandages at once, and then she could send for her husband. So her daughter got the necessary things, and I soon had the inflamed joint in a more comfortable condition. After this she sent for her husband, and I told her that I would find the doctor, if he was in the village, and send him to see her. As I was about to turn away she called me back, and asked me if I was going to Columbia. I told her I was.

"And you mean to start early in the morning?" she continued.

"Yes," I told her.

"She hesitated a few moments, and then said—

"You have done me a great favour, and I bless you for it; and now I may serve you in turn. Don't travel on this road alone in the morning. If you must go, wait until you can have company."

"I asked her what she meant—what the danger was. She said she feared there were robbers in the wood.

"There have been two or three murders committed near the place where we turned off from the road," she added, "and I have reason to fear that there are bad men about, even now."

"She urged me to be warned in season, and to believe that she had saved my life by thus placing me on my guard. I thanked her for her advice, and having assured her that I would follow it, I turned away again. But again she called me back, and begged of me not to mention to any one what she had told me, for it might get her into trouble. I gave her no direct answer, but assured her that I had no wish to bring harm upon her, and then I left the hut.

"As soon as I got fairly away from the building I stopped. I had surely discovered something of importance. This woman's husband and the neighbour whom he had gone to visit, were the witnesses against my brother, and I surely had every reason to believe that they were the guilty parties. I was now aware that the murder had been committed near the place where I had turned off from the main road, and, from what my brother had written, I judged that the two men who had apprehended him must have come out from the very path in which I then stood. They had probably murdered and robbed their victim, and before they could conceal the body my brother's approach had driven them away. As concealment after this would be impossible, they formed the wild scheme of shifting the crime on to other shoulders; and, if such was the case, they had well nigh succeeded.

"After revolving the subject over in my mind, I resolved to wait till Matthew Harn came, thinking it very likely that Croft would come with him, and that I might learn something more. So I crept as near to the hut as I dared, and there awaited the result. In a little while the girl returned, and with her came two men. They entered the hut, and I tried to get near enough to hear what was said within, but did not succeed. Ere long, however, the men came out, and stopped very near to my place of concealment.

"Well, Mat," said one of them, "I'll go home, and be ready in the morning. The old woman'll do well enough, I guess."

"But I hope that doctor won't come," returned the other. "He may be right in our way."

"If he does come," suggested the first speaker, "he'll be off in time. At all events you can easily keep him out of the way."

"Never mind," said Harn. "But I say," he added, "this chap who brought Tilda home must be the very chap we're after."

"I think so," was the response.

"They talked a little while longer, and I learned their plans pretty thoroughly. I was their intended victim. They had been at the inn when I arrived, and had discovered that I was a perfect stranger in that section; so they thought I should not be missed if they put me out of the way. They felt sure that I had money with me, and they must have it. Croft was to be ready before daylight, and they would lie in wait for me until I came along—then kill and rob me—take care of my horse, and sink my body 'in the old well'."

"I made my way back to the inn, and reached my room without disturbing any one. My toothache was gone, though I had no recollection of the precise time when the pain left me. In the morning I pretended to be sick with a cold and headache, and told the landlord that I could not ride my horse. He said that was the day for the stage, and that it would be along about ten o'clock; so I informed him that I should wait for it, and engaged him to keep my horse until I called for it. Then I bound a handkerchief about my head, and acted the sick man as well as I could. At nine o'clock I heard two familiar voices under the window. They were my friends, Harn and Croft. They had come to find out why I had not proceeded on my journey. They talked with the ostler a little, and then came into the bar-room, where I was sitting, pretending to be half asleep. They were hard-looking fellows, as I had expected, and just such fellows as I should suppose would work or rob, as opportunity might offer. They were not ugly-looking, nor really villainous, but they had a reckless, swaggering way, and a loose expression, which at once betokened that they possessed little or no sense of morality or humanity. They had a good look at me—then took something to drink—and then took their leave; and I could see that they were somewhat disappointed.

"At ten o'clock the stage came along, and I took a place inside, and by three o'clock in the afternoon was in Columbia. I gained access to my brother without trouble, and I certainly don't think I should have known him if I had met him in the street, he had grown so thin and pale. But when I came to tell him what I had discovered, the colour came to his face, and he looked more like himself. He told me he had engaged a lawyer who lived close by, and having spent half an hour with him, I went to see his legal friend. I found the latter individual in his office, and having made myself known, I proceeded to relate my adventure of the night before. He was not only interested, but he entered into my plans with enthusiasm, and promised to take the whole affair into his own hands, and manage it to the best of his ability. He told me that there were rumours afloat that two men had been murdered on the road where my brother was apprehended, before the crime was committed of which James was accused; but they had been strangers in the country, and no certain information could be obtained.

"On the following morning the lawyer had all the necessary documents prepared, and, in company with the sheriff, we set off. We reached the residence of Matthew Harn before noon, and found both him and Croft there. They were frightened when the officer arrested them, but offered no resistance; though they might have done so had they known how much evidence we were likely to bring against them. They were taken to the inn, and thence sent forward under a sufficient guard to Columbia. A company was then collected, and we went out to the wood to see if we could find 'the old well,' of which I had heard the prisoners speak. One of the party remembered that there used to be a house near the spot where the murder had been done, and under his direction the search was commenced. The place where the house had stood was found, and ere long we found the well. It was very deep, and covered with fallen logs and bushes. Grappling-hooks were procured, and three dead bodies were fished up from the slimy water. One of them was much decomposed, but the other two were not so far gone but that the innkeeper could recognise them as men who had stopped over night at his house only a few months before.

"The next movement of the sheriff was to arrest Mrs. Harn and her daughter, and also the wife and young son of Isaac Croft. They were taken at once to Columbia, and there confined separately.

"Two days after this my brother's trial came on, and he was acquitted without difficulty. But not so with the two witnesses who had caused his arrest. They were tried upon an indictment for murder, and the evidence was so overwhelming against them that hardly a shadow of defence was made; and when they were fully convicted, Croft made a confession. He acknowledged that he and Harn had murdered the traveller, and had just robbed him when they heard the tramp of a coming horse. They had barely time to empty the purse and throw it down, and make off into the woods, when my brother came up. When they saw him dismount, and commence examining the corpse, the idea entered their heads of fastening the crime upon him. They had two objects in this:—first, to shift the present crime from their shoulders; and, second, to turn suspicion from themselves in case the previous murders should come to light. But they failed in their plans, and in due time met the fate they so richly deserved.

"By the time we got clear of the court my brother was willing to come back with me. His first experience in the West had made him homesick, and he fancied he would rather live where his known good character might be of some avail against the false swearing of perjured rascals."

Small Change.

It is a curious fact in the grammar of politics, that when statesmen get into place they often become oblivious of their antecedents, but are seldom forgetful of their relatives.

TOM MOORE'S am-a-toriness was admirably hit off at the time he was a candidate for the representation of Limerick:—

"When Limerick, in idle whim,
Moore as her member lately courted,
'The boys,' for form's sake, asked of him
To state what party he supported.
When thus his answer promptly ran (Now give the wit his mead of glory),
'I'm of no party as a man,
But as a poet, am-a-tory.'"

CONVERSATION.—The man who would shine in conversation must possess original ideas and strong sympathies,—be able both to communicate and to listen.

A MAN called upon a lawyer the other day and began to state his case in rather an abrupt manner. "Sir, I have come to you for advice; I'm a husband-in-law!" "A what!" spoke out the learned counsel. "Husband-in-law, sir!" "I have never seen that defined in domestic relations." "Don't you know what a husband-in-law is? Sir, you're no lawyer; you're an ignoramus! I am a husband-in-law, but not in fact, sir—my wife's run off."

BAD COMPANY is like a nail driven into a post, which, after the first or second blow, may be drawn out with little difficulty; but being once driven up to the head, the piners cannot take hold to draw it out, which can only be done by the destruction of the wood.

A SERVANT girl, in the town of A—, whose beauty formed matter of general admiration and discussion, in passing a group of officers in the street, heard one of them exclaim to his fellows, "By heaven, she's painted!" Turning round, she very quietly replied, "Yes, sir; and by heaven only!" The officer acknowledged the force of the rebuke, and apologised.

The following verse contains every letter of the English alphabet except "e." It is a question whether any other in English rhyme can be produced (in print) without the letter "e," which is a letter more used than any other.

"A jovial swain may rack his brain,
And tax his fancy's might,
To quiz in vain, for 'tis most plain,
That what I say is right."

CURIOSITY is a thing that makes us look over other people's affairs and overlook our own. If a spy may be executed by the laws of war, surely a Paul Pry may be kicked or horsewhipped by the laws of society. You can have no peace with such a man unless you declare war against him. Xenocrates, reprehending curiosity, said, it is as rude to intrude into another man's house with your eyes as with your feet.

An instance of the distinction without a difference was offered by the Irishman, who, having legs of different sizes, ordered boots to be made accordingly. His directions were obeyed; but, as he tried the smaller boot on the larger leg, he exclaimed indignantly, "Confound this fellow! I ordered him to make one larger than the other, and, instead of that, he has made one smaller than the other."

INSULTS are counterfeit money; we can't help their being offered, but we needn't take them.

ESSAY ON MAN.

At ten, a child; at twenty, wild;
At thirty, strong, if ever;
At forty, wise; at fifty, rich;
At sixty, good, or never.

WHAT is called the keeping up of appearances is oftentimes a moral or rather immoral uttering of counterfeit coin. It is astonishing how much human bad money is current in society, bearing the fair impress of ladies and gentlemen.

A THEATRICAL audience is a crowd of people, called an audience perhaps for the reason that they cannot hear, like lucus à non lucendo. The actors speak with their hands and feet, and the spectators listen with their eyes.

LADIES HAVE THE PULL OF GENTLEMEN.—Ladies are following the profession of dentistry in New York. Wrenchem, in his cynical manner, approves of this, and the reason of his approval is, because "Women (he says) are universally acknowledged to be the most practiced hands at stopping men's mouths!"

A LADY'S hair, like the latest news, is found in the morning papers.

ON a wet, miserable, foggy London day Charles Lamb was accosted by a beggar-woman with, "Pray, sir, bestow a little charity upon a poor, destitute widow-woman who is perishing for lack of food. Believe me, sir, I have seen better days." "So have I!" said Lamb, handing the poor creature a shilling; "so have I; it's a miserable day! Good-by! good by!"

We overheard a curious thing from a little fellow about six years of age a short time ago. The subject of wedding-cake had been introduced in the course of conversation, in which the father was taking a part. "Father," said the little fellow, after having apparently reflected intently on something, "I shan't send you any of my wedding-cake when I get married."—"Why not?" was the inquiry.—"Because," answered the young hopeful, "you didn't send me any of yours!"

NIGHT THOUGHTS.

'Tis sweeter than all else below,
The daylight and its duties done,
To fold the arms for rest, and so
Relinquish all regards but one;
To see her features in the dark;
To lie and meditate, once more,
Some grace he did not fully mark,
Some tone he had not heard before;
Then from beneath his head to take
Her notes, her picture, and her glove,
Put there for joy when he shall wake,
And press them to the heart of love;
And then to whisper "Wife," and pray
To live so long as not to miss
That unimaginable day
Which farther seems the nearer 'tis:
And still from joy's unfathom'd well
To drink, in sleep, while on her brow
Of innocence ineffable
The laughing bridal roses blow.

ALEXIS.—1. The prizes are now being contended for by G. P. Y. Mr. E. Johnson, J. W. (of Lowick), and Mr. M. Lancaster. 2. Yes; when a sufficient number have signified their wishes.

F. G. H.—You are, as we have stated upon various occasions, entitled to claim a Queen for every Pawn which you may have advanced to its eighth square, and may, therefore, have two or more Queens on the board at the same time.

W. COATES.—Problems Nos. 1 and 2, although improvements upon your previous efforts, are still below our standard of merit. Moreover, in Problem No. 2, White can at his second move play B to Q 3 with just the same effect as B to Q Kt sq. In that case the Pawn will mate on K 3.

M'LEOD BARR.—We must refer you to the Chess Lessons which appear in the earlier numbers of the Old Series of the FAMILY PAPER. We have not space to furnish you with all the information which your inquiry embraces.

FATHER THOMAS.—The Problems submitted by you are much too simple for our column.

A. NOVICE.—The moves should be recalled under the circumstances to which you refer.

GEORGE SARGANT.—Your game would have been hopeless had Black at the 17th move played Kt to K Kt 5, followed by B to Q Kt 2 (ch), &c. This mode of play must have led to an exchange of pieces irretrievably to your disadvantage.

A. W.—A forced move is when you have only one legal move at command.

M. A. R.—We shall feel obliged if you will forward your communications on Chess on separate sheets. Your present practice is productive of much inconvenience, and is sometimes the cause of our omission to notice the other subjects to which you refer.

T. B. C.—You may not castle if you have moved your King. You cannot castle on the side on which the Rook has been moved, nor if either of the squares over which the King has to pass is commanded by an adverse piece.

GRAPES, MONA, AND B. W.—Do you not overlook Black's reply of Kt to Q 5 to your first move in Problem No. 53.

* Owing to the great increase in the number of our Chess correspondents, it is sometimes difficult to find room for answers to all their communications, but they may rest assured that each will receive attention in due course.

Our Editorial Table.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

In order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I, New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

CAMILLA.—The brightness of the harvest moon, which delighted you so much when you were in the country last autumn, is considered a phenomenon. In an astronomical work, entitled the "Mechanism of the Heavens," the following explanation is given of this beautiful appearance of the moon. About the time of the autumnal equinox the moon, when near her full, rises about sunset many nights in succession. This occasions a remarkable number of brilliant moonlight evenings; and as this is in England the period of harvest, the phenomenon is termed the harvest moon. The sun being in the constellation called "Libra," or the Scales, and the moon when full being of course opposite to the sun, and moving eastwards at the rate of about thirteen degrees per day, would descend but a small distance below the horizon for four or six days in succession, that is, for two or three days before, and the same number of days after the full; and thus the moon would rise during all these evenings nearly at the same time, namely, a little before or a little after sunset, so as to afford a remarkable succession of fine moonlight evenings. We have endeavoured to strip this explanation of all unnecessary technical terms, and we hope it will give you some little insight into the causes of the harvest moon.

STEPHEN L.—We can assure you that you run great risk in the amusement that so delights you at the sea-side. Searching for crabs is dangerous, unless you have a companion at hand. A powerful crab has actually been known to grasp with its claws the hand of its opponent, and to hold him there without the power of moving until a passer-by came to his assistance. Should such an accident happen to you, the best plan for making the animal loosen its hold, is said to be to detach the claw that is unemployed. The creature called the hermit crab, a specimen of which has so greatly excited your curiosity in the aquarium at the Zoological Gardens, lives a solitary life in his own habitation. He is of very pugnacious habits, in fact he is sometimes called the soldier crab. If two hermits of tolerably equal size are placed in an aquarium they fight whenever they meet. These creatures are not particular about their diet, provided it is of an animal substance. They will devour raw meat or even their own species. The shells to which they seem attached are not parts of themselves, but habitations they take possession of at their convenience.

G. PORSON.—You are evidently labouring under an error. Sulphur is capable of being volatilised. With regard to its medicinal powers, they are various. By common consent (the result of experience), sulphur placed in the water given to dogs contributes to the health of the animal, and consequently lessens the danger of hydrophobia. As you seem to know very little about sulphur we inform you that it comes to us chiefly from Italy, Sicily, and South America. Generally it is found of a yellow colour and it is both hard and brittle. The vapours have the singular power of bleaching any substance.

A. B.—Although you were born out of the British dominions, if your father (or grandfather by the father's side) was a natural born subject, you are now, by various statutes, deemed to be a natural born subject yourself, unless your ancestors were attainted and banished beyond sea for high treason, or unless your father was at your birth in the service of a prince at enmity with Great Britain.

J. ASHTON.—Our word "harvest" is derived from herb feast. As to the feast of "harvest-home," it must be nearly as ancient as the arts of sowing and reaping. We admire the custom to which you allude of having a Queen of the Harvest. She used formerly to be brought home with the last load of corn. In 1598, at a "harvest-home" celebrated at Windsor, an image was richly dressed up to represent Ceres. At this feast were also introduced the pipe and tabor. It seems that in Suffolk the foremost man of the field used to be called "lord," and the money he collected from friends and visitors to make a frolic afterwards was called a "lurgess" and the feast a "horkey." The lines you allude to are by Bloomfield; they run thus:—

Home came the jovial horkey load,
Last of the old year's crop,
And Grace among the green boughs rode Right plump upon the top."

Y. BEVERLY.—So you are going to Switzerland, and you wish us to give you some information about William Tell, who delivered his country from Austrian oppression. The Germans and Burgundians having conquered Switzerland, Albert the First, then Emperor of Germany, treated the inhabitants with great severity; refused them their ancient privileges, and appointed two tyrannical noblemen as governors in Switzerland. One of these governors fixed a pole at Altorf, in the canton of Uri. On this he placed his hat, and ordered that submission should be paid to it. This submission Tell refused to pay. He was brought before the tyrant, who, to punish Tell (a celebrated marksman), ordered that he should shoot an apple from his own son's head. Tell did so without hurting his child. But he had furnished himself with a second arrow, which the tyrant discovering, asked him what he had intended it for. "To shoot you to the heart," answered the mountaineer, "had I killed my son." This daring reply occasioned Tell's being taken prisoner. However, he escaped, and finally killed the tyrant. Historians give 1354 as the date of Tell's death.

P. SUMMERS.—Jeddah and Jiddah are one. Perhaps if you had sought out Jiddah in your gazetteer, you might have found the information required, concerning a place that has recently acquired such dreadful notoriety from the massacre of the Christians. Jeddah, Djidda, or Jiddah—for it may be called by any of these names—is the port of Mecca, and one of the chief entrepôts for foreign commerce in Arabia. The resident population is about 5,000; but this number is often very much increased by the influx of strangers. The inhabitants are nearly all foreigners, or settlers from other parts of Arabia; the only natives being a few sheriff families, attached exclusively to the officers of religion and law. It is one of the holy places of Mohammedanism; its sanctity is increased by the neighbourhood of the reputed tomb of Eve—a rude stone structure, about two miles to the north. The caravans to Mecca start daily, and those to Medina every forty or fifty days. Twice at least in every year Jeddah is inundated with inhabitants: viz., on the arrival of the Indian fleet (about May), when merchants from all quarters pour in, and during the hajj, when pilgrims come from all the African ports in vast numbers. The climate of Jeddah is one of the most trying that can be imagined; the nature of its winds assume the character of the tracts they traverse. The north wind, after crossing the Desert, arrives in such a state of dryness, that the skin is parched, paper cracks as if it were in the mouth of an oven, and the air is always loaded with sand. If the wind changes to the south, everything is in the opposite extreme; the air becomes damp, and all you handle becomes of a clammy wetness. The outbreak of murderous fanaticism against the Christians, the consequences of which have recently been so deplorable, is supposed to have been occasioned by the preaching of an enthusiast who had witnessed the taking of Delhi.

BASSIE THOMPSON.—The expressions that have puzzled you are French and Latin, but they are now commonly used in English. Persefage means "jesting," and it is a sort of jesting many people do not relish. Dessous de cartes means "under-hand dealing," but it would be more literally translated, "under the cards." Nem. con. is an abbreviation of nemine contradicente; it means "without opposition." Of the Latin phrase, Non compos mentis, the translation is "not sound in mind."

T. R. ROBSON.—We shall take an early opportunity of furnishing some interesting details concerning the great Leviathan. In the meantime, the following may serve your purpose:—Length on the upper deck, 691 feet; breadth across the paddle-boxes, 118 feet; depth from deck to keel, 55 feet; length of principal saloon, 100 feet; length of berths, 14 feet; diameter of paddle-wheels, 56 feet; diameter of screw, 22 feet; capacity of coal bunkers, 12,000 tons; nominal horse power, 1,600 tons; number of cylinders, 4; diameter of cylinders, 6 feet 2 inches; draught of water laden, 30 feet; ditto ditto unladen, 15 feet.

G. E.—You can have the index and title to Vol. I. by sending two penny postage stamps to Messrs. Petter and Galpin.

A. GROOM.—To clean your saddle and bridle leather, &c., and give it a nice glossy polish, use the following:—Mix in a phial one ounce of oxymuriate of potash with two ounces of distilled water; and, when the salt is dissolved, add two ounces of muriatic acid. Then, in another phial, shake well together two ounces of rectified spirits of wine with half an ounce of the essential oil of lemon. Unite the contents of the two phials, and keep the chemical liquid thus prepared closely corked for use. It should be applied with a clean sponge, and dried with a gentle heat, after which the leather may be polished with a proper brush so as to appear like new.

SARAH ANN.—Fasten your engravings to the leaves of your album with stiff gum paste (gum arabic dissolved in water). Touch the corners of the back with a very small portion applied with a small camel-hair pencil.—The gentlemen you have named are not related to each other.

LAVINIA.—Make your scent-bag thus:—Take half a pound of lavender flowers, free from stalk; of dried thyme and mint, each half an ounce; ground cloves and carraways, each a quarter of an ounce; common salt, dried, one ounce. Mix the whole well together, and put the product into silk or cambric bags. In this way it will perfume the drawers and linen very nicely.

P. P.—Tours is the principal town of the department Indre et Loire. It was formerly the capital of the province of Touraine. Tours is a well-built town, on the beautiful river Loire. Should you pass through Tours, mind you visit the Promenade du Mail.

A. CONSTANT READER.—Was the marriage duly registered? If not, you may have some difficulty in proving it.

ZINGARI is an Italian word, signifying gipsies.

R. EMERSON.—Encourage the feeling that induces you to appreciate the innocent pleasures within your reach. There are many places of deep interest, whether exhibitions, museums, or gardens, that are thrown open gratis, and may be visited by the inhabitants of London without any expense. Of course the places of attraction at a few miles from the metropolis cannot be reached without a small outlay, excepting by a good pedestrian; but who would grudge ten pence or a shilling to visit the magnificent gardens of Kew?—gardens in some respects unrivalled in the universe. When you take your family to these delightful pleasure-grounds, so liberally thrown open to the public, mind you notice the Norfolk Island Pine. This is the noblest specimen of its kind in Europe. The branches or foliage of this pine or fir tree bear a striking resemblance to an ostrich-feather. The Norfolk pine stands in a large tub, containing seventeen tons weight of its parent soil, on the grand promenade near the orangery. Its grace and beauty make it the principal ornament of the Arboretum.

D. R. P.—The answer to the puzzle was given in popular rather than in philosophical terms.

A. CONSTANT READER.—The glue used by bookbinders is the same as that used by carpenters and joiners; it is melted by placing pieces of it in water over a slow fire.

LYDIA L.—You say that the possibility of England's being invaded causes a good deal of disension and some alarm in your family circle. Do not fear. The strength of a free and united people (with a senate alive to every danger that may threaten) is such as to give foes little chance of success. When we have the fleet, which we hope soon to behold—viz., thirty sail-of-the-line—lying in the Downs, near Dover, we need care little for the hostility of any power of Europe. Such a force would prove to all enemies (even supposing we have enemies) that means of aggression and plans of invasion are all equally useless, and we may confidently pursue our course at home in peace.

EDITH.—There is no remedy for a mildewed mirror. You must have it re-silvered.

JOSEPHINE.—The first number of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England" was published on January 1, 1856; and, as it appears weekly, there are consequently 134 Nos. published, which may be obtained from any respectable bookseller at one penny each. It has a greater circulation than has ever perhaps before been attained by a similar publication.

JAKES.—If you place the vowel after each of the letters in the inscription you have sent, it will form the following couplet:—

Persevere, ye perfect men;
Ever keep these precepts ten.

J. W. S.—French polish is made by dissolving shell lac in wood naphtha. It should be made by frequently stirring or shaking the ingredients together in a well-closed bottle or other vessel.

A. M.—The only advice we can give you is to abandon the use of the article that spoils your teeth, and scrub them twice a day with a brush of moderate stiffness and some finely powdered charcoal.

A. HIGHLANDER, AN APPRENTICE, A. N., THOMAS ITALIANO, ADA HARIE, C. R. I. D. D., A. YOUNG STUDENT, J. F. ASTON, G. HYDE, W. S. B. (Tunstall), and several other correspondents, wish us to recommend books on various topics. This we decline doing for the reasons we have before stated. Where there are so many rival claims, it becomes a difficult and delicate matter to decide.

GIAOUR.—The sons of dukes and marquises are all called "lords" by courtesy; legally, they are only commoners. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York have power to excommunicate in their own provinces, for false doctrine or for immoral practices.

H. C. SKEEP.—Tobacco was first brought to England by Sir John Hawkins, in 1565; but Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Francis Drake are also mentioned as having first introduced it here. Various accounts are given as to the derivation of its name, some ascribing it to the fact of its being brought from Tobacco, a province of Yacatan, New Spain; others to Tobago, one of the Caribbees; and others, again, from Tobasco, in the Gulf of Florida.

ADONIS.—A lad of sixteen, who is an "Adonis," may surely be content to wait a year or two longer for the hirsute appendages he so eagerly covets.

LECTOR ET AUDITOR.—The two words "whisper" and "away" are of Teutonic origin. Flistern and weg, the German for "whisper" and "way" are evidently the source from which our own words are derived.

GUADALQUIVER.—You have not quite understood the meaning of the rule "sound the final consonant in French when the next word begins with a vowel," or you would have seen no difficulty in the pronunciation of trop ardente. Is étaient la, is pronounced ees ettoy lah, and not els. D'ici à un mois is properly translated "in a month from the present time," as d'ici is represented by the last four words which you say are superfluous.

OSWALDUS CARACTACUS.—A good knowledge of Greek is essential if you would obtain a degree in arts. A knowledge of mathematics is not necessary, though desirable. Most of the books you will require are in Latin.

J. L. A. W.—Use a good stiff hair brush; those in which the hairs are cut in irregular lengths are the best.

A. SWIMMER.—One object of bathing is to brace the system. If you are languid and weak after bathing, it perhaps proceeds from your bathing too frequently, and remaining in the water too long. Try twice a week, and for a shorter time.

EMILY J. E., TAM O'SHANTER.—The "Lessons in French" commenced in No. 30.

A. CHESS STUDENT.—The real name of Philidor, the celebrated chess player, was Andrew Dancan. He acquired his well-known sobriquet from his excellence as a musician. His fondness for chess became a passion, to indulge which he travelled over a great part of Europe. He died August 30, 1795.

G. J. O. R.—Epa, pronounced Spaw, is the name usually given to mineral springs. It is derived from a place (Spa or Spaa) in Belgium, celebrated for its mineral springs. It is situate about twenty miles from Aix-la-Chapelle.

B. P. F.—Artificial yeast, or barm, may be made thus:—Boil a quarter of a peck of malt in three pints of water; pour off two pints, and keep in a warm place for thirty hours; add four pints of a similar decoction; stir it well in; again ferment, and repeat this addition of four pints until a sufficient quantity of yeast is obtained. This will be found preferable to brewer's yeast, particularly when used for raising dough.

A. COUNTRY AMATEUR.—The specimen of water-colour drawing you have sent us is very creditable to your genius; we should, however, recommend you to study higher class models, and to sketch from nature.

GALASHIELS.—Your puzzle has frequently appeared.

T. P.—The Latin sentence is literally rendered thus: "To the thunderer his own weapons."

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

Gird your hearts with silent fortitude,
Suffering, yet hoping all things.—MRS. HEMANS.

DOCTOR BURKE found the companions of our hero more or less severely injured; but their state, fortunately, inspired no fear for their ultimate recovery. Poor Jack Manders proved the greatest sufferer, as well as the most refractory of his patients; for, although the grateful fellow could scarcely stand, he insisted so long and strenuously on being removed to the bedside of his benefactor, and watching over him himself, that it required all the doctor's authority to induce him to relinquish his design—it seemed to Jack a dereliction of duty to permit any one else to supply his place.

As for Mark Rayner, happier than the rest, he was attended by his devoted wife: no wonder that he recovered quickly.

In illness there is no hand like woman's to smooth the pillow, moisten the parched lip, or wipe the cold, damp dews of agony from the throbbing brow. In misfortune, her voice is the first to offer consolation; in death, to whisper the hope which follows true repentance.

In every relation of life—as daughter, sister, wife, or mother—woman's mission is a sacred ministry; too often, alas! misunderstood, and still more frequently unrewarded, by the return of that affection which constitutes at once her weakness and her strength.

Man should remember this, and the harsh word would die upon his lips unspoken. The blow—but we dare not pursue that subject: for no appeal our pen may trace can touch the heart of a wretch capable of raising his hand to strike where heaven most loves, and manhood is most bound to guard.

Our readers, who have followed the progress of Mark Rayner, are too well acquainted with him by this time to suppose for an instant that these observations are intended to apply to him; for, with all his faults, he had never ceased to love his wife fondly—to feel proud of her virtues and the principles he lacked strength of mind to imitate. His errors, not to use a harsher term, had arisen from weakness of character. Like hundreds of husbands, he lacked resolution to say "No" to the solicitations of idle, dissolute companions; and thus, without being naturally vicious, he had paid, as is frequently the case, the bitter penalty of vice.

Rose, happy in her present prospects, forgot the past; and, when her repentant husband would have alluded to it, silenced his self-reproaches with a generous kiss.

For several days the life of Richard depended on a thread so fragile, the slightest shock—a breath too rude—must have severed it; but friendship and affection watched over him. Poor Lillian, heart-broken and despairing, with more than human fortitude, restrained her tears, and decked her wan features with a smile during the few moments she was permitted each succeeding morning to visit him.

"For my sake," were the only words she dared trust herself to utter; but they fell with affection's balm upon the sufferer's ears—spoke music to his heart; at her presence the shadows of death appeared to recede. True, they returned again, but each time fainter than before; and Burke, who was unremitting in his attentions, at last began to speak confidently of his recovery.

Meanwhile, Sir Charles Fourreau had not neglected the means of defence so providentially placed at his disposal. With immense labour, the heavy guns of the rajah were dragged from their place of concealment, mounted upon the walls, and the ample supply of ammunition carefully removed. Worn as they were, and diminished in number, not a man of the 01st but endured his toil cheerfully, for his commander and officers shared it with him.

As for Major Plinlimmon, having formerly served in the artillery, he considered himself peculiarly called upon to superintend the operations, and, to do him justice, worked at them day and night. Never, perhaps, had the old soldier felt a prouder moment than when he beheld his pets, as he facetiously called them, placed in position.

"Let the rascals come," he said, "only let them make their appearance within range; I ask no more."

"You forget my patient," observed Burke, gravely.

"So I did," replied the warm-hearted Welshman; "well, then, I hope they will not come till the poor fellow can stand the music of their voices. How differently we are constituted," he added: "it would revive me, and recall the ebbing lifeblood to my heart, even if I were in extremis, as you doctors call it."

The hope, like many others in this world, was destined to prove a false one; for, on the evening of the very day on which the preparations were completed, the long-expected forces of the Begum joined those of the rebel rajah at the fort.

"Five thousand of them, at the very least," philosophically observed the major, as he saw them defile, troop after troop, upon the plain. "Warm work to-morrow, I can predict that."

"Sorry to hear it," replied the doctor, who, with a thoughtful brow and hesitating step, proceeded shortly afterwards to the apartment of Lady Bell and Lillian.

"It is almost too much to exact, even from woman's fortitude and devotion," he muttered to himself; "but it must be tried, for it is the only chance of saving him."

It was only by unremitting watchfulness, joined to great professional skill, that the speaker had succeeded in suppressing those symptoms of fever which, in the feeble state of our hero, in all probability must have terminated fatally. To accomplish this he had permitted only a subdued light to penetrate the cell of his patient—forbidden the visits of Lillian and Lady Bell to be prolonged beyond a few brief moments; and, above all, prohibited the slightest word or sound that might increase the susceptibility of the nervous system, already too much excited; and now he was menaced with the horrors of an attack—the cannon's roar, and worse than all, the tortures of suspense—anxiety for those he loved.

There appeared but one way of meeting it. Burke knew the hearts of those to whom he trusted to carry out his idea, and the result did not disappoint him.

Lady Bell and Lillian entered the chamber of the patient at the usual hour the following day, but, instead of withdrawing, as usual, after a brief visit, pleaded, as had been preconcerted, with the doctor for permission to remain.

Burke affected to look serious.

"I am stronger," murmured Richard, "indeed, I am stronger; although I cannot find words to tell you how much good their presence does me. I feel no pain whilst they are by my side."

"You would exert yourself too much."

"No," interrupted the invalid; "I will not speak: it will be happiness enough to gaze in the eyes of Lillian, mark the returning flush of health upon her cheek, and indulge my heart in waking dreams of love."

"Well," said the doctor, "I shall see how you keep your promise; should I find that you exert yourself too much, or become excited, I must withdraw the permission."

The two ladies seated themselves one on each side of the couch. Little did its occupant imagine, as he gazed upon their placid features, the painful efforts it cost them to control their feelings; for scarcely an hour had passed since they had bade what might prove a final adieu—Lady Bell to her husband, Lillian to her second father.

"Shall I read to you, Richard?" whispered the latter.

Her lover smiled consent, and the fair girl instantly commenced, with an unflinching voice, the sublime liturgy of the church. On arriving at that portion of it in which we are taught to pray against battle, murder, and sudden death, her hearers pronounced the response, "Good Lord deliver us," with the deepest fervour. All but our hero were aware that the perils against which they implored protection were drawing near.

At the conclusion of the prayer Fred Wharton joined the group; he wore a cheerful air, and smilingly gave his hand to his friend.

"I have but a few moments to remain with you," he observed, in a careless tone. "The major is about to exercise the guns which we have at last succeeded in mounting upon the walls. It is necessary," he added, "to ascertain their range."

"I positively forbid it," exclaimed Burke; "Plinlimmon must postpone it for a day or two. How does he imagine my patient can endure the report?"

"Not on my account," said Richard, cheerfully; "I can bear it, I feel assured I can, now that I know the cause. To be here, wounded and helpless, whilst those dearest to me were exposing their lives in an unequal contest with our savage foes would, I confess, prove too great a trial for my philosophy or strength, but mere practice—my nerves are not so irritable as you imagine."

The doctor pretended to forego his remonstrances with well-acted reluctance, and the young officer returned to his post upon the walls, where he found Sir Charles and Plinlimmon anxiously watching the troops of the rajah and his new ally as they defiled in dark masses across the plains.

"It will be no child's play," observed the former, as he mentally calculated their force.

"I trust not," answered his companion, in a cheerful tone; "I am tired of being cooped up in these infernal walls, and should like the regiment to have the credit of defeating the rascals before the arrival of our friends. How astonished the rebels will be," he added, "when our guns open on them. I long to hear the music."

More than an hour elapsed before this wish, so natural from the lips of an old soldier, was gratified. The besieged waited with the utmost patience till the enemy were sufficiently near to render their fire effective.

At the first discharge of the cannon, the colonel gave one sigh to those who were so dear to him; the next moment every energy and thought were devoted to his country.

"Beautifully pointed!" exclaimed the excited major, when he beheld the deadly havoc the shower of grape had caused in the advancing columns. "The balls plough deeply—see what a gap they have left in their lines."

Above the roar of battle, which now began in earnest, the deep, stern voice of the commander of the 01st might be heard giving orders as coolly as though he and his regiment were on the parade-ground.

The leader of the rebels was so disconcerted at finding the walls of the temple defended by numerous artillery, that it was some time before he recovered sufficient presence of mind to change his plan of attack, and direct his attempts against the north side of the building, whose defenders, however, had forestalled his movement by bringing several of their guns to bear in the direction menaced.

"Deploy your lines as much as you will," said Plinlimmon, affectionately patting one of his pieces; "we are ready for you."

When the report of the cannon fell, like a thunder-clap, upon the ears of Richard, those around him noticed that a faint flush suffused his cheeks, that he fixed his eyes anxiously upon those of Lillian, who replied to his silent inquiry by a smile that might have done honour to a martyr's courage.

"I am afraid," observed the doctor, "that the noise will prove too much for you; I had better send a message to the major to stop it."

"No," replied our hero; "it was but the first emotion. My nerves, I fear, are greatly shattered."

"Remember my injunction," interrupted Burke, placing his finger upon his lips.

"Not another word," said Lady Bell, seating herself by the side of the patient, and taking one of his hands in hers: "we are only here upon condition that you keep absolute silence."

These words were interrupted by a second report, which echoed fearfully through the halls of the temple and caused the blood to rush to the heart of the speaker, who knew that at the very moment she was thus forcing her features to bely her feelings, the husband of her affection was exposed to the chances of an unequal contest.

This time the wounded man betrayed no emotion—fully believing in the well, but painfully acted deception, he felt satisfied that the warlike major was merely practising the guns.

And thus for several hours did these heroic women endure the torture of suspense—the agony of doubts that rend the heart; endure them without a murmur or a tear.

Tears would have been a relief, but they dared not shed them.

Never had Burke, the only spectator of this extraordinary scene, felt so deeply imbued with love and admiration for woman's fortitude and woman's strength, as when contemplating their silent martyrdom. He had witnessed many a noble deed upon the battle-field, where the force of example, the trumpet's clang, the shout of triumph, and the excitement of the conflict lend their powerful aid to maintain the soldier's courage; but never one more heroic than the suppression of their sufferings; not a word of impatience, a look or cry of anguish escaped them; and if at each fresh discharge an inquiring glance or one of doubt rested for an instant upon their features, a smile quickly dissipated it.

"Hark!" said our hero, as the cry of human voices rose above the battle's din, "something unusual is going on."

"Our brave fellows shouting defiance to the enemy, nothing more," observed the doctor; "the cowardly rascals have not the pluck to answer their challenge."

And with this reply, his patient appeared once more satisfied.

There is a limit to human strength, if none to human weakness; had the trial lasted much longer, the self-possession of Lillian and Lady Bell must have given way. Just as their feelings were stretched to the utmost tension, the corporal entered the cell, looking as cool and unconcerned as if he had been taking a siesta all the while, instead of a share in a hard-fought battle. Saluting his mistress, as he generally did, in military fashion, he gravely informed her that Sir Charles wished to see her.

"Where is he?"

These were the only words the agitated wife could utter.

"In the adjoining hall," replied the old man.

Lady Bell tottered, rather than walked, from the presence of the lover of Lillian, and the next moment found herself clasped to the bosom of her gallant husband.

"We have beaten the rebels!" exclaimed the veteran, proudly; "the victory is won: not a foe remains before our walls."

This was indeed a source of triumph, but a still nobler victory had been achieved by the brave woman, who now reclined, sobbing and half-senseless, in the arms of her husband.

A week was permitted to elapse before Burke deemed it prudent to inform his patient that the firing he had heard, instead of being caused by exercising the guns, had been made in repelling an attack.

"Doctor," said our hero, struck with admiration at the fortitude Lillian and Lady Bell had both shown, "I fear, with all our force of character, woman's strength surpasses ours."

"You are right," answered the man of science;

"and do you know why it does so?"

"Because it springs from the heart," replied Richard, after a moment's reflection, "whilst ours is from the head alone."

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

But when all is past, it is humbling to tread
O'er the weltering field of the tombless dead,
And see worms of the earth, and fowls of the air,
Beasts of the forest all gathering there:
All regarding man as their prey,
All rejoicing in his decay.

BYRON.

The calm that followed the assault of the rebels upon the temple proved a treacherous one. Something like that lull which precedes the waking of the tempest: there was menace even in its stillness, danger from the absence of those signs which are presumed to indicate its approach. The peril that now threatened the reduced garrison proved far more insidious than the cunning sepy, or the fanatical follower of Mahomet; for it was one against which no courage or foresight could guard: it rode on the air, penetrated the closest barred gates, and struck its victims in the full flush of health and fancied security.

In other words, the jungle fever made its appearance in the already reduced ranks of the gallant 01st.

Those who have resided in India, and witnessed the ravages of this fell disease, will readily understand the disheartening terror its presence caused. The jungle is not that violent kind of fever which excites to madness, runs riot in the veins, and in a few short hours prostrates the strong man till he becomes weak and helpless as a child; but one of a slow consuming character, that gradually taints the blood, undermines the energies, and paralyses the will, crushing it with sluggish apathy, lowering alike the moral and physical tone of the victims it has breathed upon.

The countenance of Dr. Burke looked exceedingly gloomy as he made out the daily list of sick, whose number increased with frightful rapidity. As for the wounded, they were doing well; our hero and the three companions of his wild adventure, being by this time convalescent, or nearly so.

It was a hard time for the commander and officers of that beleaguered band. Within the walls, pestilence; without, an enemy numerous and ferocious, whom repeated defeats had not disheartened; eager and impatient for their blood, and still no sign of the promised succour. Sir Charles, however, proved himself fully equal to the emergency; every precaution that human prudence could suggest, was taken against a surprise. The sick he left to Heaven and the skill of the doctor, whose heroic exertions were seconded by the devotion of Mrs. Burke, Lillian, and his own strong-hearted wife, who passed their days, and most of those hours of the night which should have been spent in repose, in administering to the wants of their brave defenders. It was a touching sight to witness how the dim eye would brighten, and the parched lip quiver with a half-uttered blessing, as their delicate hands smoothed the hard pillow or ministered the cooling draught.

Poets and painters, as if by common accord, have agreed to represent the angel of pity in a female form; a unity of idea which may be traced no less to the inspiration of Heaven, than their own genius. The seraphim, bending in awe-rapt devotion over the mercy-seat, were made in the likeness of woman.

As for Burke, although perfectly aware that his exertions would meet with no other recompense than the proud consciousness of having performed his duty, and perhaps the casual mention of his name in a despatch, he remained day and night at his post, preparing the medicine with his own hands; watching every phase of the disease, and trying all that professional skill and foresight could suggest, to baffle its fatal ravages. Like a true soldier of humanity, he thought not of himself, the danger to his own life, the risk, the weariness of his endless task, but persevered with a courage which lofty motives and the purest philanthropy alone could have sustained.

It is one of the faults, may we not say the sins of England, that she has no rewards for deeds of quiet heroism. The officer who is the first to mount the breach, pluck the standard of the enemy from the captured walls, or lead a dashing charge, is certain of receiving some honorary distinction, even though it should afterwards be proved that the charge was a blunder—whilst the army surgeon, who, on the battle field or amid the horrors of the hospital, calmly faces death, is left unnoticed. Fame has no place upon her lists for such achievements, government no memory, or the trading politicians of the present day tongues to remind it of them; and they never will have so long as Englishmen prefer the glitter of tinsel to gold.

There was something wearying in the waiting day by day in the hope of the long promised succour, so unaccountably delayed.

The officers were assembled as usual for the mess; but it was not till after the dinner hour that the conversation became general, when Dawlish, who had long been heartily tired of the war, and was heated with wine, observed that, had he been governor-general of India, the revolt should long since have been stifled.

"How so?" demanded the major.

"Six months' batta would have settled the affair."

"It would have been both useless and impolitic," replied the colonel. "The gauntlet once thrown down, England would have lost her prestige by showing weakness. 'Mark my words,' he added; 'the war will prove a war of extermination.'"

"Better that," said Plinlimmon, "than being cooped up with fever to decimate us in these plague-stricken walls."

At this moment Dr. Burke entered the mess-room to make his usual report of the sick.

"The rascals have been petted and spoiled," he observed, alluding to the sepoys, "and this is their gratitude; but I have long foreseen the result of our yielding to their demands."

"You!" repeated his hearers.

"You are aware," continued the speaker, "that I served with the gallant Napier, who foretold the result of this truckling to the men we had armed and trained; but, like most prophets, he was unheeded."

"And very properly so!" exclaimed Dawlish. "I have often considered myself fortunate in not having served under 'Charley,' as the soldiers call him."

"Why fortunate?" demanded the doctor, who entertained a profound veneration for the memory of the conqueror of Scinde.

"He was a martinet."

"He was a soldier, every inch!" replied the former, warmly; "one of those men of iron hearts and frame who rise from time to time to arrest a nation's decadence. He had but one motto—duty; and he performed it as a Christian and a soldier should do."

"You are warm, sir," observed Dawlish, annoyed at the tone of the speaker.

"Not more so than the occasion warrants," observed Fred Wharton, who had hitherto remained a silent listener to the conversation.

"I can answer—"

"Pardon me, Burke," interrupted the cornet, "but this is a point on which it is not less my privilege than pride to speak. Sir Charles Napier was nearly connected with me, and I claim the right to defend his memory."

There was a silence. A claim so urged was felt by all present as too sacred to be disputed.

"I am not aware," said Dawlish, with difficulty mastering his passion—but he did master it, for he recollected the scene in the riding-school with the revolver, and the lesson was not thrown away upon him—"that the memory of Sir Charles Napier has been assailed, either as a soldier or a gentleman, and certainly not by me."

"As for my congratulating myself upon not having served under him," he continued, "that is a matter of taste."

"And of pluck," muttered the major, who began to doubt the courage of the duellist.

"You spoke of him as a martinet," he added, aloud.

"Is there anything offensive in the term?" demanded Dawlish, who found himself pushed rather harder than he had calculated upon. "Martinet, major! why, I have heard you call the Iron Duke by the same name, when relating how he put you under arrest in Spain, for attempting to scale the fortress of Badajoz before he had given the word."

The Welshman shrugged his shoulders impatiently—he could not deny it—the assertion was correct.

"There neither is nor can be any cause of quarrel," said Sir Charles Fourreau, whose opinion was naturally looked up to with respect. "Mr. Dawlish has already declared that he intended no offence."

"Certainly not," exclaimed the latter; "and I state it the more readily from the respect I bear to a brave man's memory. Having said this much," he added, "if Cornet Wharton feels dissatisfied, the initiative rests with him, not with me."

"My conduct since I have had the honour of holding a commission in the regiment," observed the latter, "has, I trust, sufficiently proved to my brother officers that I am the last man in the world to seek a quarrel."

"Certainly," was the general exclamation.

"Or shrink from one if forced upon me," added the speaker, in a tone which Dawlish alone comprehended.

Every one agreed that it was unnecessary the affair should be pursued any further; that it had ended as it ought to end. But it left a disagreeable impression on the mind of him whose intemperate words had provoked it. He could not comprehend the calm, the icy coldness of Fred Wharton; it annoyed him, perhaps, more than the most open expressions of aversion or hostility could have done.

"What can the fellow mean?" he mentally asked himself. "I wish he would speak out, so that I could understand him."

But it was not the cornet's cue to speak out.

Although the officers had come to the conclusion that the affair was at an end, there is every reason to suppose the quarrel would not have terminated as it did, but for the appearance of the enemy the following day before the temple; when all personal feelings were merged in the necessity of facing the common danger—of maintaining in the face of revolted India the prestige of the Saxon sword and race; or, if defeated, of leaving to their country a memory and a name of which England might well be proud.

This time the attack was conducted with far more skill and prudence than the preceding ones; the guns of the rajah being admirably served by artillery-men, deserters from the Bengal army. At each fresh discharge the iron shower swept the walls, whose defenders were now reduced to four hundred effective men—so greatly had war and fever thinned the ranks of the gallant 01st.

Perceiving at last that the defenders began to waver, for more than a third of them had already fallen, the triumphant rajah directed his troops to bring ladders in order to scale the walls, and the order was received with a cry of "Death to the Feringees!" by the excited sepoys, upon whose fanaticism the Brahmans had worked by predictions of success.

The attempt was directed against the north side of the edifice, as being the point best covered by the guns of the rebels.

A cry that the enemy were scaling the walls echoed through the temple, and was heard even in the hospital.

Then followed one of those scenes which find their parallel only in the pages of some antique chronicle or deathless story. The wounded and fever-stricken men rose from their pallets, and, calling for arms, insisted on being led to fill up the gaps the fire of the enemy had made in the ranks of their comrades. It was vain to oppose their resolution; even the voice of Burke was unheeded. With stern resolution they issued forth, and tottered rather than marched to the walls.

It is not to be supposed that, in a contest like the present one, our hero or Jack Manders were content to remain idle spectators. In presence of danger to the being he so truly loved, Richard forgot the weakness his wounds had left, and fought with the fury and courage of despair.

A blow from the butt-end of the musket he wielded crushed in the skull of the first rebel whose head appeared above the parapet; a second, third, and fourth followed with the same result; for his blows were ably seconded by those of his companion.

Still the assailants mounted to the walls with terrible rapidity, and it soon became a hand-to-hand contest, in which the butt-ends of the Englishmen's muskets did good work. One fellow, a leader of the sepoys, whose wiry, active frame denoted vast strength, had already obtained a footing upon the rampart, when Fred Wharton levelled his revolver, with the intention of shooting him; it missed fire, and the brawny rebel springing upon the young officer, a fearful struggle ensued—a death-grapple, to whose intensity the swelling muscles and strained sinews of the combatants bore witness.

Richard and Jack Manders perceived the danger of their friend, and hastened to his aid. The Hindoo saw their approach, and, with a courage which a better cause would have rendered sublime, succeeded in dragging the cornet to the edge of the rampart.

An involuntary cry of horror broke from those who witnessed it; but though a dozen muskets were raised, not a trigger was pulled. Each one feared to fire, lest, in the sudden changes of position—the twistings and contortions of the combatants—the wrong man should be struck.

Jack, whose quick eye and self-possession never for an instant deserted him, saw that the strength of Wharton was giving way. There was but one thing to be done, and he resolved to attempt it. Snatching up one of the long, knife-like weapons which the assailants who had been hurled from the walls had dropped, he crept towards the edge of the parapet, and rapidly plunged the blade into the body of the Hindoo. The rebel felt that he was mortally wounded, but even in death, with the fanaticism of his creed and race, determined not to fall unavenged. With a wild yell of triumph, and shouting the word "Deen!" he sprang from off the wall, bearing his assailant with him.

A low, chuckling sound broke from the lips of Dawlish as he witnessed the terrible fate of the only man he feared: it might have been horror; but those who heard it most distinctly declared that it sounded very like a laugh.

The tears which started into the eyes of our hero, for a few instants rendered him insensible to all that was passing.

There was but brief time for indulging in the natural feelings of the heart; for again the triumphant cries of the rebels, who had succeeded at last in shattering the gates, called every Englishman upon the walls to the court-yard to make a last stand. Bravely did they contest every inch of ground between them and the main building in which the women, the wounded, and sick had been conveyed for refuge. Thrice did the fever-stricken band of heroes beat back their ferocious enemies, and reclose the broken gates.

As Sir Charles performed this dangerous task for the last time with his own hands, a loud cheer broke from the men.

To their astonishment, it was returned. The sound came from a distance; but there was no mistaking the sound. English tongues alone could have given it forth.

"Are we dreaming?" exclaimed the colonel, involuntarily dropping his reeking sword.

"The relief!" shouted Corporal Stock, who, finding that the assault was going against the garrison, had removed the wife of his commander and Lillian to the loftiest dome of the temple, in order to protect them to the last. "I can see the flash of the bayonets as they glisten in the sun. The rebels have seen them; their cavalry is already retreating towards the fort."

On hearing this cheering intelligence, the soldiers clamorously demanded to be led forth. It was useless to attempt opposing their enthusiasm—enthusiasm is scarcely the word, it should have been madness—triumph. The battered gates were thrown open, and every man, whose strength permitted him still to shoulder a musket, issued forth to give the sepoys a parting volley.

When the reinforcement so long promised at last swept the plain, the brigadier who led them could not sufficiently express his admiration of the desperate defence.

"Although I must insist upon relieving your gallant fellows from all duty," he observed, "you, Colonel Fourreau, must still retain the command of the place, you have so bravely defended against such fearful odds."

Raising his sword, he saluted the tattered colours of the 01st, which still floated proudly on the walls.

"Victory dearly purchased," murmured Richard, as he thought of his friend, whose body the men of the comet's troop anxiously sought in order to give it a soldier's burial."

Amid the heap of slain it was nowhere to be found; but so far from the circumstance inspiring any vain hope, it added to the affliction of our hero.

"Carried off," he bitterly exclaimed, "by the cowardly enemy; wretches who neither respect the living nor the majesty of the dead!"

In a few days operations were commenced against the fort, which the united forces of the British soon dismantled; after which achievement they slowly directed their march towards Delhi.

Whilst the rescued band of heroes were marching to the seat of future triumph, we must request our readers to suppose a month or two had passed, and return with us, once more, to England.

Our readers may readily suppose that Mr. Bently awaited the arrival of each fresh packet from India with intense anxiety; for intelligence of the revolt which was to shake the power of England in the East had already reached him, and he was far too clear-sighted not to perceive the danger which threatened every European inhabitant.

How bitterly did he regret the past. What would he not have sacrificed had it been possible to have recalled it! The absence of our hero had left a void in the old man's heart which wealth, or the excitement of acquiring it, had long ceased to fill.

At last the long-expected letters arrived. There were two. The first one in the handwriting of Mr. Curry. It ran thus:—

"My dear old friend,—It is with the most poignant regret I inform you of the death of your unfortunate grandson, who has been cut off by a party of rebels whilst on his way to join some friends who had preceded him to the seat of war. I inclose your correspondent's letter. I would offer you consolation if I knew how; but I am a parent myself, and feel how fruitless the attempt must be. May Heaven enable you to support the terrible infliction!"

"Alone!" murmured the old man, when the words which seared his heart had been read to the last line: "I have nothing to love or live for now!"

In his hour of anguish the merchant forgot that he had still a daughter.

When the old servant, who scarcely ever quitted him, entered the library, he was much shocked by finding his master to all appearance lifeless. His first care was to raise the body, the next to despatch a messenger for Dr. Phrase, who, on his arrival, attempted to bleed his patient, but for some time the life-blood refused to flow.

"Dead!" murmured the domestic, in a tone of sorrow; for Mr. Bently had been a kind master to him, and he felt his loss keenly.

A few drops began slowly to ooze from the opened vein.

"Nothing of the kind," replied the pompous man of science, "although very near it; something dreadful must have occurred," he added, "to occasion so great a shock."

"No doubt, sir," said the man; "he has been worrying himself about letters for several days past; I quite dreaded their arrival."

At the word "letters" the doctor, whose curiosity was aroused, began to look round him, and discovered them upon the table, one open, the other with the seal unbroken.

"Hold his arm," he said to the housekeeper, who had been called in. "That will do; the blood begins to flow with more freedom now."

The woman did as she was directed, and the speaker taking up Mr. Curry's letter, would have read it, had not the faithful domestic restrained him.

"They can't concern you, sir," he said, in a tone at once both firm and respectful.

"Hem! No, certainly not; and yet, my good fellow, it would be better for me to peruse them."

"Don't see it."

"Of course not; how should you?" replied the doctor. "But it is of the utmost importance that I should ascertain whether the shock proceeds from mere business or from feelings which act more directly upon the heart. The diagnosis of the disease," he continued, "may be enlightened by—"

"I know nothing about the nosic of the disease," observed the servant; "but I know that master would not like his letters to be read, and they sha'n't be."

Phrase bit his lips and remained silent, whilst the speaker gathered up the contents of the two packets, folded the letters, and placed them in his pocket.

"You are very suspicious," observed the doctor.

"Not in the least; only prudent," was the reply.

Mr. Bently was removed to his chamber, and placed in bed. To do the doctor justice, all that his skill could suggest was put in practice to secure the recovery of his patient, that was his first consideration; the next, when all fear of any immediate danger was averted, was to sit down and write a confidential letter to Carus Kearn, with whom he had long been in correspondence. A mutual friend had introduced them, and the village practitioner had not hesitated to add to his other employments that of spy upon the wealthy merchant.

By the same post the faithful servant despatched a letter to Peter Mangles; on receiving which the clerk forgot business, the course of exchange, bills, discounts, tare and tret, left everything at sixes and sevens, and posted down to Meldown, where he arrived a few minutes only before the junior partner.

On entering the library, the old man, whose lips were ready to utter the usual querulous reproaches, was much shocked at finding his principal so changed and shattered, that even he could scarcely recognise him.

"Good gracious, Richard!" he exclaimed, "what has happened?"

Before Mr. Bently, who sat with his face buried in his hands, could reply to him, the door opened, and Carus entered the apartment. The sight of his nephew appeared to restore the merchant to his former energy of character, and he sternly ordered him from his presence.

"Not a word!" he exclaimed. "The mask has long since fallen; that only tie which fettered my tongue is broken by death. Assassin—cowardly assassin! I know you."

On hearing the word "assassin," Carus Kearn lost the self-possession which generally characterised him and fled.

"For heaven's sake, Richard," said the agitated Mangles, "what has occurred?"

"I am dying."

"Heaven forbid!" ejaculated the clerk, at the same time bursting into a flood of tears.

"Dying," repeated the banker, deeply affected by the sympathy of the speaker. "I have been struck where I most sinned—in my affections; but I am punished."

"Don't speak in these dreadful riddles," ejaculated Peter. "If love for your daughter has been awakened in your flinty breast—for you know that it was flinty—blest be the cause and the hand that strikes."

"Daughter," muttered Mr. Bently, as if striving to recollect something which had been partially obliterated from his mind; "yes, I—I have a daughter."

"Of course you have."

"And I promised him—"

"Him!" interrupted his old friend. "What him? Richard?"

Although the question was several times repeated, the speaker was unable to obtain an answer. In fact, it soon became evident that the mind of his employer was wandering. So Peter at once set himself down and wrote two letters; it must be conceded no ordinary proof of his affection for the sufferer, when we state that the first was to a physician of eminence, to post at once to Meldown Park.

The second was to the cashier, giving such instructions as were necessary for conducting the affairs of the firm.

"There, I have done all I can," he said, as he sealed them; "the rest is in the hands of Providence. Oh, Richard!" he added, in a tone of pathetic remonstrance, "why did you ever quit London to live in this horrible gloomy place? these misfortunes never occur in the city."

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

THANKS to the cheap press, good books are now plentiful, and the youth who has resolved to improve his mind, may readily avail himself of the advantages thus offered.

In our last paper we called the attention of our readers to a work on the English language, recently issued from the press, and at a cost which places it within the reach of all. We did so to meet the wishes of many correspondents who were anxious to procure a thoroughly good grammar at a moderate charge. But other correspondents are equally desirous of obtaining works of a similar description on other topics. They want an insight into the laws of natural philosophy; they want to know something of the mechanism of the heavens, something of the science of botany, something of logic and mathematics, something of political economy. They are each of them bent on some favourite pursuit, but are each equally zealous in the desire to obtain useful information; different in the method, they have the same object in view, namely, the cultivation of the intellect.

To all those who are determined on self-education, we recommend "Cassell's Educational Course." The commendations which this publication has elicited from the press, fully justify us in describing it as the best work of its class; an opinion corroborated by numerous testimonies received from those who have benefited by its perusal.

Self-education is a characteristic of this age. People are bent on self-improvement. They are not content to lead lives resembling those of beasts of burden. They feel anxiety for something better than mere animal enjoyment. A desire for knowledge has been excited; and this desire must be satisfied. In books such as the "Educational Course," valuable information is conveyed in a form which commends itself to an untutored intellect by its extreme simplicity. Technicalities are stripped away from the facts and principles of science—technicalities which have hidden many a bright light under a bushel.

The young student searching after knowledge too often finds his path blocked up by difficulties arising not from the facts of science, but from the verbiage in which those facts are conveyed. The jargon of the school terrifies the youthful aspirant. This is the universal complaint amongst self-improvers. If books on science were written in Assyrian character, after the fashion of the Nineveh inscriptions, they would scarcely be more difficult for the uninitiated to decipher. The difficulty is in words, not in things; the words once made easy, the thing itself is clear.

In "Science Popularly Explained," which forms the first volume of the "Educational Course," this is done. The laws and properties of matter are familiarly explained. Mechanics; the phenomena of fluids; acoustics, as far as relates to the origin and transmission of sound; the nature and sources of heat; meteorology; light; electricity; galvanism; magnetism; chemistry; geology; mineralogy; geography of plants and animals, are all treated in a manner which, if it is not enough to satisfy, is at least sufficient to awaken inquiry and to set the mental machinery in motion.

Astronomy, especially in its relation to geography, forms another section of the "Educational Course." In this treatise the reader is made acquainted with the phenomena of the seasons, eclipses, tides, moon's changes, and all that is most remarkable and important in the effects produced by celestial agency upon our earth.

Botany is another topic which is admirably treated, and by which, in a few easy lessons, the student may acquire more practical information than by the laborious study of more elaborate productions. Hood, the poet, used to complain about the hard names we called our flowers, and these hard names have often deterred the inquirer from any degree of familiarity with the floral family: but in the "Outlines of Botany" this difficulty is removed; for with the hard name is given its meaning.

The subject of mathematics has been regarded as uninteresting, and, from its very nature, removed from the reach of those who have been denied a "regular education." Self-taught men seldom select the exact sciences as their favourite pursuits; but this is solely attributable to the fact that the subject has been unnecessarily involved in obscurity. Self-taught men may become excellent mathematicians; and to those who are determined to make the effort, we suggest the treatise contained in the "Educational Course." It is intelligible to every ordinary capacity, which is more than can be said for more pretentious works upon that science.

But the subject, perhaps, most interesting and important to every working man is political economy. Working men—the strength and support of our country, the foundation of the great social fabric, by whose exertions the lofty position of England is maintained amongst the other nations of the earth—working men should know something of the science of government—something of those universally-recognised laws which bind man to man and nation to nation. This section of the Course will be found exceedingly valuable, both on account of the great principles which it advances, and the practical suggestions which naturally arise from a statement of those principles.

We recommend these works because they are, what they were designed to be, really useful, intelligible, accurate, and cheap. Piles of letters are before us, begging us to recommend books on various sciences. To do this in every individual case by post would involve us in an endless correspondence; to do so in our "Editorial Table" would transform that section of our journal into a bookseller's catalogue. We take this opportunity, therefore, of urging all our correspondents who are anxious to improve themselves to obtain the "Educational Course;" while it is adapted for all classes and all ages, it abounds more especially in Hopes and Helps for the Young.

"Let us now consider some of the idioms connected, directly or indirectly, with the subjects of house and furniture, and the inhabitants of the house.

"In asking who is at the door, you need only literally translate our phrase 'Who is there?' by 'Qui est là?' but although the answer, in English, must always be 'It is I,' it would be a dreadful blunder to say, in French, 'C'est je.' The correct expression is, 'C'est moi'; but this moi is not used in a dative sense. However, explanations on this subject belong to a more advanced part of your studies. 'Open the door' and 'Shut the window,' may be literally translated, 'Ouvrez la porte,' 'Fermez la fenêtre.' But in speaking of going up and down stairs, no mention is made, as with us, of the actual stairs. 'Montez' is the French for either come or go upstairs; and 'Descendez' for either come or go down stairs. If you wish to say 'I am going upstairs,' you may either say 'Je vais monter,' or 'Je vais en haut'; and for 'I am going down stairs,' 'Je vais descendre,' or 'Je vais en bas.' Now, Robert, if you recollect these expressions, you will find you have made an important addition to your familiar French. Your exercise will not be very long to-day, because I wish you to get on with your 'Voyage à Paris,' and to become familiar with some of the good people of Dieppe, where we left our travellers. Now, I must give you a few rules for your exercise. Proper names used as substantives, and words of foreign origin do not generally change in the plural, except such foreign words as have become part of their language. For instance, zéros, cyphers; numéros, numbers; pianos, pianos. Only recollect these exceptions, and you will find little difficulty in the following exercise; but, of course, you must apply preceding rules of which you have given illustrations; for instance, the adoption or omission of the article, un, a, or one. Thus to make one thousand, you must not say, in French, pour faire un mille, but pour faire mille."

EXERCISE.

FORMATION OF THE PLURAL IN NOUNS OF A FOREIGN ORIGIN.

1. There is sometimes more wit in a little volume than in many large folios. 2. We have bought deux lavabos at the fair. 3. We have heard at the concert two concertos and five duets. 4. What numbers have you drawn at the lottery? 5. The operas of Rossini are sublime. 6. How do you like the pianos of Mr. C? 7. How many cyphers (have you to place) after the number one to make one thousand? 8. The same king who employed (such men as) Condé and Turenne in his armies, Colbert and Louvois in his cabinet, chose Racine and Boileau to write his history, Bossuet and Fénelon to instruct his children, and Fléchier and Massillon for his own teachers.

THE KEY OF THE EXERCISE.

LE CORRIÈRE DU THÈME.

1. Il y a quelquefois plus d'esprit dans un petit volume que dans beaucoup de gros folios. 2. Nous avons acheté deux lavabos à la foire. 3. Nous avons entendu au concert deux concertos et cinq duos. 4. Quels numéros avez-vous tirés à la loterie? 5. Les opéras de Rossini sont sublimes. 6. Comment trouvez-vous les pianos de M. C? 7. Combien de zéros faut-il placer après le nombre un pour faire mille? 8. Le même roi qui employa les Condé et les Turenne dans ses armées, les Colbert et les Louvois dans son cabinet, choisit les Racine et les Boileau pour écrire son histoire, les Bossuet et les Fénelon pour instruire ses enfants, et les Fléchier et les Massillon pour ses propres maîtres.

OF THE SOUND i.

The letter i is sometimes mute, as in the words poignard, poignée, poitrine, poignet, poignant, poitrail, and in words of which these are the roots.

The letter i is also silent when placed before l or ll, and preceded by another vowel; it shows then only that this l or ll is liquid, as we shall see hereafter; as in the words travail, work; bouillir, éventail, fan, &c., which are pronounced as if written traval, bouillir, éventail, giving to the l or ll the liquid sound.

The letter i is sometimes found with two dots over it, as î; these dots are called trema, or dieresis, and indicate that the letter i must be sounded by itself, and should be marked î, as in the words hair, héroïne, &c.

The sound i is also produced by the following arrangement of letters: -is, as in je lis, I read; î, as in il lit, he reads; ys, as in fleurs de lys, lily flowers; but if the word lys is employed by itself, the s is sounded.

Thus the sound i is represented in French as follows: -i, y, î, is, it, ys.

There is no way for a foreigner to know when the sound i should be represented by i or y but by the etymology of the word itself. If the word is derived from the Greek, and has, in that language, the letter upsilon, this letter is replaced in the French word by y; but as the knowledge of the Greek is not general, we intend adding a list of French words written with y, which are most generally used.

I should also like to have some more water. Je voudrais aussi avoir encore de l'eau.
And a large basin; this one is too small. Et une grande cuvette; celle-ci est trop petite.
I must also have some towels, and a large piece of soap. Il me faudra aussi des essuie-mains, et un grand morceau de savon.

The chamber-maid shall bring you all these things in an instant. La fille vous apportera tout cela dans un instant.
Is there anything else I can do for you? Y a-t-il encore quelque chose à votre service?
Will you have up supper? Faut-il vous servir à souper?
We shall sup at the "table d'hôte," or ordinary. Nous souperons à la table d'hôte.
Then you must come down exactly at eight o'clock. Il faudra donc descendre à huit heures précises.
We will not fail to do so. Nous n'y manquerons pas.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XVI.

SOUND.

NATURE AND PRODUCTION OF SOUND (continued).

429. If one string of a violin vibrates twice as fast as another, what is said of the two sounds produced?—That one is an Octave higher in pitch than the other.

430. What is the range of sensibility of the human ear to musical sounds?—The lowest, or most grave, musical note of which the ear is sensible is produced by 8 vibrations in a second; and the highest, or most acute, note, by 24,000 vibrations in a second.

431. Compare the highest and lowest notes of an ordinary piano-forte.—The lowest is produced by 27½ vibrations in a second, and the highest by 3,520.

432. If a glass tumbler be made to ring with a musical sound, by tapping it with the finger-nail,

* Auberge is the French word for an inn, and aubergiste for an innkeeper, or landlord. Hôtel is used for an inn on a large scale, in the same manner as we use the word.

† Est-ce, "is it," occurs very frequently in French sentences. When followed by que, "that," it greatly assists in asking questions. Est-ce que is, literally translated, is it that; but it serves for a great variety of questions. For instance: Est-ce que je puis m'en aller, "May I go?" Est-ce que vous y serez, "Shall you be there?" Est-ce que c'est tout, "Is it all?" &c. &c.

‡ Cuvette is the correct term for a wash-hand basin. § Y a-t-il is another useful phrase for interrogations. Literally translated, it means there is it; but it may be made useful in rendering into French a great variety of questions. For instance: Y a-t-il quelqu'un, "Is any one there?" Y a-t-il de l'espérance, "Is there any hope?" Y a-t-il de la place, "Is there any room?" &c.

|| La table d'hôte in France is very preferable to the ordinaries generally met with in England. For the small sum of two francs—about equal to twenty pence of our money—a dinner or supper can be had, at which several courses, consisting of all the delicacies of the season, are served up.

what is the reason that the sound ceases if the finger be placed on the rim?—The pressure of the finger stops the vibrations.

433. If water be poured into the tumbler, and it then be tapped, why does it give a note of a lower pitch?—Because it vibrates less rapidly than before. The pitch of a musical sound depends on the rapidity of vibration.

434. What does the loudness of a sound depend upon?—The force with which the sounding body acts against the air, and so upon the ear also, in each vibration.

435. Illustrate by an example.—If a violin-player wishes to produce a loud note he draws his bow violently across the string; the string is thus made to vibrate through a greater distance, and act upon the air with more force.

436. Give another illustration.—A large bell gives out a louder sound than a small one; for two reasons—because the extent of the vibrations is greater, and the mass in vibration is larger.

PROPAGATION OF SOUND IN THE AIR.

437. Mention some facts which go to show that sound is not conveyed, instantaneously, from the sounding body to the ear.—We do not hear the blows of a hammer, at a distance, at the same instant that we see them struck. The report of a gun is always heard later than the flash is seen. A flash of lightning from a distant thunder cloud is seen several seconds before the thunder clap arrives.

438. What is the velocity of sound through the air?—1,124 feet per second.

439. Why does the loudness of a sound diminish as it is propagated through the air, from the sounding body?—Because the original impulse communicated to the air is spread over a greater space.

440. Does the intensity of sound also vary with the state of the weather?—It does. Sounds are louder when they come with the wind, and in a cold than in a warm day; also in a humid than a dry state of the air, but they are obstructed by falling rain or snow.

441. Mention one or two striking facts in illustration of the great distance at which sounds may be heard over water and ice.—It is related in the account of the Third Polar Expedition of Captain Parry that a conversation was once held across the harbour of Port Bowen, a mile and a quarter wide.

442. What is the greatest distance at which any sound has been heard?—The cannonade of a sea-fight between the English and Dutch, in 1672, is said to have been heard across England in Wales, a distance of over 200 miles. The explosions of volcanoes among the Andes, in South America, are also said to have been heard at a much greater distance than this.

443. How can we ascertain the distance of an approaching thunder cloud?—By noting the number of seconds in the interval between a flash of lightning and the thunder clap that follows it, and allowing 1,124 feet for every second.

BLIND MINNIE.

DURING the conversation recorded in our last chapter, Minnie had remained silent, and, with crimsoning cheek, she now answered warmly: "Ay, truly, sir, he is only too generous, too kind a brother. He denies himself comfort, that he may surround me with these luxuries, and—"

"And he is quite right, my dear," interrupted the old gentleman, good-humouredly. "I understand now, Frank, your seclusion from the gay world of Bombay, every night, as soon as business is over; I have often wondered why one never met you anywhere. But no wonder! no wonder! I heard you had a home and a sister here, but little dreamed it was a paradise, guarded and blessed by an angel, albeit with clipped wings. I verily believe you are the happiest pair of young dreamers the world ever saw."

"You are right, sir," replied Frank, eagerly; "her angel presence has been my safeguard against temptation, which, had I been left to loneliness, I might not have been strong to withstand. I owe her deep gratitude!"

"You are a noble fellow, Frank," ejaculated Mr. Robson, for which kind appreciation, Minnie gave him an emphatic pressure, "and you deserve your happiness. Miss Howard, it was a striking proof of God's providential mercy that you should have arrived so immediately after the death of his friend and namesake, as noble a youth as ever lived. I suppose Frank has told you of him until you are weary of the theme."

"No, indeed, sir," said Minnie: "we have sometimes spoken of him, but rarely; whenever I alluded to his friend, Frank became so agitated and sorrowful that it has been lately a tacitly avoided subject between us."

"Ah, no wonder, no wonder!" cried the old gentleman. "They loved each other so deeply. Such devotion as theirs was never before witnessed, I believe, among modern men. Damon and Pythias surely did not surpass these two young lovers, for such they were, and they were worthy of each other. 'The two Franks' will long be a byword in Bombay. But in your fascinating society I am forgetting the object of my visit," he abruptly exclaimed, unfolding a paper, "which was to show my young friend here an account of some astonishing cures of blindness performed in Paris by the celebrated Dr. B—, and then I wished," he added, observing the look of surprise upon the young faces before him, "to make a proposition, by which you might go over, and have the benefit of his advice."

A look of joy beamed upon the young girl's face. Frank perceived it, and answered hastily—

"Oh, how shall I thank you for your kind recollection of us, my dear sir!"

"Tut, my boy, listen to my proposition. We need some one to go to France upon business for the firm. Neither Brother John, nor I, nor our 'Co.' care to go ourselves; and we could not find a more able agent than yourself, nor one in whom we feel such confidence. We have been wishing to ask you to go for some time, but hesitated, knowing how hard it would be for you to leave your sister here. We have, therefore, gladly seized upon this opportunity of urging you both to take the long and fatiguing journey, hoping it might prove of advantage to Miss Howard as well as to ourselves. Thus, you see, our motive is, after all, a selfish one. Now you must decide. Will you go? If so, you must be ready to set off in a few days; by the next steamer, if possible."

Minnie turned to him her face, in which shone the gratitude she could not frame into words, while Frank replied—

"Oh, sir, we are not deceived, believe me, by your noble attempt to cloak your benevolent intentions in this guise! My heart is full of gratitude! How can I express it?" And overpowered by conflicting emotions, the young man fairly burst into tears.

"Why, my boy, you are as tender-hearted as a woman!" cried his kind-hearted employer. "Don't imagine the benevolence so disinterested. I promise you it is an important mission upon which we shall send you; we will speak of it in the morning. Meanwhile, I will leave you and this fair lady to decide whether you can abandon your fairy bower, and take the long journey for our gratification, though, I own, it will be a great disappointment to us should you refuse. I will leave the paper with you. My dear young princess," he added, gallantly kissing her hand, "I can hardly find courage to quit this paradise for the haunts of men; but my brother is waiting for me, so farewell." And the old gentleman abruptly vanished ere the young couple could say a word in reply.

For some seconds they both sat silent; then Frank, embracing her, exclaimed—

"Oh, Minnie, you will see! You will see! How beautiful, how happy you will be!"

"Would it not make you also happy, Frank?"

A shade of pain passed over his face; but he replied—

"Undoubtedly; but then will you not leave me?"

"Frank, these suspicions again?"

"No, darling, I did not mean it. I am so jealous! Come, let me read you the paper which—"

"Oh, that kind old gentleman!" exclaimed Minnie.

"Frank, how blessed I am! How much kindness and true unselfishness there is in the world! Frank, how can we thank him?"

Frank joined in her grateful praises with a zeal which would have rewarded the generous brothers had they heard them, and had they needed any reward beyond their own happy consciousness of having done well.

Our young friends read the account of the cures in the paper, one of which resembled Minnie's own case. The next morning, Frank accepted the offer of Robson and Co., and received their instructions with regard to the business which he was to transact for them. The next few days were spent in preparing for their departure. With Ann's invaluable help, all was soon ready; that good woman was overjoyed with the prospect of returning to England again. She had been well pleased with her residence in India, but she wanted to see again her family and home. But Minnie and Frank could not leave the graceful apartments where the happiest hours of their young lives had been passed, without a heartfelt sigh of regret, and even a few tears from Minnie.

We will pass over, without comment, their journey to Alexandria, and rejoin our young travellers, about a week after quitting that port, on board the fine steamship Persia, which is rapidly conveying them towards Southampton.

Poor Frank had been very unhappy for many days. His unrevealed secret seemed to him now more weighty than ever before; various circumstances convinced him that it must now be told. Minnie was, they hoped, about to recover her sight; and the absence in him of certain peculiarities which she remembered in her brother would excite her wonder; also, he feared that her beauty, so startling in its purity, would attract many admirers, and that the brother would be called upon to relinquish his sister to a lover. Moreover, he yearned to tell her of his own passionate love—to entreat her to become his wife. Alas, through how terrible an ordeal they must both pass ere he durst hope to receive even her pardon! She might never again grant him trust or affection. He trembled as he thought of these things; but, cost what it might, the confession could no longer be deferred. Better, too, to make it while on the ocean, where she could not, in her first feelings of indignant surprise, fly from him.

Several times already, during the voyage, he had approached Minnie, resolved to tell the tale; but either some of the passengers would join them, or some cheerful greeting from her would unnerve him. The words would die upon his lips, and, after an hour spent with her, he would rush to his own cabin, feeling more guilty, more miserable than before.

At length, one clear, still, moonlight night, perceiving Minnie alone, with a sudden feeling of desperate courage, he strode across the deck to the corner where she was seated, and, in a husky voice, exclaimed—

"Minnie, for Heaven's sake don't speak to me until you have listened to what I must tell you! and, terrible as it will be to believe, do not imagine for an instant that it is a cruel jest, for I solemnly swear to you that it is truth."

"Brother," she began, "what—"

"Hush! I beseech you not to question me!" Then, in a softer, though hollow voice, he said, "Ah, Minnie, you once promised me that nothing in the world should ever separate us! Will you now promise that, whatever may be my secret, you will forgive and love me still?"

"My brother," again began the young girl.

"Yet no! Minnie, don't promise! I have no right to ask such mercy from you. Minnie, I am a wretched man! I have fearfully deceived you, and am too cowardly to tell you of it."

"My brother," she answered, gently, clasping his hand, "you can have no sin against me which should cause you such distress. Whatever it be, I forgive you freely. Nay, my brother, don't tell me if it gives such sorrow," she continued, soothingly.

"Oh, it must be told!" he cried, wildly. "Don't call me brother; I have no right to the title. Minnie, shrink from me; I deserve it! I have deceived you, you and your father, though God knows I did it believing it right. I am not your brother!"

"Frank, you are raving—you are ill!" cried the terrified girl.

"Hush! I am not raving. Let go my hands; your touch weakens me! But let me kneel here beside you, even while I bring desolation to your heart and to mine own."

After a pause, and a violent struggle with himself, Frank began, in an unnaturally calm voice, his heart-rending revelation. He told Minnie of her brother's long illness and death—of the solemn trust he had given to him of the charge of her father and herself—of his own temptation to deceive them—of the motives which had induced him to do it—of his frequent struggles for courage to make known to her his true position—of his passionate love for her, which had been first unveiled to his own knowledge by Dr. Hall's words; how her words had then calmed the fever within his soul, and silenced his lips; how, in their happy dreamlike life since, he had almost forgotten the past; of the shock Mr. Robson's proposition had caused him, and of his thoughts and wretchedness during their voyage; then prayed her pardon.

Frank had spoken rapidly, never pausing for an instant to think, or mark the effect of his tale upon his companion; now he noticed her. She had leaned her head upon the vessel's side, and pressed her hands upon her face as he began, and remained thus motionless. He prayed restlessly that she would look at him, speak, reproach him, anything but this crushing silence. With evident effort, she slowly raised her head, and turned towards him her face, colourless as a marble statue, and, but for a painful quivering upon the lips, as rigid. Frank started in terror as he looked at her.

"My God! What have I done?" burst from his lips; then, with a deep groan, he buried his face in her lap, while his whole frame shook with the violence of his emotion.

"Hush!" said Minnie, in a voice so hollow that it made him shudder, and an icy feeling of horror crept over him.

She attempted to rise; he seized her arm, exclaiming, in an agonised tone—

"Oh, will you not speak to me before you go? For mercy's sake, don't leave me thus! Speak to me!"

Minnie in vain tried to reply. At length, she uttered, brokenly—

"Not now; I cannot. Take me down stairs."

He mechanically obeyed, carried her to the cabin, and placed her in the arms of her attendant, where she fainted; but this he knew not for many days after.

Through the long watches of that miserable night, Frank paced the deck; at one moment almost frantic at the thought of the distress he had caused—of the ruin which threatened them both; at another, utterly stupefied by the weight of his wretchedness.

As the morning dawned, he hastened to Minnie's state-room, and besought Ann to tell him of her. The reply brought him no consolation. She had lain motionless all night; but Ann knew, from the gasping sighs which now and then escaped her, that she had not slept.

Desiring Ann, so soon as Minnie seemed aroused, to beg her to see him, he turned away to his own room, and, throwing himself upon his bed, fell into a heavy sleep, from which he did not awake until the day was far advanced. He then attempted to see Minnie; but she refused. He heard her say, "Not to-day; I will send for him when I am strong enough to see him; but, nurse, beg him not to be alarmed—that I am not very sick, only weak from my sudden illness last night—that I hope to be up again to-morrow."

Frank felt inexpressibly touched by her kind thoughtfulness for him, even under the intense sufferings he had occasioned. More heart-sick than before, he returned to his cabin. To pass another day and night in this terrible suspense—it seemed an eternity of misery; he must, by some method, communicate with Minnie, or he should go mad! He seized pen and paper, and wrote her a wild, incoherent letter of bitter self-reproach and passionate entreaties.

Frank's unexpected dark revelation on the previous evening, fearful as it was, had come upon Minnie with a startling conviction that it was true, which paralysed her, and froze the very blood in her veins; hence that unnatural calmness which so alarmed Frank. On recovering from the swoon into which she had fallen, on attempting to move, she had imagined herself under the influence of a hideous nightmare, and in that impression she remained for many hours; but at length her mind awoke from its stupor to the sad reality. She by degrees recalled, with terrible distinctness, each word the young man had spoken, and the vivid picture his confession had drawn before her mind, with an anguish of heart which none but the orphan and friendless can know; then her thoughts reverted to the young man himself, and her first feeling was of unmingled shuddering abhorrence for his deception, so revolting to her pure soul.

But a spirit so gentle could not long harbour thoughts of bitterness so foreign to its nature. She soon found herself remembering the many and strong temptations to which he had yielded, and making excuses for him; then she began to pity him as she remembered his self-reproach, his deep suffering, occasioned by his single fault. And had he not, after all, been actuated by an earnest, however mistaken, desire to fulfil his vow to her brother? And how nobly—how generously he had fulfilled it! How disinterestedly and faithfully he had devoted himself to their service! How untroubled her father's dying hours had been made through his untiring care! She recollected, with gratitude, his continual self-sacrifice for her pleasure; that his sole thought had ever seemed to be her happiness; that his unvarying affection had made the last few months the most serene and free from care of her life; and when she recalled to mind the serene joy of her father in the belief that he was leaving her under the protecting care of so good a brother, she almost persuaded herself that Frank had done well to deceive him. I say almost, for Minnie had been nurtured in the correct principle, "Truth above all things," and, judged by that principle, she felt that he had done wrong. But should his one fault annul his many virtues, which none knew so thoroughly as herself? Assuredly not; such ingratitude in her would be a greater fault by far than his had been. Oh, she would love him still! He should still be her brother. She would see him in the morning; she would speak gently and affectionately to him; he should not feel himself forsaken!

At this moment, his letter was handed her; its tone of anguish touched her deeply. She saw how severely he was suffering in this suspense; she would see him at once. Summoning all her strength, she sent for Frank. We will discreetly close the door upon their meeting, nor seek to hear even a breath of her softly whispered pardon, her soothing words, or of his passionate repentance and love. Under her gentle influence, the fever within him became gradually allayed; and he left her presence not less self-condemned, but composed and strengthened to bear whatever consequences to himself his fault might bring, and with a new adoration for Minnie in his heart, compared with which his former love, intense as it had been, seemed unworthy. She now shone before him as a heaven-inspired being, as truly an angel in spirit as she had always appeared to him in form.

Minnie had suffered more during the long interview than she had allowed Frank to perceive; and as soon as he left her she threw herself exhausted upon the bed, and fell asleep. She could not rise above the weight of heart-grief which so heavily oppressed her, truly as she had forgiven Frank as the cause of it. During the remainder of the voyage, she lay physically helpless as a child. The news soon spread through the vessel that she had been taken ill suddenly, and, as she received daily visits from Frank, as well as from the lady passengers, who were all interested in her, no one sought to know more. With one family in particular, a naval officer and his wife, Minnie entertained the most friendly relations. This kind couple had already invited their young friends to go with them to their home in the Isle of Wight, and spend there a few days previous to their departure for France; this had been gratefully declined until the important business which was the object of their journey should have been attended to. Now Minnie was so feeble that she gladly accepted the hospitable invitation, which was so kindly renewed, to place herself, for a few days at least, under the motherly care of Mrs. Leighton.

It was arranged that Frank should proceed alone to Paris, attend to his employers' affairs, and see the oculist; and, if he thought Minnie's sight might be restored, the Leightons would hasten their departure for the Continent, where they had intended to spend a few months in travelling, bring Minnie to Paris, and remain with her during the necessary operations. How grateful our two young friends felt for this kind thoughtfulness none but themselves could know. Together they praised God that he brought to them such friends in their trying emergency.

(To be concluded in our next.)

HUSH!

"I CAN scarcely hear," she murmured,
"For my heart beats loud and fast,
But surely, in the far, far distance,
I can hear a sound at last."

"It is only the reapers singing,
As they carry home their sheaves;
And the evening breeze has risen,
And rustles the dying leaves."

"Listen! there are voices talking."
Calmly still she strove to speak,
Yet her voice grew faint and trembling,
And the red flushed in her cheek.
"It is only the children playing
Below now their work is done,
And they laugh that their eyes are dazzled
By the rays of the setting sun."

Fainter grew her voice, and weaker,
As, with anxious eyes, she cried,
"Down the avenue of chestnuts
I can hear a horseman ride."
"It was only the deer that were feeding
In a herd on the clover grass;
They were startled, and fled to the thicket
As they saw the reapers pass."

Now the night arose in silence,
Birds lay in their leafy nest,
And the deer couched in the forest,
And the children were at rest.
There was only a sound of sleeping
From watchers around a bed,
But rest to the weary spirit,
Peace to the quiet dead!

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON, D.C.L.

HISTORY is one of the most important subjects which can engage the attention; and he who undertakes to write history enters on no common labour, and accepts no ordinary responsibility. The steady and incessant application in the discovery, selection, and arrangement of material is more than enough to deter most men from this self-imposed task, while the natural bias, the personal predilection for this form of government, or that mode of faith, commonly conspire to render abortive the industrious exertions of the writer. They make history to pass through a false medium; they allow prejudice to throw an artificial chiaro-scuro over their canvas, and they paint their one-eyed princes in profile.

History is the chief critic of the deeds of men; and that historians should heighten beauties and soften defects in their own party, if they do nothing in malice to that of their opponents, is no matter of surprise. But history to be useful must be faithful; if its fidelity is destroyed it becomes no better than a fable, and not always so interesting.

Historians are proverbially partial. They have each their own system, and view facts according to their own theories. If history be "a vast collection of moral and social experiments, which mankind make involuntarily and very expensively on themselves," it is essential, in order to be benefited by the experiments, that we should know the principles of the science. But it is on these principles that the historians disagree. The historian who deserves our best thanks and the lasting gratitude of the race, is he who, without affectation of candour, relates the plain facts of history, and leaves the verdict with the reader. Better that the uninvestigating mind should be stored with dates and legends only, than that it should unquestioningly accept the construction of a partizan writer. And where can such a historian be found who is not a partizan, "counting one by one," from Livy and Tacitus to Alison and Macaulay?

The sharp critics of Sir Archibald Alison adduce the old charge of prejudice and partizanship—a charge, as we have said, common to all historians. Even William Howitt, the celebrated author of that popular and most impartial work, "Cassell's Illustrated History of England," has not been entirely exempt from the universal charge of occasionally using an expression which has betrayed a certain bias. The "History of Europe" is indubitably tinged with the political and religious predilections of the author. Sir Archibald is a staunch conservative, strongly opposed to all innovation; he has a natural leaning towards the privileged elegancies of life; his sympathies are with the courtly. This has made him oblivious of the many good and great things accomplished and to be accomplished by the liberal tendencies of this age; but the history is well worthy the extended popularity it has achieved. It is a work of very considerable research, and of average candour.

Alison's "History of Europe" has been a great success. It has rapidly passed through several editions; it has been translated into French, German, Hindustani, and Arabic; it has been reprinted and widely circulated in America. The account which the author gives of the first conception of this great work is deeply interesting, and cannot be read without gratification. "Among the countless multitudes," he says, "which the extraordinary events of the period had drawn together from every part of Europe to the French capital, and the brilliancy of the spectacle (the review of the allied troops, 1814) had concentrated on one spot, was one young man who had watched with intense interest the progress of the war from his earliest years, and who, having hurried from the paternal roof in Edinburgh on the first cessation of hostilities, then conceived the idea of narrating its events, and amidst its wonders had inhaled that ardent spirit, that deep enthusiasm, which, sustaining him through fifteen subsequent years of travel and study, and fifteen more of composition, has at length realised itself in the present history."

The original work extended from the French revolution to the battle of Waterloo. The first volume was issued in 1833. The author has recently engaged in a continuation of the history, bringing it down to the conclusion of the war in the Crimea.

Sir Archibald Alison is in every sense a student. From his childhood he has been familiarised with literary pursuits. His father, the Rev. Archibald Alison, attained some celebrity as the author of the "Essays on Taste." He was born on the 29th of December, 1792, at the parsonage house of Kenley in Shropshire. He was educated at Edinburgh, where his father was then settled, and where he enjoyed the privilege of studying under Dugald Stewart, Professor Playfair, and other illustrious men who made famous that ancient seat of learning. Under such able tutors Alison made rapid progress, and carried off the highest prizes both for Greek and mathematics. It is worthy of remark that his mother's family had for two centuries been eminent in mathematics and the exact sciences, so that it seemed as if that faculty was hereditary; at all events, he was a scholar, "and a ripe and good one," at an early age; and when he appeared as an advocate at the Scottish bar his success was confidently predicted.

Alison afterwards travelled extensively in Europe, having conceived in 1814—the year in which he was called to the Scottish bar—the idea of his great work, and bearing this object constantly in view throughout his journeyings. But he did not sacrifice to this ulterior purpose the duties or the responsibilities of his position. He was a good lawyer. His reputation in this respect was established by the publication of his two works, "The Principles of the Criminal Law of Scotland" (Edinburgh, 1832) and "The Practice of the Criminal Law." This work has now become the standard authority on that subject in Scotland, and bears a high reputation both on the Continent and in America.

In addition to these professional labours, Sir Archibald Alison has published, besides his "History of Europe," a "Life of the Duke of Marlborough," "Principles of Population," in which he combats the Malthusian theory, and "England in 1815 and 1845; or, a Sufficiency of Contracted Currency," a work which attracted considerable attention. Sir Archibald Alison has contributed for many years to "Blackwood's Magazine." A selection from articles on topics of the day, which originally appeared in that monthly, have been published under the title of "Essays."

Public honours have been awarded, and official appointments of responsibility and emolument have been intrusted to Sir Archibald. In 1822 he was made Deputy-Advocate of Scotland, and held that important position till the close of the Wellington administration, in 1830. Four years later he received the appointment, from the late Sir Robert Peel, of Sheriff of Lanarkshire. In 1845 he was elected Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and in 1851 accepted the same office in the University of Glasgow. During the existence of the Derby ministry in 1852, he was created a baronet; and in the following year the honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford.

Flattering as such testimonies of public favour must be, the eminent success he has achieved in the field of literature is still more gratifying. He has contributed an important and valuable work to the literature of our country; he has given to the world the result of thirty years' labour; and, as the author of the "History of Europe," has attained a position more exalted than any official appointment or titular dignity could confer.

THE GRAND DUCHY OF BADEN.

THIS pleasant little principality, whose frontiers join those of France, and whose functionaries mount guard on the Rhine bridge by the side of the French soldiers, is the seventh in rank among the German States. Its length is about 150 miles from north to south; its breadth, from the Rhine to the Bavarian frontier, about 60; and from the Rhine to the Wurtemberg frontier, 115. The duchy forms an irregular figure, very narrow in the centre, and stretching out at both ends. It contains more than 100 cities, 36 boroughs, 1,688 villages, and has a population almost equal to that of Paris, and about half that of London.

But what a happy country it is: so fresh, so fertile, so industrious, and so varied. "Heaven preserve us," says a French writer, "from any disordered dream of ambition, but especially from designs on this little duchy."

As we promenade the high street of Baden, with its brave shops and bustling shopkeepers, we are struck with the prosperity apparent on every side, and as we pass out into the open country, under the branches of fruit trees which extend from the bright waters of the Rhine to the sombre shadows of the Black Forest, there is something in the scene which fills the heart with a pleasant melody—a song of fatherland. Baden is a microcosm of the fatherland. All that is most beautiful or most striking in Germany is there to be found. Here are maize fields and gardens, vineyards rich with purple grapes, orchards wealthy with ruddy fruit, while trees that flourish on the Alpine heights stretch their dark canopy of foliage over us. Here on the banks of the Rhine, the Neckar, and Lake Constance are the fashionable mansions of the aristocracy, and there in the Black Forest are Swiss chalets, while here, and there, and everywhere in the duchy are national residences after every sort of German pattern to enchant the tourist and satisfy the resident. On the summit of the hills, and in the recesses of the valleys, are dismantled castles and dilapidated churches, illustrative of the religion and chivalric legends of old Germany; and here are modern cities, affording (after a fashion) the luxuries of Paris and the comforts of London. Here is the rickety little city of Baden, turbulent with the harsh cry of the croupier, with the orchestra of the ball-room, and with all the miscellaneous sounds which make up the din and turmoil of town life. But Karlsruhe, the country quarters of the ducal court; Mannheim, formerly the capital of the principality; Heidelberg, with its marvellous castle and learned professors; Freyburg, with its beautiful cathedral and ancient university—gratify the eye by their picturesque appearance and elicit our warmest sympathy.

Baden is in part Protestant and in part Catholic. The foundations of the different religious creeds for holy and charitable purposes are stated by Hennitsch to be:—Catholic religious and secular foundations, 2,334; annual revenue, 1,427,243 florins; Protestant, 605 foundations; annual revenue, 674,616 florins. In addition to these rich donations, all classes of civil and religious officers have subscription funds for providing for widows and orphans, and savings' banks are general to encourage providence amongst the lower classes.

The military force of the duchy amounts nominally to 10,000 men, which forms part of the second division of the 8th corps of the Confederate army. The troops are raised by annual conscription, but after a certain period of drill, the greater part are disbanded. Extreme economy is practised in the management of the war department—an example well worthy the imitation of more powerful states.

Agriculture forms the principal occupation of the people, although manufactures are not neglected. Corn, barley, maize, and potatoes are grown with great success. The slopes of the hills are covered with vineyards. Walnut, chestnut, peach, apricot, plum, and cherry trees produce abundant crops of very choice fruit. The forests abound in valuable timber; a large quantity of fir and oak is annually exported. Horses, horned cattle, sheep, goats, and pigs, are of good quality, and are reared in great numbers. Mining operations are conducted with some success; silver is found at St. Anton, in the valley of the Kinzig; copper at Kork and Neusadt; iron is produced at Kandern, and in various parts of the Black Forest; manganese is found near Villingen; salt at Rappennau and Durrheim; coals at Offenburg.

The number of factories has been rapidly increasing since the accession of the Grand Duchy to the Germanic Customs' League. Clocks, wooden toys, straw hats, lace, and embroidery have for a long period been sent from Baden into all parts of Europe. The additional manufacturing undertakings are chiefly cotton spinning and weaving establishments, ribbon, and beet root sugar factories.

Each village has a school to which parents are compelled to send their children; each city has a gymnasium; and, as we have already noticed, the duchy boasts two universities—Freyburg and Heidelberg, the latter being the most ancient in Germany.

Notwithstanding the continual activity of the Grand Duchy of Baden; notwithstanding the innumerable quantity of tourists, the curious, the idlers, artists, valetudinarians, and adventurers, who incessantly traverse this high road of Germany, each bringing with them their own national tastes and feelings, and introducing into the duchy strange fashions and novel dialects, the people have preserved their ancient manners, their German language, and the costume of their fathers.

The accompanying engraving represents two young women of the country in their ordinary costume, and a shepherd—bearing no very close resemblance to a shepherd of Arcadia, but a faithful type of those of Baden.

The traditional costume, and the simple habits and unaffected innocence of the rustic population of Baden, have been beautifully illustrated by Hebel in his songs and eclogues.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

For new-made honour

Doth forget men's names.—SHAKESPEARE.

WHAT a happy, merry evening they spent—the Blossom family, and their sweet foster-child, their darling, their Hope.

Larky's consciousness of her superiority, or, rather, of his deficiencies in education, refinement, and elegance, compared to herself, was forgotten for a time when he saw her sitting amongst them, so completely one of them, as in the dear old days of the Green Fields Ragged School.

She was as active, as handy, and as motherly as ever, and when Bob Blossom, her foster-father, came in from work, Hope kissed him as tenderly as if she had still been the little Hope of eight years ago.

But Bob felt there was a change in their relative positions, and, after the first embrace, he said—

"Why, Hope, my darling, now thee be grown such a foine, grand lady, ain't thee ashamed of thy poor working man of a feather?"

"Ashamed of you, my father! kind, good 'daddy,' as I used to call you," said Hope; "what puts such a cruel thought into your head?"

"Why, thee be ris so high, lass, thee might feel above kissing the loikes of me."

"I must be sunk very low," said Hope, "not to be proud to kiss you, my father."

While Apple Blossom kept the shop, Bob went out, at four shillings a day, to put gardens in order—small town gardens, that only wanted one day's tending now and then to be very prim and smart—and Bob, honest fellow, took a real pride in all these gardens.

"Ye's all so smart and foine," he said, glancing round the tea-table, "that I think I must tidy myself up a bit, out of compliment to Hopy, there."

"And to the day, daddy," said Hope, raising, as of yore, her rosy fore-finger. "It's my mother's birthday."

Every one else had forgotten this festival; but Hope never forgot anything.

She had brought her "mammy," as she once more called her, a shawl, crochied by herself. Such a delicate fairy web of Shetland wool!

Bob soon re-appeared, shining with yellow soap and hair oil, and in his Sunday's best. Then came Jem Goodman, kind as ever, but too busy to stay long; and, just as they were all lamenting the absence of Merry, that gay damsel (as Hope opened a cupboard to search for something wanted at table) sprang out, blushing and giggling, having been hid up there, half stifled and almost doubled, for the sake of this surprise.

Merry was as fond of fun as ever. She was now a very handsome, blooming, nut-brown girl of eighteen; in very good service, too—as handsome a girl, in her own style, as England could produce.

Her thick, glossy, wavy hair shone like black satin, her hazel eyes laughed and sparkled beneath her black brows, her nose was a pretty, delicate nose, though it did turn up a little, her round, plump cheek was of the brightest carnation, her laughing lips of coral red, parted above such white, even teeth, that one could not quarrel with that mouth for being a little too large for regular beauty.

Her figure was perfection—not the sylph-like perfection of Hope's graceful, delicate form, but the perfection of that sort of beauty we look for in a daughter of the people—the Venus of the mill; tall, straight, well-developed, clothed with flesh so firm, rosy, and glowing it might have served a Hebe; a beautiful neck, a taper waist, a rounded arm, strong as a man's, a neat foot and ankle, and a leg that would not lag behind.

The same contrast that was so beautiful in childhood between Hope Evermore and Merry Blossom existed still; but it was even more marked, more remarkable now, because education had done so much to refine still more the delicate Hope, and labour to increase the muscular development of Merry.

Merry was on the whole a very good girl, and a capital servant. In her own language, she boasted, and it was an honest boast, that she could do a day's work with any one.

Merry's early propensity to pilfer and to fib had been quite cured. She was very true, and very trustworthy, but she had her faults. She was a little too fond of dress and pleasure; and though she "walked about" with Tom Trudge, and he was "her young man," she liked to be admired by the handsome young policeman X of the L division; and she had a joke, a glance, a smile, and a smart word for the baker's man, the milk man, the postman—indeed, all the postmen—the butcher's boy, and every "two-legged animal without feathers" that came to the front door or the area-gate.

This coquettish disposition of Merry's caused steady Tom Trudge many an uneasy hour, and frequent quarrels had arisen between the young lovers in consequence of it.

Apple Blossom had taken Merry seriously to task; for Tom Trudge was a capital match—so steady that he was likely to be taken into partnership by his master; and, but for his true, faithful love for Merry, might have married that master's daughter.

No one knew how it happened, but soon after Merry had rolled out of the cupboard, Tom Trudge arrived, and Apple Blossom, observing "The more the merrier," insisted on his staying to tea.

They all thoroughly enjoyed the liberal repast. The strawberries and cream, the cakes and bread-and-butter, the good tea, and above all the kindly welcome and cheerful chat.

Hope sat by her dear Larky Grigg, as lovingly as when they were children; still assuming a pretty little matronly authority over the great, handsome, noble boy—still calling him "Larky,"—still raising her finger to warn or reprove.

Oh, how he loved her! How rapid was the growth of passion in his breast! While a delicate tenderness seemed to be her response. Accidentally to touch her beautiful little hand was ecstasy—to meet her loving eyes, and hear her gentle voice, was enchantment; and when, as twilight deepened, and they sat in the soft "gloaming," before lights were called for, and Larky, beneath the shelter of the table, stole her hand, and she gladly resigned it to his, his young heart felt as if it would burst, but that tears rose to his eyes.

There was no coquetry in Hope. She loved Larky, and she was not ashamed to let him know that she loved him. It was a young girl's pure, frank, innocent love; but his was the passion of a man.

Merry was teasing Tom Trudge with accounts of admirers, conquests she had made, compliments paid her by one postman, and smart sayings of hers to another.

All this Tom Trudge, who was a matter-of-fact, took very ill; but the more he scowled and talked, the more Merry talked, and teased, and boasted, and quizzed him.

At length Apple Blossom, who liked Tom Trudge, and felt very much vexed with her saucy, imprudent, light-hearted, light-headed Merry, turned the conversation by asking if any one knew what had become of little Nussy Darrell and blue-eyed Baby Ben.

"O mother," said Hope, "I forgot to tell you that I have seen Nussy, and heard of Baby Ben."

"Oh, tell me all about them, Hopy!" said kind Apple Blossom. "Poor children, since they got Natt's property, and was put in Chancery, I've never seen or heard from them; only Jem Goodman found out for me that Ness wor put to a foine boarding-school, and little Ben as I suckled till he wor like a sucking-pig, so fat, wor put to a lady as advertised for a child to bring up with her own; and had found his legs, and wor struttin' about, all braid and feathers, as fine as any peacock. But tell me, lass, whenever did thee see Ness; and how come thee to know her?"

"Why, mother, you'd know her yourself—she is not the least altered in face or form, only taller."

"And did she remember thee, lassie? Thee wor a little mother to Ness!"

"Oh, she remembered me well enough, mother. But though she's been taught all sorts of fine things at her grand school, she hasn't been taught humility, I fear. She wants to be considered a young lady of fortune, and to forget her ragged school days."

"And when did you see her—heartless, thankless girl?" said Larky Grigg, hating her at once for not loving Hope.

"There was a grand party given at the breaking-up at her school," said Hope; "and as the orphan daughter of a once very dear friend of Lady Glenlonely's is at that school, we were all invited. The young ladies had got up a play and a concert, and prizes were distributed, and then there was a ball. Lady Glenlonely chose that I should attend her; and you may be sure when, in a sort of bill of the entertainment, I saw the name of Miss Agnes Fitz Darrell as the young lady who had won all the first prizes, I felt all in a glow and a tremor to know whether Agnes Fitz Darrell was one and the same with poor little Ness Darrell. I had heard from Jem she was at this same grand boarding-school at Kensington—Campden House—and I thought they might have put a 'Fitz' before the name on account of her father's crime and disgrace, and her poor mother's violent death—she had been placed there as a ward in Chancery; and I saw it was the same Ness Darrell the very moment she came forward, amid the applause of the whole company, to receive the first prize for 'perseverance and general good conduct.' Oh, how proud she looked, as the chaplain of the school in his robes placed a wreath upon her brow! The prize was a beautiful Bible, bound in scarlet morocco and gold; and as she stood with it in her hand, curtsying (not very low, though), and dressed in six skirts of whitenet, looped up with white roses, white kid gloves, white silk stockings, white satin shoes, and the white wreath on her pale projecting forehead, with white satin ends fluttering down her back, I could not but weep to think of the poor, half-starved, ragged little thing she was when Apple Blossom took her and blue-eyed Ben out of pure charity. I used to tuck up and take in my old frocks and things to fit the mite she was; and Merry used to wash and iron them for her; and the work we had to comb out her tangled hair, and how vain she was of her new mourning. And then to see her there, receiving the first prize for everything; and every eye upon her, and every hand applauding, and every voice crying 'Bravo! bravo!'

Oh, I thought, how she must have toiled night and day to get so far before those who had such great advantages over her, for she learnt her letters at the ragged school; and how glad she'll be to hear of her foster-mother and father, and Larky Grigg, and Merry, and 'mammy' Hope, and all!"

"She can't be groved up no beauty," said Merry, who, like all coquettes, was a little jealous of all other girls. "She wor about as ornary a little wench as you'd see in a summer day's walk. Saller and lean, she wor. Oh, she can't be no beauty, nowise."

"No," said Hope, "she is not a beauty. At least, if very regular features, and red and white complexion make beauty; but she is very elegant and clever-looking—almost too clever-looking."

"She looks all mind and no heart," said Larky.

"We will not judge her harshly," said Hope, always eager to extenuate. "Hers is a painful and singular position."

"What of her looks?" said Merry; "them's all I cares to hear about."

"Well, then," said Hope, laughing, "she has grown up rather tall, very slender—her waist you might clasp with two hands—her hair is very dark, thick, straight, and smooth."

"How do she wear it?" asked Merry.

"Braided, simply, in front, and brought round her head in a thick coronet of plaited hair; her throat is very long, which gives her dignity and grace; she holds herself very erect; her face is the face you remember—small features, projecting brow, glittering eyes, thin lips, and little, very white teeth; she is very pale and rather dark. Her hands and feet are positively tiny; and altogether, without being pretty, she is a most interesting, elegant, singular-looking girl; and Madame Hautaine, her governess, says she is more admired than most beauties, by gentlemen especially."

"That, I takes the liberty of doubting of," said Merry.

"Did thee get to speak to her, lass?" said Apple Blossom; "and did thee ax how blue-eyed Baby Ben is, and whether he's growed up strong and hearty?"

"I did; for Lady Glenlonely, who was going to have Miss Clara Brereton, her old friend's orphan daughter, on a visit, wished to ask Miss Agnes Fitz-Darrell to accompany her, feeling that so much merit ought to be encouraged by a lady of her rank. So, after the distribution of prizes, I was sent to Miss Fitz-Darrell's room to invite her in Lady Glenlonely's name."

"Well, that be interesting, anyways, that be," said Bob: "two lasses as had met at ragged school to meet so. Ness so foine, tip top of her grand boarding-school, and thee, lass, friend and companion of a lady—in her own roight a countess—noways behoid Ness, I'll be bound, in toggery, eh; and in all them foine feathers as makes foine birds. Go on, Hopy; it's as good as a play. How did she receive thee?"

"Not quite as I could have wished or expected," said Hope, blushing. "But we must make allowances; she is very peculiarly and painfully placed. No one at Campden House knows about her father and mother, and her ever having been at a ragged school."

"Did she know you at once, Hope?" said Larky. "She could not have forgotten thee?"

"She pretended not to know me, Larky Grigg; but I am certain she did, for I sent in my name as Miss Hope Evermore, on a card Lady Glenlonely had engraved for me; and when I entered, the card was crunched up in her hand, and she was as white as marble, and almost as cold and stiff. As soon as we were alone, I said, 'Little Nussy Darrell, have you indeed forgotten 'mammy' Hope?'

"What do you mean, Miss Evermore?" she said, trembling violently, and even her lips blanched.

"I mean that I'm Hope Evermore, and that you're Ness Darrell," I said, "and that I can tell you you all about our joint kind foster-parents, Apple Blossom and Bob Blossom, and all about Larky Grigg and Merry Blossom, and the ragged school, and—"

"Stop!" she said. "Since you know me, it is no use to deny that I am Agnes Darrell; but the times, the events, and the people to whom you allude, are connected with things so disgraceful, so ruinous, so degrading, and so heartrending to me, that I wish them buried in oblivion. No one here, Mrs. Hautaine excepted, has the least idea of my early history. By her advice, Fitz was prefixed to my name, to disguise it. When first I went to her after my uncle's death, and other dreadful things I need not allude to—for, of course, Miss Evermore, you know them well—I was placed as a ward in chancery with Mrs. Hautaine, at Bath, the widow of an officer who took a few young ladies to educate them. She was very kind to me, and took great pains with me. Coming into a large legacy, she left Bath, and set up this first-rate school in Hyde Park. I was the only one of her pupils who remained with her, for she doubled, nay trebled, her terms to the others, but being attached to me, and I to her, for I have no other friend, she kept me on at the same terms she had charged at Bath."

"Why say you have no other friends?" I cried, added Hope. "Have you forgotten your foster-mother and father, and Larky Grigg, and Merry, and poor Hope, your little 'mammy'?" They should not be forgotten, for they were friends in need."

"Yes," cried the proud girl, very pale, and clenching her hands, "but they know that I—who, as Agnes Fitz-Darrell, the first girl in this school, am considered on an equality with the daughters of noblemen and gentlemen—learnt to read at a ragged school; that my mother was murdered in the streets, on the doorstep of a public-house, by my drunken father, who has since been transported; that his mother was in the union; and that I have known the hunger of a starving wolf, the thirst of a dying dog, rags, filth, wretchedness; and lived for months after months on the charity of a poor apple-woman. If this were known, would Lady Roseville invite me, with her superb Augusta, to Roseville Castle? Would Lady Loftly hold me up as a model to her daughters? What chance should I have of marrying into a class that has all my sympathies, and for which alone I am fitted? No, Miss Evermore; I wish you and all the worthy people who once befriended me, well—very well; pray tell them so; but, if they wish me well still, they will not arouse suspicion by any inquiries, or undo the work I have so laboured at, by intruding on me."

"They will not intrude on you, Miss Fitz-Darrell," I said, "nor will I; and I sincerely hope you may never have cause to regret the warm, kind hearts your ingratitude has chilled. Where is your brother?"

"He is at school."

"Is he well?"

"I believe so; but I seldom see him. He is a sturdy, chubby, rosy boy, but not, in my opinion, a very gentlemanly boy. He is deficient in—"

"I hope," said I, "not, like you, in a heart. What shall I say to Lady Glenlonely, whose companion I am, and who, struck with your elegance of manner and appearance, and interested by the evidence of talent and industry your numerous prizes evince, had deputed me to ask you to accompany Miss Clara Brereton, the orphan daughter of her old friend, Lady Brereton, who is to spend a week in Carlton-terrace with us?"

"I should have liked it much," said Miss Fitz-Darrell, "but for your recognition of me, and the presence of one who knows all it is torture to me to recall. I know how kind and unworldly you are, Hope!" she added, rising and kissing me—"will you promise me never to give any one the least idea of my early history? If you will, I shall gladly accept Lady Glenlonely's invitation, for I wish to know as many people of quality as possible." Of course," said Hope, "I promised not to betray the worldly, heartless, ambitious, but unfortunate girl; and she spent a week with us, but I saw little of her, as I live very retired, according to the agreement Mr. Goodman and Apple Blossom made with Lady Ada. I go to no parties or public places, and Miss Clara Brereton and Miss Agnes Fitz-Darrell went everywhere. Indeed, Miss Fitz-Darrell made herself so charming to my lady that she is to be invited again, and when she leaves school, my lady has promised to present her at court."

"It's as good as a play," said Bob Blossom, "that's what it is; Ness Darrell at court!"

"And in few plays," said Larky Grigg, "is there so crafty, ambitious, and ungrateful a wench as that 'ere Ness. Her pride 'll have a fall some day, I'm sure."

"I am afraid she will try to marry some one she cannot love, in order to have a fine home and a certain rank," said Hope. "Poor girl! if she does she will be very miserable. But I think she will make what the world calls a good match, for she is very much admired by gentlemen. At the distribution of prizes a very handsome, fashionable young man, a Captain Greville, who sat by Lady Glenlonely, was much struck with her, so much so that he got introduced to her ladyship, and asked leave to call, and did call many times."

"Very handsome, was he?" said Larky Grigg, trembling and turning pale; "and did he speak to you, Hope?"

"Oh, he was very kind to me," said Hope, simply. "He gave me up his place, and when overcome by the heat, I nearly fainted, he led me into the garden, and never left me till I was well again. Oh, he was so very kind!"

"And then he called in Carlton-terrace?" asked Larky, with flashing eyes.

"Oh, yes, several times; but I never saw him, for I never see young gentlemen visitors; that, you know, Larky, was agreed between Mr. Goodman, my mother, and the ladies, when I went to live as companion there. But Lady Glenlonely told me he was kind enough to ask after me every time. He went to several parties, and plays, and balls with my lady and Miss Brereton and Miss Fitz-Darrell, and my lady told me that one evening that he got a box at the Opera for the ladies, he asked her whether her golden-haired Hope would not like to hear Mario. He was quite surprised when he heard I never went anywhere."

"Have thee never seen him but once, Hope?" asked Larky Grigg, very pale, but his eyes flashing, and his lips white.

"Never to speak to, Larky Grigg. But I've often seen him at church; he has a sitting exactly opposite our pew, and when we drive out he often passes the carriage on horseback. Lady Glenlonely thinks he is looking after Miss Fitz-Darrell."

"And I think he's looking after you, Hope; nay, I'm certain of it, for what other face or form could seem fair compared to yours! And you thought him handsome?"

"Not half so handsome as you, dear Larky," said Hope, who was not the least of a coquette, and had spoken quite innocently and inadvertently, never dreaming of the passionate jealousy her words were awakening.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

For honest men are the gentlemen of nature.

BULWER LYTTON.

"But he's a gentleman," said Larky, in a tone of bitterness and despair, that made Hope turn pale. "I dare say he's of a noble family, and has a large fortune, and has had a grand, first-rate education at college, as young nobles has. And what must a poor working man seem compared to the likes of him?"

"In my eyes, Larky, he seems not to be compared to you; and as to birth, I heard Lady Glenlonely say she couldn't make out what family of Grevilles he belonged to; that none of the noble Grevilles owned him; that he was not in the Guards or the Rifles, or any other 'crack regiment,' as those are called where the officers are all gay men of family and fortune; that he's in the Company's service, and on furlough, or leave, for his health; that he lives as if he had plenty of money, but no one knows where he gets it, or who his father is, and that it is whispered that he is fond of play. However, he got an introduction to Lady Glenlonely, and often comes there, as she thinks, to hear of Nessy alias Miss Fitz-Darrell."

"And as I believe, to try to see you, Hopy; but if thee doesn't care to see him, and would rather see thy own poor Larky Grigg, I'll try not to hate him."

By this time the little party had left the table, and the young couples had passed off into the distant corners of the room. Hope sat by Larky's side, smiling, and reassuring him; and Merry was working up Tom Trudge into a fever of jealousy by pretending to admire X of the L division. Bob was making garden nets out of fine wire; and Apple Blossom was nursing her last baby.

All at once Bob asked—

"How's Truelove, Hopy? Does the old lady pet her as much as ever; and how do she get on with Sultana?"

"Truelove is as great a pet as ever," said Hope; "and my lady is as fond of him as of Sultana, and they're both as fat and as happy as possible. Sultana was jealous at first, and bit Truelove's ear, and Truelove returned the compliment by a scratch on Sultana's black snub nose; but now they have agreed to differ, and they lead a happy life."

"A cat and dog life, I suppose, though!" laughed the now happy Larky.

"Ah! Larky," said Hope, "my lord, seeing them lying so quietly together on the rug, close together for the sake of warmth, said to my lady, 'I've heard the lives of quarrelsome couples called cat and dog lives, yet look there!'"

"Ah!" said my lady, "but tie them together, and then see how they'd agree."

"So my lord laughed, and said my lady had the best of it."

"And how's Miss Ellen St. Ange, bless her heart, and the bookish old lady, as wor a little wrong here?" said Bob, grinning, and touching his forehead.

"Have she writ any more books, lass?"

"Oh yes, she's always writing," said Hope; "and she says that if ever the laws about women are altered to their advantage, it will be all owing to her."

"And, on the whole, lass, are you happy with them foin folk?"

"Yes; they're very kind to me, but my lady is in great trouble often, and so is Lady Ada, or, I should say, Lady Arncliffe, and Miss St. Ange, too, for war is raging in India, and it is said my lady's only son, Captain Pemberton that was, but Lord Eaglescliffe that is, has been taken prisoner or killed, or something very dreadful, it is not known exactly what; but, though this has made them very anxious, they won't give him up as lost till they hear it officially, as they have been deceived before."

"I warrant it makes the old countess very fitty, don't it, lass? I hope she don't went her temper on thee."

"Sometimes she is a little cross," said Hope; "but, as I know why, and pity her more than I can tell, I put up with it, and, as I learnt at the ragged school, that a civil answer turns away wrath, I always answer her kindly, and try to comfort her. No wonder she's unhappy, if she thinks she's lost her son. Why, I could gaze for hours on his picture (and so could poor Miss Ellen St. Ange). I've often seen her look at it through her tears."

"Sometimes my lady cannot bear me near her, because I'm so like some one she used to like, whom she sent away. Sometimes she loves me for that likeness which she sees or fancies, and makes me let my hair down on my shoulders, because she used to wear hers so. But, since the news came of her son's having been taken prisoner, she's been more capricious than ever, sometimes kissing me, and at others ordering me not to come near her. There's a little work-table in the recess of a window in my lady's dressing-room, and sometimes she likes to see me there, because, she says, it was there she used to sit, and sometimes it makes her almost wild, I look so like her in the twilight, and my profile, it seems, is so similar, or she fancies so, that she once screamed out as if she had seen a ghost. I fear she was unkind to this poor girl, who, from what I can hear, was a very distant cousin, or companion of my lady's, whom she sent away in disgrace, because her son was in love with her. It is said she is dead, and that my lady reproaches herself about it, as no one knows what became of her."

"Ah, well, Hopy," said Bob Blossom, "let that be a lesson to thee. If ever thee be thrown into the company of any young nobles, which it's against the agreement if thee is, don't thee forget thee's a poor gal and ain't loikely to get no good out of a nob, and may get a woundy lot o' harm, like that 'ere young 'oman as your old lady turned out in disgrace on 'count of casting a sheep's eye at her son, or he at her, it comes to the same thing. Don't never let no gentleman, young or old, come a-nigh thee, lass. He can't come for no good."

"Not for any good to himself, as he shall find, if he tries it on," said Larky, very white, and his teeth firmly set, but relaxing into a smile when Hope, first raising her finger, and shaking her pretty golden locks, and then holding out her hand with a smile of love and confidence, said, with the tone and manner of early days—

"Whatever have you got into your head, Larky? Can you mistrust your own little Hope?"

Then, as Larky clasped that hand in both his own, and raised it to his lips, she said—

"Larky, I am in sober earnest grieved to see you growing so suspicious—so jealous—so unkind. Now listen, Larky. I have nothing to conceal from you, my more than brother; I never had, I never will have; and I promise you that if ever any man, gentle or simple, says a word of love or anything approaching to it to me, I will tell you at once, if I am near at hand, and if not, I will write it to you. But in return for this, you must promise me to nip in the bud this poison-flower of luxuriant, rapid, and deadly growth, which will choke up all the blossoms of peace and happiness. 'Larky, good lad,' as I used to call thee—and would call you still, for you are a good lad—there is no man so wretched as a jealous man. To be jealous without cause is not rational, and a woman who gives cause is not worth one throb of an honest man's heart. Is she, mother?—is she, father?"

"No, that she ain't," said Bob, "and yet a sight of 'em takes a deloight in driving a poor, tender-hearted chap a'maist mad with jealousy. Why, Apple Blossom there wor a little that way inclined, and Merry's turning the same way, as you can see in Tom's looks."

The Matron.

NO. XXXIV.

My readers may remember that I observed in the last chapter that nothing was gained by a wife's employing herself in other people's houses if she left her husband uncomfortable at home. Still it is desirable that the wife should earn money, if she can do so without neglecting her house; and one means to this end is early to train up her children to be useful at home.

In the early numbers of "The Matron" I dwelt a good deal on the management of children, treating the subject from their infancy till the commencement of their education. The remarks I am now about to make apply rather to children from ten to fourteen. Children at this period may be made very useful indeed. I know very well that when one points out this to mothers, one gets for a reply, "I should have much more trouble in making that awkward child do this or that than in doing it myself."

I do not doubt the truth of this assertion; nevertheless, it is a mother's duty to teach her children to be useful, and in the performance of this duty she will soon find both advantage and satisfaction; but if you wish your children to second your efforts, encourage them rather than drive them.

The girls may be taught to dust the room, to lay the cloth for breakfast and dinner, to help make the beds, to prepare the tea, and wash up the tea-things; but do not confuse them in these duties by hurrying them or being harsh to them. You should bear in mind that what practise has made easy to you, is new, and consequently difficult, to them. Let them do one thing at once, and when they quite understand it, teach them some other household work, making instruction in the new art a reward for their zeal and patience in acquiring the former one.

By degrees you may make your daughters expert in cleaning the house, cooking, and washing, and in the last-mentioned occupation the help of even a young girl of thirteen may be very useful to you, and assist you to get through your wash, and remove all unpleasant indications of it before your husband returns. I have already spoken of the importance of expedition with the wash, and the co-operation in this difficult work of one, however young, who has your interests at heart, is not to be despised.

Boys may easily be taught to clean knives, shoes, and boots—not only their own shoes and boots, but their sisters', who in return should keep their brothers' stockings mended, and see that their handkerchiefs are hemmed, all their things marked, and that their shirts never want a button. It would be well if parents taught both boys and girls to aim at doing everything they undertake in the best possible manner. Let the boys have due credit for the brightness of the shoes they have blacked, and the knives they have cleaned. And here I am disposed to give them a few directions myself. I take it for granted that they have the necessary brushes for shoe cleaning. Let them never use the hard brush, with which the dirt should be removed, for brightening the shoes, and let the brush that applies the blacking be kept entirely to its own office, which is lightly to cover the shoe or boot with the blacking; then take the soft shining brush, and while the blacking is still wet, give the shoe or boot its brilliant polish.

As to knives and forks, never put them in hot water, for it injures them in two ways—by loosening the handles, and discolouring the steel. First of all, wipe both knives and forks with a damp cloth, and then with a dry one, after every meal. Knives and forks should never be put away dirty. For cleaning the steel blades, rub them on a smooth board, upon which some fine dry sand, or a little brickdust, has been sprinkled. Clean the forks thoroughly, not only on the outside, but also between the prongs; and do this by rubbing them on and against a thoroughly clean scrubbing-brush, on which sand or brickdust has been thrown. An ingenious, handy boy will contrive to make this scrubbing-brush a very efficient tool in cleaning forks, by nailing it (the back downwards) on to one end of the knifeboard. By making it firm and steady, it will acquire more power.

One great difficulty with children is to find them profitable employment in wet weather, after all the little household duties have been performed, and when, of course, there can be no amusement or work in the fields or the garden.

Plain needlework, it is true, can be carried on by the girls; but for a series of hours needlework is rather hard and tedious for children from ten to fourteen. Those children are well off who have been taught not only to sew but to knit. This art is simple, the movements of the fingers lively, and the rapid advancement of the work is encouraging. Even children of seven and eight may find great pleasure in knitting garters for themselves and friends, and the elder ones should be shown how to make a pair of stockings. Knitted stockings last longer than woven ones; but the ample occupation, and increased dexterity, that knitting affords for little fingers, is quite sufficient to recommend it. Knitting has also been thought advisable for boys, in order that they may have some employment for leisure hours, when out-of-door amusements are impracticable; and I see no objection to boys' knitting, provided they do not object to it themselves. If they express a dislike to what certainly is more particularly girls' work, I should not insist on it.

Some boys are so handy, that they can make all sorts of useful things out of wood, merely with the assistance of a pocket-knife. This is particularly the case in Switzerland, where mere boys' work, in pretty ingenious articles, furnishes objects of a national trade.

Wooden pegs, little boxes, cotton winders, &c., might easily be made by English boys, if parents were really in earnest in showing them, or having them taught these little arts; and, for a change of occupation, or, rather, of amusement, why should not boys be taught netting? Netting is not woman's work, if applied to fishing-net or garden-net.

I recollect an old minister of my acquaintance who attached such importance to keeping his sons well employed, both morning and evening, that during the latter period, while one member of the family read aloud, he kept his sons (who were lads in their teens) to making nets, similar to those made by fishermen. This old minister was a very learned, good man, and he has left a very high reputation behind him.

I shall draw this chapter to a close by observing that, in my opinion, it is almost as much a parent's duty to give his children occupation, as to give them food and clothing.

JENNY'S CRADLE.

Ay, here is your cradle! Why surely, my Jenny,
Such slender dimensions go somewhat to show
You were an exceedingly small pic-a-ninny
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

Your baby-days flowed in a much-troubled channel;
I see you as then in your impotent strife—
A tight little bundle of wailing and flannel,
Perplexed with that newly-found fardel called life.

To hint at an infantine frailty's a scandal;
All by-gones are by-gones—and somebody knows
It was bliss such a baby to dance and to dandle,
Your cheeks were so velvet—so rosy your toes.

Ay, here is your cradle! and Hope, a bright spirit,
With Love now is watching beside it, I know;
They guard o'er the nest you yourself did inherit
Some nineteen or twenty short summers ago.

It is Hope gilds the future, Love welcomes it smiling;
Thus wags this old world, therefore stay not to ask,
"My future bids fair, is my future beguiling?"
If mask'd, still it pleases, then raise not its mask.

Is life a poor coil some would gladly be doffing?
He is riding post-haste who their wrongs will adjust;
For at most 'tis a footstep from cradle to coffin—
From a spoonful of pap to a mouthful of dust.

Then smile as your future is smiling, my Jenny!
I see you, except for that infantine woe,
Scarce changed since you were but a small pic-a-ninny:
Your cheek is still velvet—pray what is your toe?

Ay, here is your cradle! much, much to my liking,
Though nineteen or twenty long winters have sped;
But, hark! as I'm talking there's six o'clock striking,
It is time JENNY'S BABY should be in its bed!

MEDEAH, ALGIERS.

THE people of Medeah have regular features and good forms, many of the women being strikingly handsome, with brilliant black eyes, lustrous hair, and fine forms. The dresses of the women are frequently extremely rich. Women of all ranks in Algeria, when in the public streets, are covered with white calico or muslin from head to foot, and steal along like ghosts, and have thick white veils across their faces; but at home their costume is rich and bright-coloured. An amber-coloured silk handkerchief is tied round the head, and over it is a band of diamonds, with pendants, and large diamond earrings. One or two fresh flowers are stuck in one side of the face. Strings of pearls and of scented beads mixed with pearls, are round the neck, and also a long string of large scented beads. Over an embroidered muslin chemisette is a green satin jacket, embroidered with silver at the seams, and with silver buttons. A scarf of silk and gold is loosely wound round the waist, below which peeps out an inner dress of white muslin, embroidered with pink. Loose trowsers of blue and gold brocade reach to just below the knee, where they terminate with a band of gold round the leg. Gold bracelets and anklets complete the attire. Provincial costume is rather different from this. Over the silk handkerchief and under the chin is an embroidered gauze handkerchief with coloured border, and this hangs down over one shoulder. A white woollen scarf over the shoulders is fastened by a brooch on the right shoulder, whence the ends hang down in many folds. This is the costume of Medeah and the country about it. Instead of jewels in her hair, the fair provincial sometimes has a chain of orange-flowers strung on thread, a very popular ornament—chains of these, mixed with other flowers, being sold about the streets for a mere trifle. The boy has the usual Moorish dress, with the white bournouse thrown across one shoulder. It is curious to observe the various forms in which the love and taste for dress displays itself among the different nations and tribes of men. It generally forms no unerring index in reading the character of a people.

A GRAIN OF WHEAT FROM ANCIENT EGYPT.

THERE are few things more extraordinary in the economy of nature than the tenacious vitality of the vegetable creation. It retains its power of reproduction for centuries. To all appearance dead, it still lives. Sown in the earth it puts forth its suspended energy and springs up, "first the blade, then the ear, and after that the full corn in the ear."

Many instances of this description are on record, and many others are to be enumerated which have occurred in our own day. The following cases are established on testimony which is to all appearance above suspicion, and which are fully entitled to our consideration.

In 1834 there was discovered, at Mengis Saint Martin in France, a tomb of the Gallo-Roman period, that is, of the fifth or sixth century. Under the scull of the skeleton, which was much decayed, and in a cavity expressly made, some grains of corn-flower and sunflower were found, which, on being sown, rapidly germinated.

There existed at Peronne, before the first French Revolution, a Roman church known as St. Quintin's, which dated from the eighth or ninth century. It was destroyed in 1793. In 1805 the erection of some new building was commenced on the ruins. A trench was formed through the nave, the roof of which had fallen in. A few days after it was noticed that a number of different plants were beginning to spring up from the earth which had been cast aside in the operation. From their position, it was evident they must have been hidden under the eaves of the church; and the supposition was that the seeds had been carried thither by the birds which had there built their nests before the destruction of the building.

No one who takes into consideration these curious facts, can have any hesitation in admitting the possibility of the germination of a grain of wheat that has lain buried in an Egyptian tomb for three thousand years. Startling as this proposition appears, it may readily be admitted as a statement of fact. A short time since, an eminent agriculturist presented to the Imperial Society of Paris a sheaf, which he stated had been grown from a few grains of wheat found, with a mummy, in an Egyptian sarcophagus.

The sheaf became an object of much interest. It was regarded with attention by all who enjoyed the opportunity of seeing it. Its size and weight, colour and fulness were universally admired; but it occurred to some members of the society, that perhaps, after all, it was not what it professed to be, that it never had been buried with a mummy, and had never, in fact, been near Nile water in its whole existence. Two gentlemen, well known for their acquaintance with agricultural topics, were appointed to examine the suspected wheat, and they both declared that it belonged to the northern region of Europe, and was of inferior quality. This assertion occasioned long and animated controversy. The sender of the wheat insisted on its legitimacy, while the examiners were equally positive as to its spurious origin. The dispute has not been settled yet; but it is possible to conceive the examiners mistaken; we may as readily and more courteously accuse them of error, than the agriculturist of fraud: besides, the wheat that was put into the sarcophagus may have been of foreign growth, who shall say? However this question may be finally settled, if it ever is settled—the extraordinary vitality of vegetation will still remain as an important fact in natural science.

EGYPTIAN WHEAT.

ADVERTISING FOR A WIFE.

THEOPHILUS WIGGINS was a bachelor, and had been so—from time immemorial, I was going to say, but I will modify it, and say—from the earliest recollection of the oldest inhabitant. He had seen all the daughters (I think I am safe in adding all the grand-daughters) of the mothers he had courted, get married and settled, yet he was a bachelor still; and, if he was to be believed, a bachelor in the very prime of life—say thirty, or thirty-five, or somewhere thereabouts. Theophilus Wiggins, Esquire, as he was proud to be addressed—but Top Wiggy, as he was generally spoken of—was no longer the man he had been, though much of the same appearance: an oculist, a dentist, a limb-maker, a perruquier, a perfumer, and a tailor, having each contributed to supply some deficiency of time, accident, or nature; in other words, our ancient friend had a false leg, false hips, false breast, false hair, false teeth, false complexion, and one false eye; and if he had not a false heart, it was not his fault, for he had been many times jilted by one who had.

As time wore on, and the task of the maker-up of Mr. Wiggins' person (his valet de chambre) increased to an onerous duty, Theophilus began seriously to entertain the notion of marriage; and he reasoned that if he were to marry at all, he might as well set about it in the hey-day of his youth—or rather his manhood—since he now acknowledged, at least to himself, that he had attained to years of discretion.

Being rich, he did not care particularly about marrying for money; and being handsome (in his own estimation), he did not care particularly about marrying for beauty, you would say—but stop! the analogy is not complete; for, though Mr. Wiggins had money enough for two, he was by no means satisfied that he had beauty enough for two; and therefore the future Mrs. Wiggins must be handsome, though poor; refined, too, the future Mrs. Wiggins must be; and, to compare with her husband, youthful; and with youth, beauty, and refinement, Theophilus fancied he could get along as well married as single, if not better.

But how was he to obtain such a wife? He cast about him with an inquiring mind, but found none who exactly came up to his standard; nor could he remember any, now single; though he had a good memory, which ran far back into antiquity.

"I have it!" he exclaimed, one morning, while his valet was putting him together for the day. "I have it!" and he rubbed his hands with glee.

"Have what, sir?—the gout?" asked his maker-up.

"Gout! No, fool!" cried Theophilus, indignantly. "No man has the gout at my time of life."

"More generally a coffin," muttered the other, sotto voce.

"No, Stulus—I have an idea—a capital idea!" pursued Theophilus Wiggins, Esquire, rather as a soliloquy than as addressing his man.

"Hold on to it!" muttered the other; "for if it's original it must be a curiosity."

"Eh? did you speak?" asked Wiggins, semi-mysteriously.

"I was only remarking that your hips don't set quite as well as formerly; I think you must have fallen away a little."

"Good gracious, what an idea!" exclaimed the other, in amazement; "as if a man could fall away at seven-and-twenty, unless he had some horrid fever. Ridiculous, upon my word! I say, Stulus, let me stand as I am."

"On one leg, sir?"

"Fool! quit your impertinence, or I'll discharge you."

"Then how would you get taken apart and put together, sir?—for there's a good deal of nice machinery about you, Mr. Wiggins."

"When I say let me stand," said Theophilus, sternly, "I mean let me sit—let me be—leave me as I am—quit—go away! And now, if you comprehend anything, stupid, sit down by that table, and write as I shall dictate."

"All ready, sir!" said the valet as he disposed himself according to orders.

Mr. Wiggins—or rather, perhaps, I should say Mr. Half-Wiggins, since he was only half put together—leaned his bald head back in the chair, looked solemnly forth from his one eye, placed his remaining nether limb on another chair, and puffed out his toothless mouth, as if for a regular blow before the grand strike.

"Ahem!" he began, gathering himself for a mighty effort.

"Shall I write that, sir?" queried Stulus.

"No, you dunce! but write what I say now;"

and Theophilus Wiggins proceeded to dictate—with interjectional remarks—all of which the writer put down as he went along. When he had finished the article, it read as follows, the asides being given in brackets:—

"WANTED!—A WIFE!—[Well, that's true, I do.]—A gentleman in the prime of life—[Hardly the prime yet—but no matter—don't like to be thought too juvenile]—of ample means, agreeable disposition, handsome person—[That's so—Spots, the artist, said I would do for an Apollo]—and possessing a fond and loving heart—[Nothing like a little touch of soft sawder with the female kind—it always tells]—is desirous of making the acquaintance of a lady with a view to matrimony. She also must be young—[Italise also and young—I think that a good idea]—She also must be young, handsome, refined, and—[a—a—let me see! what is that word that's kind of loving, and yet isn't loving? Oh! ah! I have it—amiable]—and amiable, wealth not being especially essential, as he has a sufficiency—he mainly requiring that she should possess all the other requisites for rendering home happy. [I think that pretty good. Oh! you may add]—N.B. The writer of this is seriously in earnest, and all letters shall be held as strictly confidential. Address, T. W., Post-office, stating full particulars, and where an interview may be had."

"Done, Stulus?"

"All down, sir."

"Give it me!"

As Stulus handed his master the paper, Mr. Wiggins adjusted his glass to his single eye, glanced over it, and exclaimed:

"Why, you stupid mule, you've written down everything I said."

"Please, sir, that's what you told me to do," returned the mischievous valet, demurely.

"Blockhead! wheel the table up here! give me the pen!" and Theophilus, in high dudgeon, proceeded to erase all superfluous matter, and punctuate the article correctly. He then ordered Stulus to make a clean copy.

Being perfectly satisfied with the revised copy, Mr. Wiggins, as soon as he was all fairly put together, and his toilet completed, despatched Stulus with the advertisement to the most popular daily journal. On the following day it appeared, and on the next Stulus brought the astonished advertiser something less than half a bushel of letters, all from females purporting to be exactly such as he required.

"Good gracious! what a tremendous lot to pick from!" exclaimed the highly flattered Theophilus Wiggins. "They must know who it is that wants a wife—don't you think so, Stulus?"

Stulus didn't think so, because he had charity enough to suppose that among so large a number there might be some who were not natural fools, but he took care not to say what he thought to his master.

Of course, in so large a list, there were a good many whose bad chirography, bad syntax, and worse orthography, could not but give offence to one so fastidious as Theophilus Wiggins, Esq.; and these were at once consigned to the flames—not of his heart, but of the fire. Another lot, for various other reasons—prominent among which was the desire of the writers to know his exact age, and how much he was really worth—were indignantly destroyed by the blooming bachelor, as being too mercenary and too much wanting in true affection. Still another lot, in which his respondents appeared to be more in fun than earnest, met with the same fate.

At last, after a long, careful, and critical examination, Theophilus found his large list reduced to three—there being only three that he fancied would do at all. Yet so far from being chagrined at this, he almost regretted the fact of their being more than one—simply because, after all, he could marry only one, and consequently two poor creatures would be left to bewail their sad fates, and perhaps die of broken hearts. However, his grief did not keep him from making an extra toilet; and having adjusted his wig, eye, teeth, breast, hip, cork-leg, and brass-mounted military coat, he proudly sallied forth, with the words of the Roman conqueror ringing through his mind—"Veni, vidi, vici."

The first place at which he called was rather a genteel-looking house in a back street; and having delicately sounded the brass knocker, Mr. Wiggins waited with a palpitating heart the answer to his summons. The door was opened by a slipshod, half-grown girl, who rather sharply asked the now timid wife-seeker what he wanted.

"A—ah—I—I called to—ahem!—"

"Well, you can do that anywhere," was the impertinent reply.

Theophilus looked confused, but put on dignity, and said, more positively—

"Is Miss Laura Matilda Hawthorne within?"

Miss Laura Matilda Hawthorne was within; and an affected voice bade Sarah Ann Jones usher the gentleman into the drawing-room—which drawing-room proved to be a small parlour, about eight feet by ten, with a sofa occupying one side; upon which, in a studied attitude, half-reclined a very sentimental-looking school-girl, with her ringlets floating negligently around her romantic features, and one of the latest novels on Insipidity in her hand.

"Pray be seated, Sir Knight!" she said to the astonished Mr. Wiggins. "I suppose you are the dear Thomas William whom I have so often seen in my dreams, and who is destined by the irrevocable laws of fate to unite his happy lot with mine, that we may go hand in hand together down through the flowery vales of life. You got my epistle, of course? Ma is away; and I am one so far above the vulgar sneers and prejudices of the world, as not to flinch at an elopement—because, of all things on this fair earth, I think an elopement the most sweet and romantic. I should like you better if you were darker, or paler, with long flowing locks, and collar à la Byron. But you will do, dear Thomas William. You have genius! you love novels! you write poetry! I see it all in your sparkling eyes!"

Theophilus winced a little at the compliment to his sparkling eyes, because he knew the brightest one was glass; and he mildly suggested that he had not the gift of genius—at least he did not think he had; and that he did not like novels, and had never written poetry; moreover, that his name was not Thomas William, but Theophilus Wiggins; and that he had never in his life had the remotest idea of an elopement!

"Ah! good heavens! what do I hear!" cried the now indignant Laura Matilda Hawthorne, springing from her divan, as she was wont to call her sofa. "I see! I have been deceived—basely deceived; my young heart is broken by a base-born churl! You are not my dear destined Thomas William, then, but plain Theophilus Wiggins—the most unromantic name in the world! You have not genius, either, you say; you do not like novels; you are not a poet in disguise; you would not elope; you have not sentiment enough even to throw yourself at my feet! I should not be surprised if you even wore a wig! Begone, sir! begone, base miscreant! Laura Matilda will reserve herself for a congenial companion! Sarah Ann Jones, show this man the door!"

"I can find it myself," suggested Mr. Wiggins, hastily putting on his hat.

And he did. And when he breathed freer in the open air, he thought the last remark of Laura Matilda Hawthorne the most sensible he had heard.

Theophilus Wiggins, Esq., now gathered up his dignity, and philosophised on the fact that his list was now reduced to two.

"Well," mused he, "faint heart never won fair lady." It is better as it is, for now there will be but one heart to break instead of two."

And so, nothing daunted, he set off, in a business-like manner, for the next.

His second direction led him to a lodging-house, and up four pair of stairs; and on gently tapping at the door, it was opened by a rather good-looking lady, in theatrical attire, with a sceptre in her hand, and a pasteboard crown upon her head.

"Is Miss Sophronia Celestia Watkins within?" softly inquired Theophilus, hat in hand.

At once the stage-mad lady seized the half-terrified Theophilus, and, dragging him into the room, volens volens, threw him from her. Then, striking a queenly attitude, with her back against the door, she exclaimed—

"It may be so; but yet my inward soul Persuades me it is otherwise. Howe'er it be, I cannot but be sad; so heavy sad, As—though, in thinking, on no thought I think—Makes me with heavy nothing faint and shrink."

"Mad—a—Madam," stammered Mr. Wiggins, "I—I—fear there is some mistake here."

The tragic lady drew herself up with queenly haughtiness, and still quoting Shakespeare, thus replied—

"'Tis nothing less; conceit is still derived From some forefather grief; mine is not so; For nothing hath begot my something grief; Or something hath the nothing that I grieve: 'Tis in reversion that I do possess; But what it is, that is not yet known: what I cannot name; 'tis nameless woe, I wot."

"Good gracious, madam!" now exclaimed the confounded Theophilus, "are you mad?"

"Mad!" she cried; "who says I'm mad? Where lives the low-born hind that dares to so impeach the heaven-sent gift of reason, as to call me mad? Ha! behold! he's there;" and she made a grand flourish with her sceptre, to the utter discomfiture of our ancient friend. "Behold the wretch! I wonder the very earth does not open and swallow him! Had I a dagger," gliding up to the amazed and now wholly terrified Theophilus, "I'd plunge it to his heart!"

Small Change.

"Don't!" said Mr. Wiggins, holding up his hands in horror; "don't!"

"But as I haven't," went on the queenly Sophronia Celestia Watkins, "I'll—I'll pull his hair!"

And suiting the action to the word, Sophronia Celestia buried her hands in Mr. Wiggins's wig, tore it from his head, and thus disclosed to her astonished eyes a bald and shining apex, which looked for all the world like an inverted wash-bowl.

"Heavens! what do I behold?" shrieked the amazed Sophronia Celestia.

This was too much for Theophilus; he had had enough; he wanted to hear no more; but rudely jerking his wig from Miss Sophronia, he grasped it tightly in one hand, his hat in the other, made a lunge for the door, and went plunging down stairs, three at a leap, as if he thought all bedlam let loose behind him.

On turning the nearest corner, Theophilus stopped, drew a long breath, adjusted his wig and hat, looked timidly around him, and then shook himself together, to be certain he was all there.

The third and last address took him to a large, fine, splendid-looking mansion, where Mr. Wiggins compared numbers anxiously, to be sure there was no mistake, and then rang the bell. On inquiring for Miss Cordelia Walters, the servant ushered him into a magnificent drawing-room, where he encountered, not the young lady herself, but the young lady's mother. This was more like doing business in the truly fashionable style, and Theophilus Wiggins, Esq., felt at home. After the usual preliminaries, the grand point was reached, and he was assured by Mrs. Walters that she had herself written the note, and not Cordelia.

"She is a dear, sweet girl," said the mother, "and I would like to see her married well, to a gentleman of means, which I believe your advertisement states you to be."

"I have means, madam, and can give you any reference you desire. How old is your daughter?"

"She is quite young, Mr. Wiggins—not over twenty."

Theophilus Wiggins' heart rose.

"Good looking, I suppose?" he interrogatively pursued.

"She has been accounted a beauty, sir."

Theophilus Wiggins' heart took a tremendous leap.

"Amiable and affectionate, I presume?"

"Of a very even and quiet disposition," said the lady.

"Could I be permitted to see her?" inquired Mr. Wiggins.

Mrs. Walters did not think it at all necessary. Mr. Wiggins wanted a wife, and she, Mrs. Walters, would like to see her daughter settled in life; she trusted he was all he purported to be, and Miss Cordelia was all she recommended her; and so, as both parties were evidently suited, she thought calling in the girl entirely superfluous. To this Mr. Wiggins demurred, inadvertently saying something about "a pig in a poke," and quietly suggesting the fact that he could not very well marry without first seeing her.

"If you insist upon it," said the lady, rising, and ringing the bell, "I will have her called."

And she was called; and at the first glance of her young and pretty face, Mr. Wiggins was in raptures. His fond heart took another leap to his very throat, and beat at fever heat; but half-a-dozen words from the fair Cordelia let it down far below zero, for those half-a-dozen words acquainted him with the startling fact that she was a natural born idiot!

Mr. Wiggins suddenly remembered another pressing engagement, and at once took his leave, and himself homeward.

"Stolus," he said, when he had planted himself in an easy chair, in his bachelor apartment, "are there any more letters?"

"Another half bushel, sir!"

"Burn them, Stolus!" said Mr. Wiggins, solemnly, straightening up his neck and collar with dignity: "burn them, sir! put them all in the fire, sir! and if any more come, Stolus, serve them all in the same manner, sir! I have changed my mind. On further consideration, I think I'll not get married at all."

And Theophilus Wiggins, Esq., didn't. He lived and died an old bachelor, leaving the bulk of his property to a favourite nephew, on condition that he should never make a confounded fool of himself by—"advertising for a wife."

WIND-MILLS are machines which are only kept going by being perpetually puffed; wherein, Jones suggests, they bear a pointed resemblance to some authors. With this difference, however, the reader will perceive, that while the latter raise the wind by increasing their sale, the former diminish their sail as the wind increases.

MARRIAGE, says an enthusiastic votary of Hymen, is a state of which it is unnecessary to describe the happiness, for two reasons:—first, because it would be superfluous to those who are in the enjoyment of its blessings; and, secondly, because it would be impossible to those who are not.

LOUIS XIII., coming from the Council with Richelieu, whose opinions had just overruled those of the King, the latter stood aside to let the monarch pass. "Are you not the master here?" said the King, pushing him angrily. "Go before me."—"I can only do so," replied the adroit courtier, taking a torch from one of the pages, "by assuming the duties of the humblest of your servants."

DELIBERATE with caution, but act with decision; and yield with graciousness, or oppose with firmness. The gentleman is known at once by his walk, the lady by her carriage.

"You can do anything, if you have patience," said an old uncle, who had made a fortune, to his nephew, who had nearly spent one. "Water may be carried in a sieve, if you only wait." "How long?" asked the petulant spendthrift, who was impatient for the old man's obituary. "Till it freezes!" was the cold reply.

EAGLE THE FIRST.

By Alfred Tennyson.

He clasps the crag with crooked hands,
Close to the sun, in lonely lands,
Ringed with the azure world he stands.
The wrinkled sea beneath him crawls,
He watches from his mountain walls,
And like a thunder-bolt he falls.

EAGLE YE SECOND.

By G. Whittier.

With hooked claws he clasps ye fence,
Close by ye hen-roost; gazing thence
He spies a mice, what's got no sense.
Ye mice beneath can't well see him;
He watcheth from his lofty limb,
Then jumpeth down and grabbeth him.

P.S.—The difference, though only faint,
'Tis that and this I now will paint:
His eagle's wild, my eagle ain't.

POLITENESS.—The man who is truly honest cannot fail to be truly polite.

DURING a recent slander case there was a large number of ladies present, who caused a gentle murmuring all the while. The usher called out repeatedly, "Silence!" when the judge mildly said:—"Mr. Usher, don't you know better than to call silence when ladies are in court!"

FRANCIS, Duke of Luxembourg, was a celebrated French general, and much deformed. His uniform success, when contending with William III. of England, rendered him an object of jealousy to that prince, who once, in the bitterness of his heart, called him "humpback."—"What does he know of my back?" said the Marshal. "He never saw it."

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

In order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I, New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

R. SMITH.—We own we can give you no precedent in history for such festivities as have recently taken place at Cherbourg, witnessed as they have been by a British sovereign. In former times the destruction, not the aggrandisement of the French navy was the subject of rejoicing in this country. With mere royal visits to our lively neighbours, the present reign has familiarised us, but the invitation which our Queen accepted many years ago, to visit that "Pater Familias," Louis Philippe, in a homely domestic manner, at the Château d'Eu, was of a widely different nature to the recent invitation from Napoleon III. Then, the inauguration of the "Palais d'Industrie" in 1855, was a subject of universal congratulation, and that her gracious Majesty of England should honour it with her presence was in harmony with the encouragement bestowed by her upon all the peaceful triumphs of art. If we go back to 1527, we find in the grand display "the Field of the Cloth of Gold," a mixture of rivalry and friendship, war and peace, that have some few features of resemblance to the recent demonstrations at Cherbourg. At least, the British sovereign was the guest, and the monarch of France the host. Some months before this meeting, a defiance had been sent by the two kings to each other's court, and through all the chief cities of Europe, importing that Henry and Francis, with fourteen aids, would be ready in the plains of Picardy to answer all comers that were gentlemen, at tilt and tourney. Accordingly, the monarchs, now all gorgeously apparelled, entered the lists on horseback. Francis, surrounded with Henry's guards, and Henry with those of Francis. They were then the most comely personages of their age. The ladies were the judges in the feats of chivalry, and they put an end to the encounter when they thought proper. Whether from the French king's contriving that Henry's vanity should be gratified by success in these warlike pastimes, or because "bluff King Hall" was really expert, certain it is that he greatly distinguished himself at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. He ran a tilt against Monsieur Grandeval, whom he disabled at the second encounter, and though he could not throw Monsieur de Montmorency from his saddle, he fought so successfully at falcion with a French nobleman, that the latter presented him with his courser in token of submission. We trust that our Queen's visit to Cherbourg may be productive of a more lasting friendship between the great allies than the meeting at the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

A MAN LIVING IN RETIREMENT.—You ask us if we consider any good has been done by parliament during the last session. How the laws recently passed will work, time only can decide; but important measures have been introduced and carried. The crown has been invested with the full sovereignty of our extensive Indian empire; the vexed question of admitting the Jews into parliament has been decided, and the children of Israel may now be our representatives, but they are not to interfere in our religious affairs; the purification of the Thames has been provided for; the demoralising deception—viz., the property qualification declaration of members has been abolished; and quarrels verging on hostilities with France, Naples, and America, have been amicably and honourably settled. Such have been the chief achievements of the senate during this last session; and we trust government will be as watchful over the interests of the nation during the recess as it has been whilst subjected to the vigilance of an independent parliament and a jealous opposition.

A YOUNG TRAVELLER.—You wish for some details respecting the Thames—a river that the inhabitants of London have recently regarded with terror rather than with pride. To begin at the beginning, we must inform you that the spring that has commonly been regarded as the head of the Thames, is about three miles south-west of Cirencester, near a bridge over the Thames and Severn Canal, called Thames-head Bridge; but that which the learned consider the true head of the Thames is about three or four miles south of Cheltenham. Both streams rise on the south-eastern slope of the Cotswold Hills. The greatest extent of the Thames, from east to west, is about one hundred and thirty-six miles. It waters fifteen counties. From the entire absence of coal, the Thames has few manufactures, except those of the metropolis; but it flows through some of the richest agricultural districts in the kingdom. The Thames has at ebb tide a depth of from twelve to thirteen feet water, nearly or quite up to London Bridge; and the rise of the tide is about seventeen, or, at the extreme springs, about twenty-two feet. Vessels of 800 tons get up to St. Katharine's Docks; those of 1,400 tons to Blackwall. The Thames at the Nore—where the mouth is fixed—is about six miles in breadth. The great importance of the Thames was recognised in very remote periods, and there are acts of parliament respecting it as far back as the reign of Henry II.

T. SMs.—We perceive that you confound the Old Bailey with Newgate. The Old Bailey forms part of the Sessions House, or, as it was formerly called, the Justice Hall. It is divided by a broad yard from the prison of Newgate. It has jurisdiction over offences committed in all places within ten miles of St. Paul's, an extent which includes portions of Surrey, Kent, and Essex, as well as Middlesex. Its sittings are held twelve times a year, or once a month; and as each session generally occupies a fortnight, and sometimes nearly three weeks, the space between each is exceedingly brief. The case of the naval commander whose crime has excited such a sensation in your district, will come before this court, for offences on the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, are tried at the Old Bailey.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—We advise you in your visits to the Crystal Palace, not to be entirely engrossed by the wonders of art; for there are natural curiosities in the botanical department of this vast establishment that deserve the most attentive inspection. We particularly direct your attention to the banana-tree—one of the greatest treasures of the vegetable kingdom within the tropics. Of the banana-tree the fruit is eaten both raw and cooked; the young shoots furnish vegetables, and the juice from the trunk makes a pleasant beverage. The leaves furnish a kind of hemp and flax; they are also used for thatching and basket-making. Among other plants that will excite your curiosity, we mention the ginger, the castor-oil, the coffee, and tea plant. At the strychnine plant—out of the nuts of which a deadly poison is extracted—you will gaze with an interest mingled with dread. The India-rubber tree—the sap of which furnishes articles so extensively used—will also attract your notice. This tree belongs to the fig tribe, all kinds of which bear a sap with more or less of the same properties. The giant palms of continental Asia, the tree-ferns of Australia, and the mammoth-trees of the New World deserve close inspection; but do not neglect beautiful plants or shrubs because they may be not so far-fetched as those just mentioned. The splendid collection of orange and pomegranate-trees is a principal feature among the beauties of the Crystal Palace. Some of these are four hundred years old; and a pathetic interest is attached to them—they once belonged to the Orleans family, and they decorated Louis Philippe's favourite château at Neuilly. After the accession of the present Emperor of the French, when the property of the royal family was sold by public auction, these matchless natural productions were purchased for the Crystal Palace by Sir Joseph Paxton.

MARTHA (Norwood).—We agree with you that gipsies and their tents add greatly to the picturesque effect of a landscape, but their predatory habits render them very dangerous neighbours. Whence gipsies originally came is a disputed question. The notion is generally received that they entered Europe from Egypt, and thence derived the name of gipsies. The French call gipsies "des Bohémiens," but this is merely on account of their having come into France from Bohemia. As many words in the language of gipsies are Hindustani, it is evident they have had some connection with India; and in a work entitled "Bombay Transactions," we find that gipsies are believed to have migrated from India at the time of the great Mohammedan invasion of Timor Beg, and to have belonged in their own country to one of the lowest castes. They were first heard of in Europe in the fourteenth century. They exist at this moment in great numbers in all the countries of Europe, in a large portion of Asia, and in parts of Africa; but they are not found in America. It is calculated that there are five millions of gipsies scattered over the three quarters of the globe. But in England they are not as numerous as is commonly thought; for the term gipsy is erroneously applied to a majority of wanderers, such as travelling tinkers and musicians, makers of wooden spoons, ladies, &c. Although gipsies pretend to astrology as fortune-tellers, and talk of telling "by the stars," not one in a thousand of the so-called gipsies knows one star from another. These people are with us a decaying race. The laws are become too stringent to allow of their living by stealing, as of old; and the vast forests and wild moors that used to be their dwelling-places are now private property, guarded with all the terrors of the law. With regard to their fortune-telling, the spread of knowledge among all classes has rendered their pretended art of little benefit to them. The gipsies have, nevertheless, an historical interest. Like the Jews, they have kept themselves separate from the nations among whom they have sojourned, and have preserved the distinctive features of their tribe through all changes of time and place.

ESTELLE.—The "Universal Christian Alliance," or, as it is called in France, "L'Alliance Chrétienne Universelle," originated with M. Martin Paschoud, a pastor of the reformed church. This society has its head-quarters at No. 206, Rue Rivoli, Paris. The object of the Alliance is the union of Christians of every creed in the practical duties of their religion.

LITTLE HIBERNIA.—To preserve Siberian crabs, rub the fruit, when ripe, with a dry flannel, taking care not to break the skin. Prick each with a needle all over to prevent its bursting. Boil a pound of sugar in a pint of water, then put in the fruit and boil it until the skin begins to crack slightly; then take out the crabs, and drain them separately on a dish; boil the syrup again, and if not strong enough add more sugar. When cold pour it over the fruit, put it into jars, tie it down tightly, and keep in a cool place. For Whipped Cream:—Take a pint of cream, the whites of two eggs, white sugar to taste, and a part of the juice of a lemon; then whip it with a bunch of fine rods; flavour with the rind of grated lemon or rosewater, and, as the foam rises, place it in jelly glasses, or the glass may be half filled with jelly, and the whipped cream poured over it.

HOUSEWIFE AND A HOUSEKEEPER.—"Black Currant Jam to keep for a length of time," may be made thus:—Take an equal weight of pounded lump sugar and picked fruit; strew the sugar over the fruit in the preserving pan, and pour a very little water into it; boil and skim. When it has boiled for a quarter of an hour, put a spoonful of the juice and fruit to cool upon a plate; if the juice runs off the jam must be boiled longer; if it jellies it is enough. Gooseberries may be treated in the same manner.

A POOR MAN.—A widow who takes to the property of her husband is liable for all the debts he may have contracted within the six years preceding his death, out of the effects to which she has administered, and she may be sued accordingly.

J. N. P.—You cannot legally add another Christian name to that given you at your baptism; and there may be circumstances in which, the consequences of doing so may prove serious.

T. HAMBRIDGE.—Actions for libel must be brought in the superior courts, or at the assizes for the county.

A YOUNG PERFUMER.—The cellular fibrous tissue called sponge is the produce of almost imperceptible marine animals called polypi. They are found adhering to stones at the bottom of the sea. Those from the Mediterranean are the most esteemed. The best sponges are fair coloured, soft, light, and susceptible of strong compression without diminution of bulk. The cells and meshes should be small, compact, and free from gravelly matter.

R. O.—"R. O.'s" husband is constantly talking to her about domestic expenditure. She wishes us to tell her what should be included in domestic outlay. We consider domestic expenditure includes all the cost of providing and furnishing a house, and supporting those who live in it, and are actual members of the family.

ONE IN DISTRESS.—You only do us justice in feeling convinced we shall give you the best advice in our power, but you are certainly placed in a very puzzling situation. However, a very short time ought to solve the problem, for since the young man of whom you speak so highly, visits constantly at your house, he must have seen that you are painfully placed, and unless his love is merely that of a friend he will soon propose to better your condition by giving you a happy home as his wife. If he does not do this quickly, avoid his presence, lest you become a prey to an unhappy passion, and consequently incapable of accepting with a good conscience the proposal of a worthy suitor.

VINGT-DEUX ANS.—We feel it a duty to dissuade a man of your education from devoting his powers to the slight chance there is of obtaining success as an actor. In the theatrical profession the prizes are few, the blanks innumerable.

SEBASTOPOL, A. Z., A COUNTRY READER, KNICKERBOCKER, G. BROWN, A SON OF NEPTUNE, PEREZ, BACON, W. MONSON, A NORTH BRITON, EDITH, AND P. RAWLINGS.—These and several other correspondents, complain of want of whiskers, superfluous hairs, bad teeth, defective sight, corns, warts, &c. We must request them to consult our columns, as we have repeatedly given answers to similar questions. "Sebastopol" should apply to a skillful surgeon, as it is dangerous to tamper with so delicate an organ as the ear. "A Country Reader" may try the following paste for stopping decayed teeth:—Anhydrous phosphoric acid, 48 grains; pure caustic lime, 52 grains, both finely pulverised; mix rapidly in a mortar. As this powder soon becomes moist, it must be brought as quickly as possible into the cavity of the tooth, which has been cleaned and dried; the powder must be well pressed into the cavity, smoothed off, and moistened on its surface. It is white and durable, and soon becomes hard.

B. G. P.—Your inability to distinguish colours proceeds from a physical defect, called "colour blindness," for which, we fear, there is no remedy. You had better consult a skillful oculist.

DAME JOSVELL.—We give you an answer from the writings of the celebrated Dr. Mussey:—"Throughout the widespread kingdom of animal and vegetable nature, not a particle of alcohol, in any form or combination whatever, has been found as the effect of a single living process; but it arises out of the decay, the dissolution, and the wreck of organised matter."

ESTELLE.—You wish us to give you some curling fluid that will prevent your ringlets from drooping under the influence of moist weather. Your request shows that you are ignorant of the component parts of hair. Of these parts one is salt, and salt, in connection with animal matter, is easily affected by the atmosphere. We will comply with your request for a receipt to counteract premature gray hair and baldness. Brush your hair till the skin of the head becomes red, and then apply to the roots a lotion composed of the following ingredients, thoroughly mixed together: half a drachm of oil of nutmegs, half an ounce of tincture of cantharides, two ounces of eau-de-cologne, ten drops of oil of lavender. This lotion should be applied to the bald patch, or to the roots of the gray hair, with a tolerably soft nail-brush. The effect of this lotion is to invigorate the apparatus situated beneath the skin, and to enable it to take up colouring matter.

MISS GOLIGHTLY.—The reason why bats live on ruins and church towers is probably that men do not inhabit these places, and, therefore, that the bats are unmolested. A bat has wonderful tenacity of life, and judging from the following anecdote it can exist with very little fresh air. Some years ago the burial vault of the Chaplin family, at Blankney, in Lincolnshire, was opened, and it was ascertained that a large gray bat which had been found within the place on several occasions when the vault was opened, was still a living inhabitant of the said vault. It was calculated that the bat had lived in the tomb for thirty-three years.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

He dies and makes no sign. Oh God,
Forgive him.—SHAKESPEARE.

ALICE BOOTHROYD had now reached an age at which it became necessary to inform her of the arrangement entered into for her marriage with her cousin, Viscount Illston. The poor girl had long suspected the existence of some such compact; and, as her cold and selfish parents broke the intelligence, listened to their pompous description of the influence the united houses of Boothroyd and Carlington must command—the amount of wealth they would enjoy—with feelings similar to those with which the condemned criminal listens to the sentence which annihilates the future, and leaves existence a blank.

It was in vain that she turned her eyes, eloquent in their mute despair, upon the countenance of her mother. No glance of sympathy or affection responded to the appeal; and the heart of the victim sank within her. As for Sir Norman, his daughter knew by bitter experience how perfectly useless it was to expect any compunctious visitings of nature in that quarter. If he loved his child, it was simply because she was his. The fond parental love that watches over and sustains—the pure and generous feelings of a father—had no place within his heart. Pride and ambition supplied their place as the shrine of what he considered his dignity; the baronet had long since sacrificed everything like human affection; to offer up his child to it scarcely cost him a second effort.

"You see, Alice," he observed, as her ladyship concluded the details of the engagement, every word of which fell with painful distinctness upon the ear of the victim of parental ambition, "every care has been taken for your happiness."

His daughter unconsciously repeated the word.

"Your jointure will be worthy the fortune you bring, and in the settlements I have taken care the dignity of the family has not been forgotten. Your second son will assume the name and arms of Boothroyd."

Alice shuddered at the thoughts the words suggested.

"Your diamonds will be magnificent," continued her mother; "the countess, I know, upon your marriage, intends to present you with the greatest portion of hers; as for my own—"

"I detest diamonds!" interrupted her daughter, "they cannot bring happiness: why decorate the sepulchre whose contents are but ashes?"

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

"Sepulchre! and ashes!" repeated Sir Norman, with a look of astonishment, "what can the girl mean?"

Her ladyship replied only by a shrug, as if it was an enigma far beyond her experience or comprehension to solve.

"Father!" exclaimed Alice, throwing herself upon her knees and clasping his hand, very much to the annoyance of the baronet, who had an intense horror of anything like a "scene"—"must this thing be?—must the happiness of my life be sacrificed to a marriage in which my heart has no share? I can never love my cousin."

"It is not necessary that you should love him," observed her ladyship, perfectly unmoved by her appeal—"that is to say, love him with that silly, romantic passion which school-girls dream of: respect," she added, with a glance at her husband, "is a much more lasting tie."

"Certainly," said the baronet, flattered by an idea which coincided so perfectly with his own sentiments upon the subject.

"Father," continued the fair pleader, "you know not how much depends upon the decision of this moment: there is more than the happiness of a poor weak girl trembling in the balance!"

"Of course there is," replied Sir Norman; "the dignity of my family."

"The obedience of your child," replied Alice. "Urge not humanity beyond its strength. I have never yet willingly disobeyed your slightest wish, much less your commands: have some pity then upon my sufferings. I will never marry without your consent, that I am ready, quite ready to promise; force me not to wed against my own!"

"Lady Boothroyd!" exclaimed her husband, pale with passion, "what is the meaning of this extraordinary conduct? Is this the way in which you have educated my daughter? Are these the principles fitting the heiress of Meldown? I am shocked, greatly shocked. What! when I have arranged an unexceptionable match, liberal settlements, taken due care of the family dignity, even to the quartering of the Boothroyd arms on a shield of pretence; are all my endeavours to be met by a tirade, which, however well it might sound in a romance, is ridiculous in real life?"

"Perfectly ridiculous!" repeated his wife. Alice rose slowly from her knees, her heart crushed by the unnatural want of sympathy in her parents, but not subdued.

"Go, child, go to your room," said the baronet; "read your prayers, that portion of them which inculcates filial obedience, your mother will point it out to you; I have no time to attend to such things. The earl and his family dine with us to-morrow, on Thursday is the drawing-room, after which the engagement will be announced, and—"

"Broken!" added the fair girl, firmly. "I cannot, even at your command, consent to stain my lips by a false vow. How can I swear to love, honour, and obey the man you have selected as my husband, when I know him to be mean, ungenerous, selfish, and depraved?"

For several moments Sir Norman stood contemplating her, speechless with passion—and not with passion only, but uneasiness; for there was something in the tone in which the refusal was conveyed, as well as the manner of the speaker, which whispered to him it would be no easy task to bend her spirit.

"Lady Boothroyd," he muttered, at last, "this is really dreadful. Can you account for this unnatural obstinacy—this horrible ingratitude?"

"Only by supposing that some unworthy passion has destroyed her sense of duty," replied her mother. At this accusation the cheek of Alice became suddenly flushed, and then resumed its former paleness.

"You see," added the malignant woman, "she cannot deny the accusation."

At this apparent confirmation of his wife's fears the pompous possessor of Meldown Park could no longer restrain his wrath, but with angry vehemence declared that he would cast her off—leave her to beggary—her sole inheritance his malediction, if he encountered further opposition to his will.

"Who is the villain," he added, roughly grasping her slender arm, "who has robbed me of the obedience of my child? Let me hear his name that I may curse him."

"I know of none," faltered Alice, terrified by his violence. "Father, did I ever yet deceive you? You can trust my word, for you know it to be truth. Never yet have I listened to a declaration of love from any man."

"Or received a written one?" demanded her mother.

"Never."

Her ladyship heard the assertion with a cold, incredulous smile, not that she really disbelieved it, far from that, only she wished to impress her husband with the conviction that she did, in order to destroy, by means already concerted in her scheming brain, the last remaining link of confidence between the father and his daughter; for a while, however, it was unsuccessful. But his wife had not yet played her best card—the letter she had intercepted from William Thornton.

"Retire to your room," said Sir Norman, his doubts somewhat dissipated by her words. "I dare not trust myself to express all that I feel at your unnatural disobedience, your ungrateful requital of my affection."

At this accusation the eyes of the fair girl filled with tears; and, before quitting the library, she would have taken his hand, had he not sullenly withdrawn it.

"When you deserve it, Alice," he said; "when you deserve it."

"Norman," began his wife, as soon as they were alone, "the firmness of Alice alarms me. Tears, entreaties, and all that romantic kind of nonsense with which young ladies plead permission to disappoint the wishes of their parents, and follow their own, I was prepared to meet; but not this quiet obstinacy—this prating of duty and affection. She has no affection, I feel assured, for either of us."

"I am not so certain of that," replied the baronet, for his self-love was wounded by the supposition that he was an object of indifference to his own child; "and as for her dislike to the match, to do her justice, Illston has done nothing to reconcile her to it. He is, without exception, the most conceited puppy of my acquaintance."

Lady Boothroyd could scarcely restrain a smile at the recollection of the undisguised contempt with which her nephew had listened to the pompous harangues and dictatorial opinions of her husband.

"But not the less eligible match," she observed, aloud.

"Certainly not," said the baronet, emphatically, who saw in the projected marriage the gratification of that pride which had been the bane and ruling passion of his life. For since Providence had denied him the blessing of a son to transmit his name and fortune to posterity in a direct line, his dearest wish was that they should both merge in a family with whom he was so closely connected, and whose descent, to say the least of it, might rival with his own.

No thought of the brother whom his unnatural avarice had driven to a career of adventure in a foreign clime; no regret for the friendless orphan his unprincipled machinations had deprived, not only of the wealth, but of the name she was entitled to bear.

Had Lillian been a boy, there was a possibility, just a bare one, that his conduct might have been different.

"We must postpone the announcement," he said, "of the intended union between our families, till Alice is more reconciled to the match."

His wife reluctantly assented to, what she mentally considered, a great weakness on the part of her husband, but prudence counselled her to do so; for, like most conceited men, Sir Norman became immovably obstinate when directly opposed.

"As you think best," she replied; "though I doubt if Alice will profit by your indulgence."

"Badly trained!" muttered Sir Norman; "badly trained!" with which ungenerous observation the conference between the well-assorted pair terminated.

In the solitude of her own room, the heiress of Meldown had ample leisure to analyse her feelings, and question her own heart. The accusation that she had bestowed her love upon another alarmed her, for something whispered that it was not altogether unmerited. She no longer thought of William Thornton as a boy, the playfellow and companion of youthful years; a warmer sentiment had replaced the childish predilection, mingled with her dreams, and, if she did not absolutely love him, it was that passing circumstance had not yet given time for the bud of affection to expand into a perfect flower, but the germ of a true passion had long been planted.

"It is not love," she murmured; "I can never have been so weak, so lost to my sex's dignity, as to have bestowed my heart unwashed upon one who by this time has forgotten me. I have too much pride for that, and alarm myself unnecessarily—it is friendship, and not love I feel for him."

It is a dangerous sign for a young girl's tranquillity and peace of mind, when a doubt exists as to the exact nature of her feelings towards one of the opposite sex. The line between friendship and affection, although distinctly marked, is so fine that it becomes easily obliterated, and the heart believes in the existence of the fragile barrier long after the winged god's breath has effaced it.

It was not long before the truth became apparent; for to one of her clear yet simple understanding, there was no self-concealment, no tampering with conviction; and Alice at last came to the conclusion that she really loved.

This conviction caused her bitter tears; for she felt the humiliation which a proud and delicate spirit experiences at the thought of having bestowed the purest, choicest treasure of her heart upon one who had not solicited the gift. Had she known all that poor William had endured at her supposed rejection of him—could she have read the manly, eloquent letter her mother had intercepted and answered in her name, how quickly would self-reproach and regret have vanished, or been changed to smiles.

"He must never know my weakness," she thought; "the secret shall die with me. It is my duty to forget him, since he has forgotten me. A reproach!" she added, after a pause. "I am unjust—ungenerous! Why should I reproach him? In the world he has, doubtless, met with one more worthy of his choice—one whose parents appreciate his worth and character, who prefer the happiness of their child to the vain and empty gauds of rank and birth, which the world in its idolatry is content to worship. I trust it is so; no one will rejoice more fervently than I shall in his happiness, or breathe a warmer prayer for its continuance."

As these words—or rather murmurings, for they were scarcely uttered—escaped the lips of William Thornton's former playfellow and companion, her tears accompanied them; but the poor girl was insensible of their presence till one dropped upon her neck, when she started from her seat and began pacing the limits of her chamber.

"Folly, folly!" she exclaimed aloud. "This is no time for weak regrets, when I have need of all my strength to avert the persecution which menaces me. The commands of those who, next to Heaven, are most entitled to my obedience—dare I, ought I to resist them?" she added, after a pause. "Heaven direct me; I am but a child in mind as well as years; no one to advise—no one to guide and strengthen me."

The question, thus presented in a new aspect to her judgment, agitated her greatly; for, unlike her parents, Alice Boothroyd had a deep sense of religion and the bond of duty which unites the child with the authors of its being. To her pure mind it seemed almost like sacrilege to break it.

"I will appeal to my father," she continued; "he cannot be deaf to the voice of nature—the pleadings of his only child. He will listen to my prayer, break this cruel contract, and step between me and the sin of disobedience. In all else, I will submit to his decision; but the wife of Illston! any fate rather than that—even the grave were preferable."

The shudder which accompanied her last words proved how deeply the aversion had taken root, and how hopeless must be every attempt to eradicate it.

Fortunately, for a time at least, Alice Boothroyd was spared all further importunity upon the subject by the sudden illness of Sir Norman, who caught a fearful cold in returning from a state ball at Buckingham Palace. The night proved a wet one, and the baronet, in the confusion inseparable from such an occasion, could not find his carriage.

As the inflammation settled on his lungs, the medical men who were called in forbade their patient to speak. Alice attended day and night by his sick couch, anticipating, with a daughter's watchfulness and piety his every wish.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

A death-bed's the detector of the heart:
Here tired dissimulation drops the mask,
Through life's grimace that mistress of the scene,
Here real and apparent are the same.—YOUNG.

It soon became apparent to those around him that the days of Sir Norman Boothroyd were numbered—that the blow of the republican leveller, old Death, could neither be warded off by the baronet's shield of sixteen quarterings, nor turned aside by the skill of his physicians. The skeleton finger of the grim king of terrors pointed mockingly at the red hand of the herald in the escutcheon, which the dying man had been so vain of as if to defy it to a contest. It had pointed with a similar manner to many an imperial crown—to the coronet of the noble—the sword of the soldier—the mitre of the priest, and always with the same result; for after all, Death is the only real conqueror: nations have disappeared beneath his tread, and earth's sepulchres are but the trophies of his conquest; his deeds are chronicled in verse more wondrous than those which Homer sang or Milton framed—a solemn epic commencing with time; and destined to end but with eternity.

It would be difficult to decide whether surprise or terror predominated most in the mind of Sir Norman when informed that he had but a few brief days to live; he had calculated on thirty, or five-and-twenty years longer, at the very least, and it seemed almost like an impertinence for Death to interfere with the arrangements of the owner of Meldown Park and twenty thousand a year; yet, as he observed to the physician who broke the intelligence, he might have expected it after the Reform Bill, the repeal of the Corn Laws, and the progress of new ideas.

Not even the fact of having caught his fatal illness on his return from Her Majesty's state ball, could reconcile him to the prospect of taking up his final abode in the same dark vault where reposed so many of the long line of the Boothroyds.

That nature must be hard indeed which has not in it some touch of human love and human sympathy. The devoted attention of his daughter Alice, who, like a ministering angel, hovered round his bed, anticipating his wants, praying, for, and, when she could lead his mind in the direction, with him, made some impression on the heart of the baronet; and he observed to his wife, who replaced her when, worn out by continual watching, nature exacted she should take a few hours' repose, that it was almost a pity to sacrifice her to a brainless puppy like Illston.

Lady Boothroyd concealed the alarm these words inspired by a few well-affected tears.

"I am sure," he added, "poor Alice loves me."
"She ought," replied her mother. "I am certain that I should never have forgiven myself had I deceived so good and excellent a father."

At the word "deceived" the dying man regarded her earnestly.

"Were her aversion to the husband you have chosen for her," continued the hypocrite, "prompted by a less unworthy motive than a ridiculous, degrading passion for—But there, Norman, I will not distress you at a moment like this. Heaven will watch over the dignity of our house when you are torn from me. I will bear my sorrows alone."

"Do speak plainly, Lady Boothroyd," said her husband, evidently not much touched by this sudden outbreak of affection. "For whom has Alice conceived a degrading passion?"

"For William Thornton," replied the artful woman.

"I can't believe it—I won't believe it!" exclaimed the baronet, greatly excited. "She denies it; and we both know that she is truthful."

His wife shook her head as if in pity at his blind credulity.

"I must have proof of it," he added; "plain, positive proof, no lies, no inferences; there must be truth this time between us."

"Has there not always been, dear Norman?"

The strong fear of death had absorbed the lesser fear which the dying man entertained of his wife, and he interrupted her by repeating his demand for proofs of her assertion. The lady silently placed the letter of William Thornton in his hand. As he read it, the features of her husband became livid with passion; that the son of a manufacturer, a parvenu, who had nothing but talent and high principles to recommend him, whose name was unknown in the herald's book, not even alluded to in the peerage, should presume to lift his eyes to his daughter! the heiress of Meldown, the last, as he believed, of the blood of the Boothroyds, filled his cup of bitterness to the brim, and he instantly resolved that not a shilling of his fortune should go to enrich the descendants of the man he hated.

In the madness of his passion, he forgot how he had obtained the right of disposing of that fortune.

"Send for my lawyer!" he said.

"I have done so," quietly observed her ladyship.

"Even from the grave—since I must die," added Sir Norman, bitterly, "I will watch over the honour of my house."

"Mr. Marshall is in the ante-room; he, arrived from Exeter last night. Will you see him?"

A sign—for the baronet was too much exhausted to speak—intimated his assent, and the man of deeds and settlements was admitted. He came, with the usual stereotyped look of professional sympathy upon his features, and began to express a hope that his honoured client and patron felt better.

"Pah!" muttered the dying man, "I understand all that now. I want no compliments; I require you to take instructions for—"

Here the speaker gasped for several instants, in order to recover breath.

"Your will, Sir Norman," said the lawyer; "certainly—a very prudent precaution; we never die an hour sooner for arranging our affairs. Some persons are nervous, exceedingly nervous, upon these occasions; but where the mind is strong—"

A glance from Lady Boothroyd interrupted the harangue; and, taking the hint, Mr. Marshall drew his chair to a small table near the bedside of his client, and prepared to write.

The baronet pointed to his wife, intimating that she should quit the room—an order her ladyship felt inclined to resist; but there was an expression in the cold gray eye of her husband, warning her it might be dangerous, for a single stroke of his pen could cancel the settlements he had made upon her.

With a look of resignation she obeyed him; and the dying man felt a momentary gratification at having triumphed for once over the iron will which for so many years had governed and moulded his.

In less than an hour the lawyer quitted his client, carrying with him instructions for a second will. Lady Boothroyd met him in the ante-chamber. Her features were pale with excitement and suspense.

The word "well" was the only one that escaped her.

"As you could wish," said Mr. Marshall; "if Alice refuses to wed her cousin, she forfeits the estates."

"In whose favour?"

"Yours."

A smile of proud satisfaction lit for an instant the features of the hypocritical woman who had manoeuvred thus successfully against the happiness of her only child.

"And in the event of her accepting him?" she whispered, "the settlements—"

"Remain unchanged," replied the lawyer.

"When is the will to be executed?"

"To-night; I have not an instant to lose."

The man of law withdrew, and the mistress of Meldown Park—now doubly hers, in anticipation—sat down to reflect upon her future proceedings. Her meditations did not last long before they were broken by the return of Mr. Marshall, and the man whom, of all others at such a moment, she least wished to see—Andrew Sillex.

The steward appeared unchanged; his gaunt frame slightly bent by time, perhaps, since we last introduced him to our readers, but in other respects the same.

"So," he said, seating himself, without the slightest mark of respect or deference, by the side of Lady Boothroyd, "Sir Norman is dying."

So surprised was his confederate by the unexpected visit, she could merely bow her head.

"I must see him."

"Impossible!"

"There is no such word," observed the old man, sarcastically, "when opposed to my will. You thought to steal a march upon me; you forgot whom you had to deal with. The will has been tampered with."

"Nothing of the kind!" exclaimed the lawyer; "and I am surprised that you should suspect a man of my integrity with—"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Sillex; "I know the value of words."

"Show him the instructions," said her ladyship, well knowing that it was the only way to satisfy his suspicious nature.

Although somewhat astonished at the command, Mr. Marshall placed the papers in his hands.

Andrew drew from his pocket his large horn spectacles and deliberately read over the instructions. When he came to that part which, in the event of the refusal of Alice to marry the viscount, gave Meldown to her mother, a half-smothered chuckle broke from his thin parchment lips:

"Umph! not so bad as I expected," he observed, "but still—"

"You had better leave us for a few minutes," hastily interrupted Lady Boothroyd. "Mr. Sillex and I have private arrangements to talk over."

Much as the lawyer marvelled at the order, he unhesitatingly obeyed it: It was not his interest to offend her.

"Come nearer," continued the speaker, as soon as she found herself alone with the steward; "doubtless the ear of yon prying fool is glued against the key-hole of the door."

Andrew grinned assent, and they both withdrew to a recess formed by one of the windows of the room.

"What is it you complain of," resumed his mistress, "in the arrangement? The personals, out of which your silence is to be paid for, are untouched."

"But you are benefited," muttered the old man, bitterly.

"Does that gail you? Would you sooner deal with me than Mr. Thornton?" replied the artful woman, "as you will have to do, if Alice marries his son William. It is to guard against that the change has been made."

"Mr. Thornton," repeated her hearer, with unaffected surprise. "Why, what can he have to do with it?"

"Alice loves his son," answered her mother.

This was a light in which Mr. Sillex had not contemplated the affair; and he began to ask himself if he had not been somewhat too precipitate. Still, he could not refrain from giving one of his usual grins at the intelligence, as if he drew amusement from the annoyance of others.

"This change in the disposition of the property is a mere contingency," added the speaker.

"Which you will contrive to make a certainty," said the steward, fixing his eyes upon her as if to read her secret thoughts.

"Not so," replied her ladyship, without flinching from his gaze; "I have but one wish: to see my daughter the wife of Viscount Illston. And she will be his wife," she continued, after a pause.

"Perhaps," muttered the old man, "perhaps."

"There is no 'perhaps' in the case," exclaimed her ladyship, passionately. "Do you imagine that Alice, or any girl in her senses, would prefer love, as it is called, and poverty, to the splendour of such an inheritance?"

"I don't know; there is no saying what girls prefer," answered Andrew; "they are the only beings I never could clearly understand. Is Sir Norman really so bad?"

"Why ask the question?" demanded the artful woman, calmly; "you know as well as I do that he has not more than four-and-twenty hours to live. Your spies did not forget to inform you of that particular."

The observation was a shrewd one—the question had been put to try her.

Satisfied that his interests could not suffer, in fact, that he should rather gain than lose by the estate falling into the hands of the wife, instead of the daughter, her visitor took his leave. As for the baronet, he had long looked upon him with contempt, and cared very little how soon he slept in the vault of the Boothroyds.

Immediately after his departure, the scheming woman proceeded to the chamber of her husband to work out the rest of her nefarious design. Determined no appeal Alice might make should move him, her ladyship seated herself by the bedside of the dying man, determined not to leave him by himself till the will was duly executed, and all was over.

That same night it was signed and sealed.

For some time after the signature, Sir Norman appeared buried in profound reflection. Nature—for there must have been some touch of human feeling in his hollow heart—whispered to him that he had acted unjustly. As the hour of dissolution approached, the pride which had sustained him began to lose its power; perhaps he thought, too, of the brother whom he had so cruelly wronged. Death holds to the eyes of its victims a mirror, in which they see themselves as they really are; not as self-flattery, worldly adulation, and prosperity have painted them.

Alfieri, in one of his immortal tragedies, exclaims, with bitter eloquence—

"Man—art thou great or vile—die, and Thou shalt know."

A secret at all times terrible, but doubly so to those who meet truth for the first time on the verge of the grave.

The father of Alice had been doubly unfortunate—first in a narrow selfishness which had been born with him, and rendered him insensible to the nearest ties of kindred. He had grasped at all; but the fool forgot that an hour must come when the inheritance dishonestly obtained would crumble like ashes in his hand. Secondly, in marrying a woman, if possible, a hundred times more selfish than himself;—a creature, greedy, avaricious, and cunning, who wedded him for money, ruled him like a puppet, and despised him for the want of that intellect, the absence of which constituted her strength;—a creeping thing, who in poverty would have grovelled and fawned abjectly upon those she had injured and insulted in prosperity.

It is a sad task to describe depravity in woman; but the worst of all depravities is the depravity of calculation: it is like painting an angel with a demon's wings—a seraph with the snakes of a Medusa.

How intensely the true hearts of the world, when they meet such beings, must despise them!

To do Lady Boothroyd justice, she had all along been, and still was, perfectly sincere in her desire to see Alice the wife of her nephew Illston. The marriage would not only confer upon her a reflected greatness, but arm her with the influence of his family, should the dark practices which had deprived Lillian of her birthright ever be brought to light: countenanced by the Earl of Carlington, she might brave the exposure her arts could not avoid.

"Norman," she said, as the faint struggles of remorse in the heart of her husband became evident, "you are distressing yourself unnecessarily."

The baronet regarded her anxiously.

"I know my sex," she continued; "whilst a hope, a possibility exists of gratifying the caprices of our hearts, we make every effort to succeed. Tears are our eloquence, prayers our weapons, and it is against these that I would guard you; were Alice once convinced that her union with William Thornton was impossible, were the solemn barrier of a promise made to her father on his death-bed placed between her and her weak passion, she would at once forget him, and accept the husband we have chosen for her. This is what I would urge, unless," she added, "you are content that the name and blood of your ancient race should mingle with that of the man whose popularity reduced you to a cypher in your own county, and deprived you of your just influence."

At the name of Thornton the evil passions of the dying man rekindled, and every kinder feeling fled.

"She is obstinate," he groaned.

"Her obstinacy may be broken," calmly observed his wife. "Alice will never have the courage to brave your malediction."

The suggestion thus artfully thrown out was not lost upon her husband, and, when his daughter, whom the physicians had insisted should take some repose, returned to his chamber, he proceeded to put it in execution.

"I am dying, Alice," he murmured, as the weeping girl knelt by the side of his bed, bathing his hands with her tears.

"In peace with Heaven, I trust," she faltered; "in peace with all on earth. It is a sad thing to die with one unkind thought within our heart, even for our enemies; but doubly sad against those whom we should love. Father," she added, "if ever I have been wanting in duty, it was the thoughtlessness of childhood, not want of affection. My heart was once so light that a single smile sufficed to banish the recollection of your reproach. Forgive me that—forgive me all the pain and anxiety I have caused you, and bless me with a parent's blessing."

"Blessings are for the obedient," replied Sir Norman, harshly, "not for those who, with duty and affection on their lips, can see a parent die, and yet withhold the only consolation which could soothe his passage to the grave."

On hearing these cruel words, the poor girl trembled violently. The terrible struggle she had foreseen was at hand.

"Ask anything but that," she sobbed. "Leave me, if you will, to poverty. I will bear it cheerfully, and never question your justice or affection. But do not—for pity's sake, do not—condemn me to a fate so loathsome that death would be a welcome refuge. Why blight the existence of your child—your only one? Think of the days when I climbed upon your knee, and first lisped the name of 'father.' You loved me then. By the memory of those innocent and happy hours spare me—spare me. I plead," she added, "in the strong agony of a breaking heart. Save me from the pollution of a marriage I abhor, and I promise—faithfully promise—never to be the wife of any man, so I am spared the misery of becoming Illston's."

"And so permit the name of Boothroyd to become extinct," observed her father, indignantly. "Have you no pride?"

Alice could only answer him with her tears.

"Will you see me die," he added, "wretched and unhappy? Have you forgotten," he added, "how terrible a thing it is to receive a father's malediction?"

The piercing shriek which broke from the lips of his unhappy child as the last word fell upon her ears, and the look of hopeless agony which followed it, shook the resolution of the dying man, and he hesitated, as if his better angel for an instant had arrested the unnatural malediction upon his lips.

Lady Boothroyd, who was standing half hid, by one of the curtains of the bed, from the sight of her daughter, made him a sign to be firm.

"A dying malediction," continued the baronet, "which time can never cancel, which, with a parent's indignation, I—"

"Hold," said Alice, with desperate firmness. "Will nothing but my misery content you?"

"Nothing but your marriage with Illston will," replied the baronet.

The victim of parental tyranny and injustice laid her hand upon her heart, as if to repress its throbbings; then slowly uttered the words, "I promise."

"Without mental reservation of any kind?"

"I promise," she repeated, "if Illston claims my hand, I shall be his."

And, overcome by the effort, the poor girl sank, deprived of consciousness, by the side of the bed.

Lady Boothroyd rang the bell, and, with the assistance of her waiting-maid—a creature devoted to her service—carried the senseless form of her daughter from the room.

As she disappeared from his gaze, Sir Norman observed that the lips of his child were stained with blood, and bitterly did the sight of it reproach him.

"Do not suffer your young mistress," said the heartless mother, addressing the woman, "on any account, to return to the chamber of her father, and when she recovers give her the opiate."

The woman nodded, to intimate that she perfectly comprehended the instructions she had received.

Having thus effectually guarded against a second interview between the father and her child, and against what she considered far worse—the chance of a last appeal to his feelings, her ladyship returned to the bedside of her dying husband. He had acted the part she wished him to act, and she cared not how soon the drama ended.

As she resumed her seat, Sir Norman faintly murmured the name of his child.

"Better," replied his wife; "I told you she would be so, once the struggle over."

He regarded her doubtfully.

"You have acted nobly," added the speaker; "the honour of our name is safe."

The baronet uttered the word "blood," and shuddered; he had always entertained a childish terror at the sight of it.

"A spasm—a mere nothing."

For more than an hour the speakers remained silent. The life of the baronet was ebbing fast, he had no longer the strength to speak his wishes, or he would have asked for his child to soothe his parting agonies with her prayers; but he had violated nature by his harshness, and the blessing was denied him.

At that last moment the vanity and pride of character, which had so long sustained him, vanished, and he would have retracted his cruel injunctions for the happiness of again hearing the words of pardon and religion pronounced by the pure lips of Alice. It appeared doubly hard to die with the cold, gray, stony glance of the woman who had been his evil genius fixed upon him.

"On some fond heart the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
E'en from the tomb the voice of nature cries;
E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires."

"Shall I pray with you, Norman?" demanded the only witness of his deathbed.

The dying man with difficulty made a sign of refusal; the look of aversion that accompanied it was perfectly lost upon her ladyship, who had given strict orders that none of the servants should enter the room unless she summoned them.

For some time the lips of her husband moved as if in mental prayer. As he felt his strength receding, his breath becoming fainter and fainter—cold drops of terror and remorse started upon his forehead. The supplications of his child—supplications he had rejected—rang in his ears with terrible distinctness.

He made a sign as if he wished to write, but his wife did not choose to understand it. With a look of anger he stretched forth his hand to ring. Lady Boothroyd sprang from her chair and quietly removed the bell-pull from his reach, then resumed her seat.

She had no wish to pain him or add to his sufferings; but not even the mute eloquence of the despairing look he gave her could shake her strong determination to prevent his cancelling the iniquitous will, or recalling words which sealed the misery of their only child.

"Too late, Norman," she whispered; "I must guard you against the weakness of your own heart."

A deep groan broke from the lips of her husband.

"Die in peace," she added; "all is for the best."

An hour afterwards, the bell of the baronet's chamber was heard. When the servants entered the room, they found their master dead, and their lady by the bedside, in an attitude of prayer. The scene was well acted, but it imposed on no one; not a domestic in the house but knew the terms on which they had lived together.

Neither was a tear shed to the memory of the man by one of the many dependents who had eaten his bread. True, he had paid them—paid them ostentatiously for their services; but those of the heart cannot be bought.

"Thus, unlamented, pass the proud away,
The gaze of fools—the pageant of a day."

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.—ART EDUCATION.

WITHIN the last few years rapid progress has been made in the facilities offered to students in every branch of education. Art has rivalled literature and science. Schools of design have been opened; novel systems of instruction introduced. The effect is seen in an improved popular taste in every description of manufacture. We have new compound words to represent this new idea—art-manufactures, or industrial-art—being a combination peculiar to our age. The domain of art is extended into the realm of our household goods; the commonest articles of daily use testify to our advance in art. We are beginning to cultivate our taste in art-education, and no longer to confine the exercise of this sublime faculty to the artist's studio or the sculptor's atelier.

The schools of design—originally begun at Somerset House—the drawing classes formed in every literary institution, the extensive circulation of illustrated papers, the opening of the Art Treasures Exhibition at Manchester, have all contributed, at once to increase and, to a certain extent, to satisfy the taste for art. As an evidence of this we might adduce the numerous letters we receive from apprentices and workmen, asking advice on the subject of drawing—how are they to begin? what are they to do? what materials should they employ? what copies should they select? We are rejoiced at this, because we believe it to be a sign of healthy progress, and because we take credit to ourselves for having—in some degree—contributed to the fostering of this growing taste for art.

What a marvel would such a journal as CASSELL'S ILLUSTRATED FAMILY PAPER have been some years ago! Four or five excellent engravings for a penny, irrespective of letter-press, would have been a miracle of cheapness. Engravings that were worth anything were issued at a price beyond the reach of any but the wealthy. Cheap engravings there were none, for those at a low price were worth nothing. The art of wood engraving has wonderfully improved, and its results are now almost equal to that of copper. The art of printing engravings has also been facilitated, and that which was formerly impossible is permanently practicable. But cheap works especially devoted to cuts have been issued, and have accomplished much in the improvement of the popular taste. Amongst these we may mention, with satisfaction and confidence, the "Art Treasures," a publication issued in penny numbers, and forming, as a volume, a complete, an elegant, and a valuable work.

To the "Art Treasures" we call the attention of our correspondents. It is calculated to do more practical good to the young aspirant than a score of elementary books on drawing. It places before him the productions of the best masters: of the English, Dutch, Flemish, French, and German schools. It furnishes valuable criticisms on every picture, with interesting biographical notices of the artists, and it is issued at a price which places it within the reach of all. Its delineations are remarkable for accuracy, and its criticisms for taste and judgment.

In offering a slight sketch of the various schools, the reader is not by a slow and tedious process conducted through a long and rugged path; but by a short inquiry, based on the fundamental principles of art, and illustrated by the works of the great masters, his attention is drawn to that proper application of mechanical skill, by which such admirable specimens of the genius of the human mind have been produced. The perusal of the work cannot fail to be useful to all art students.

Here we may be permitted to state our conviction that the study of art may be pursued without a master, and that the careful and the diligent student may learn to draw without a master. "There is one precept," observes Sir Joshua Reynolds, "in which I shall be opposed only by the vain, the ignorant, and the idle. I am not afraid that I shall repeat it too often. If you have great talents, industry will improve them; if you have moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiency. Nothing is denied to well-directed labour; nothing is to be obtained without it."

There is one important caution which we would offer to the self-instructing art student, namely, to avoid the selection of indifferent copies. Do not adopt the plan—if you are really desirous of success—of only copying prints or drawings. This will never answer your purpose. Copy real objects. No matter how simple the object may be; a cup, a jug, a candlestick, or a square block is best of all to begin with. Copy that square block. You thus learn from a real object the common rudiments of drawing —the perpendicular, horizontal, and oblique lines. By copying this, your eye is also trained in the science of perspective, and gradually becomes accustomed to that which, if you confined your attention to the copying of drawings or engravings, you would never properly understand.

Drawing is another sort of writing, and may be acquired in the same way. If the eye and the hand work together, are guided by discretion, and moved by diligence, the student is sure of success.

FRENCH LESSONS;

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"I HOPE, Robert," said George, on resuming his office of teacher, "that you have thought over the subject of your last lesson, viz., some of the idiomatic forms of expression relating to common things and everyday life. On these things there is often great absurdity in literal translations from the English. After you have added some more words to your vocabulary, I will tell you some more gallicisms, or French idioms."

A lantern	Une lanterne

"As this list of words," observed George, "includes very necessary things relating to the house or the home, mind, Robert, you impress them thoroughly on your memory, and always try to use with them the French idioms I dictate to you."

"It is curious that French people, though not remarkable for their love of home, have three ways of expressing being at home. If you were asking if a gentleman were at home, you might say, 'Monsieur est-il à la maison?' 'Monsieur est-il chez lui?' or, 'Monsieur est-il au logis?' Should you be inquiring after a lady, of course you must substitute 'Madame' for 'Monsieur,' and make the pronoun agree, thus, 'Madame est-elle chez elle?' or, 'à la maison?' or, 'au logis?' Observe that in this question, the person about whom you inquire is placed at the beginning of the sentence, and it would be English-French to say, 'Est monsieur à la maison?'—'Is Mr. — at home?'

"A console is a piece of furniture much more common in France than in England. It is a kind of marble slab supported by a bracket, and generally placed between the windows. As for sofa, it is called both sofa and canapé; but the latter word is most used. The chauferette, or foot-warmer, is a kind of box containing hot wood ashes. It is used by ladies as they sit at work, or at any other sedentary occupation. As the feet are placed on it, it has one good effect—it keeps them warm; but, from the pernicious influence of charcoal, we consider the use of the chauferette injurious, and should any of our fair readers meet with chauferettes when they go to France, we advise them not to use them."

"And now for the proper manner of saying 'I am going to bed.' Recollect, it is not 'Je vais à lit,' but 'Je vais au lit.'"

Les chenets, the handirons, or dogs, as they are also called, will seem novelties to you who have only lived in coal districts. The fires in France are principally of wood, and the chenets, or dogs (generally of iron) support the wood. Une corbeille, or fancy basket, is much used for flowers. But when you mix with French people you will hear of corbeille as chiefly connected with marriage. For instance, La corbeille de mariage—the vehicle containing the bridegroom's gifts to the bride. Le parquet, or inlaid floor, is another French fashion. Not only is this floor in patterns, but is sometimes waxed and polished to such a degree that it is as slippery as ice.

"And now," said George, "let us resume

"The rules for to-day's exercise are not complicated. They can be given in a few words. Generally speaking, compound nouns take the plural s in both parts. However, there are exceptions, thus—appui-main, a support for the hand, becomes in the plural appuis-main; un hôtel-dieu, a hospital, makes hôtels-dieu. In compound nouns united by a preposition, only the first takes the mark of the plural; and of some compounds the meaning admits of no plural at all. Proper names, representing two or more individuals in the same family, remain invariable; but you must except les Césars, les Horaces, les Scipions, les Stuarts, les Guises, les Condés, les Bourbons, and some other proper names, which, from constant use, may be said to have become common names."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XVII.

SOUND.

PRODUCTION OF SOUND IN THE AIR (continued).

444. Hotels and large dwelling houses are frequently provided with SPEAKING TUBES, leading from one storey to another. What is the reason that the lowest whisper at one end of the tube is distinctly heard at the other end?—The sound is confined to the tube, and does not spread and become weakened, as in the open air.

445. How far has a low whisper been heard through a pipe?—More than half a mile; through a continuous line of empty water pipes laid in the streets of Paris.

446. Why can we hear more distinctly along the outside wall of a house than at a distance from it?—Because the sound is prevented from spreading on the side on which the wall is.

447. Why do we hear better at night than in the daytime?—Because the air is generally stiller and of more uniform density, and in the quiet of the night our ears are more sensitive to the impressions of sound.

ECHOES.

448. What happens when a sound strikes against an obstacle, as the side of a house, or the wall of a room, or a rocky cliff?—It rebounds, or glances off, like an elastic ball, and is heard at a certain distance, in the direction in which it proceeds, as an Echo.

449. Illustrate by an example.—A person looking into a very deep well hears every word that he speaks repeated to him from the water at the bottom of the well.

450. Mention another illustration.—If I should stand at some distance from the wall of a house and clap my hands, I would hear the same sound again as an echo from the house.

451. How far must you be from a wall in a perpendicular direction to hear a distinct echo?—More than 62 feet.

452. If you were to stand at A, Fig. 34, and clap your hands, another person standing at B may hear an echo; how is the sound reflected to him?—As the figure shows; it strikes obliquely against the wall, and glances off with the same obliquity.

453. Does it ever happen that a loud sound is followed by more than one echo?—

In particular localities echoes are returned in succession from a number of surrounding objects. For example, at West Point, on the Hudson, the report of the morning and of the evening gun is prolonged by repeated echoes from the surrounding highlands.

454. Mention another example.—There is a locality near the foot of Mount Washington, on the west side, where to the blast of a single horn a full band seems to reply from the adjacent heights.

455. Give another example.—On the Wengern Alp, in Switzerland, the prolonged note of the Alpine horn is caught up by the mountain heights and dies away into the softest melody in the upper sky.

456. What may be said of spacious rooms with vaulted ceilings, or surmounted by lofty domes?—They return every sound in a multiplicity of echoes.

457. What curious fact is occasionally observed in such spacious inclosures with curved walls or ceilings?—The sound produced at one point is often concentrated at another distant point, so that the faintest whisper can be heard from one to the other, although inaudible between the two. Such a room is called a Whispering Gallery.

BLIND MINNIE.

FRANK's first impulse was to entreat Minnie to conceal from their friends their true position; but, bravely conquering this weakness, he requested her to inform Mrs. Leighton of it, and ask her advice. Still he besought the young girl not to abandon him, but to trust him as heretofore; told her again how every feeling of his soul was centred in her; and entreated her to think favourably of him—to try and love him; and not now, but hereafter, when he had proved himself trustworthy, to give him, if her feelings would allow, the dearer right of a husband to protect her. To these entreaties Minnie avoided a reply, and Frank forbore to exact from her even a conditional promise, yearningly as his heart longed for some ray of hope for the future, to which he might turn for consolation in their present unhappy separation.

A few hours after landing in Southampton they parted. She, with her faithful Ann, accompanied Captain and Mrs. Leighton to their home, while he pursued his solitary journey through France in a despondency of spirit which neither the kind farewell of Minnie nor the novelty of the scene and people among which he was passing had power to soften for many days. The hours passed wearily, wearily without the gentle presence which had brightened his daily life during the last year.

Minnie, meanwhile, after her arrival at Cliff Hall, the picturesque, sea-girt home of the Leightons, sought an early opportunity of telling her strange tale to Mrs. Leighton. The indignation, the horror of that good lady against our poor hero was unbounded. Her quickly-roused, impetuous nature refused to listen to or weigh the temptations which had prompted his conduct. "It was treacherous, villainous, contemptible—a perfect Yankee trick." (Dear Mrs. Leighton, you have learned to know the Yankees more kindly now.)

Minnie sought in vain to still her vehemence. Impelled by her generous heart, she embraced the young girl enthusiastically, besought her to think no more of the unworthy villain, but to remain with them to be their dearly-beloved daughter—to—Her kind words were abruptly stopped by the entrance of Ann, and her exclamation—"Minnie is fainting, Mrs. Leighton." They raised the young girl upon the bed, and soon succeeded in restoring her to consciousness; but the swoon was followed by strong chills and hot fevers, which lasted, with almost unchanging violence, during several weeks, notwithstanding the efforts of the physician to check the disease, and the kind, motherly care of Mrs. Leighton, and left the frail young girl in a state of prostration which caused her excellent friends deep anxiety for her ultimate recovery. During her long illness, it seemed as though the sad cause of it was ever oppressing her mind. Her feeble, plaintive voice would frequently entreat "her dear Mrs. Leighton not to judge her poor brother (as she still called Frank) so harshly; that he was so kind, so noble, that she loved him so dearly." Mrs. Leighton would reply: "Very well, my darling, only keep quiet and get well," which would silence the sufferer for a time; then she would again restlessly renew her prayers. She once said to good Captain Leighton, "Do you know of it, my dear sir? Oh, you do not blame him so severely." And his assurance that "he could not understand his wife's account, that he felt no prejudices against Frank, and would form no opinion until she got well, and could tell him calmly the whole story," gave her more comfort.

She had been many days convalescent ere it was deemed prudent to allow her to tell the tale she was so eager to communicate to Captain Leighton. At length, one fair morning, after having carried the fragile form of the young girl in his arms to the summer-house, and having placed her upon a couch in a position from which she could gaze only upon the Channel and some of the most striking points of scenery around them, and receive strength from the soft summer winds which sported through the arbour, her kind host seated himself beside her, saying, "My daughter, I will listen to you now if you feel strong enough to tell me of—"

"Yes, oh, yes, my dear sir. Let me now," she interrupted eagerly, and began her account of her eventful life in India. At first, like his wife and Minnie herself, indignant censure was uppermost in his mind; but the young girl spoke so eloquently of "her brother's" untiring care of her dying father, of his unselfish, self-sacrificing devotion to herself, and drew such touching pictures of their simple, happy life in Bombay, that the warm-hearted old officer found himself insensibly led to admire and esteem the young man; and when Minnie had ended, he was almost as energetic in his praises of Frank as his fair companion herself. He detested falsehood, and gave the fault its full and just censure; but he was too generous a nature himself not to appreciate noble conduct in another. He felt that, notwithstanding this single stain upon his otherwise fair character, Frank still merited entire confidence, and was worthy of the charge he had hitherto so beautifully fulfilled.

These sentiments from the lips of one so respected by her, cheered and lightened Minnie's heart, as it had not been cheered and lightened since that night when Frank's confession had changed its previous soft sunlight of happiness to the stern darkness of misery. Minnie thanked her generous host again and again for his charitable judgment, then said—

"It is very strange that he has not yet written us! I do so long to hear from him!"

"I have had a letter for you, dear child," answered Captain Leighton, "for some weeks, but was forbidden by the physician to give it to you, lest it should be too exciting to you in your weak state. But you are so much stronger now; here it is, my love."

Minnie seized it and kissed it joyfully, broke the seal, then said, in a wistful tone—

"Oh, that I could read it! Will you read it for me, sir?"

Captain Leighton did so with much emotion. He felt strongly moved by its tone of respectful, deep affection. Frank wrote her of the hopes of her cure, which his visit to Dr. B— in Paris had excited within him, and also urged her to tell Captain Leighton and his wife of the wrong which he had done her.

"He is a true, noble soul!" exclaimed Captain Leighton, closing the letter.

"May I answer it at once?" asked Minnie, in a voice choked with tears.

"Yes, my child; but first listen to me awhile. The world would not allow you to return with him now, knowing what you do, without censure, nor would it be right. Remain for the present with my wife and myself. We will go to Paris with you; then you must travel with us, and be our child. If afterwards you find that you cannot be happy without Frank, then we must consent to give you up to him; but if your regard for him is only as for a brother, then, my love, remain with us for ever as a dearly-treasured daughter, for indeed my wife and I both love you tenderly, and the idea of parting from you is very painful to us. And who knows, my darling," he continued, jestingly, "but that fate may have destined that title to be yours in very truth? for when my son comes home, who can tell what may happen? I can answer for him (for he is the very image of his good mother) that the impulsive, tender-hearted boy will be desperately enamoured of your rarely lovely self at the first glance. His effect upon you is far less certain, for, though a manly-looking fellow, he is no Adonis; mais nous verrons."

With these words, the generous-hearted captain laughingly kissed away the tears which were rapidly falling upon Minnie's two fair cheeks.

"Hush! hush, my pet," he cried, "don't do that. You'll make a sturdy old seaman break down presently, and that would be a pretty state of affairs; don't talk now. Just let me lift you home again, and let us write to this dear brother; or stay, shall I bring writing materials here to you? It will be more quiet here."

He did so, and under her direction wrote to Frank, telling him of Minnie's illness, but that she was again well, and would, in a few days, accompany her friends to Paris, naming the hotel at which they should lodge.

It was at first rather difficult to persuade Mrs. Leighton that Frank did not deserve the severe censure she had supposed; but Minnie had so many instances to relate of his goodness that, by the time the party reached Paris, the good lady was quite ready to greet our hero with the frank cordiality habitual to her.

Frank's joy at again meeting his beloved Minnie was sadly shadowed as he remarked the traces of suffering which illness had left upon her in the marble paleness and transparency of her complexion, the increased delicacy of her exquisite features, the fragility of her frame, and, above all, the heaven-illuminated peace which shone upon her pure, high brow, and pervaded her whole being. To the eyes of the lover she seemed already above earth, too pure, too holy to dwell among the children of men; but her friends had no such anxious fears. They remarked how rapidly she was regaining her strength, spoke hopefully of the success of their visit to the oculist, and of their intention of taking her afterwards to travel with them. Frank's fears gradually lessened to give place to a new cause of anxiety: he perceived that they had made arrangements for Minnie without any reference to him. Was it their design to separate her from him?

He was not long left in suspense. Captain Leighton, in a private conversation with him, told him of the love his wife and himself felt for the young girl, and of their wish to keep her always with them, but that, if she desired, they would yield her to him. He demanded only that in the meantime Frank should not urge her to a decision, but should act only as a trusty friend towards her. Frank was forced to confess, disagreeable as was this plan to himself, that it was correct, and showed a true regard for Minnie's welfare on the part of her kind friends. He promised Captain Leighton to endeavour to conform to his desires, but acknowledged that he should find it difficult to do so.

On the following day, Dr. B— saw Minnie, pronounced that her disease had been caused by too great a strain of the nerves of the eye in doing fine drawing and embroidery, and that it was curable, but that the process would be tedious, and sometimes painful. She must be confined for many days in a very dark room, and kept free from excitement, besides which several operations would be necessary. These conditions gave the young girl no uneasiness on her own account; but she could not bear that her friends should confine themselves with her while there was so much to be seen and enjoyed.

To gratify her, therefore, they were forced to leave her for many hours each day under the care of Ann, who could not be persuaded to leave her dear young lady except when Frank, as he often did, insisted upon remaining with Minnie, stating that he had already visited the places which were to be the objects of interest to Mr. and Mrs. Leighton during that day. Captain Leighton had no doubts about leaving the young man alone with her, confident that he was too honourable to take advantage of their absence to break his promise to him.

At length came the day in which the last and most trying operation was to be performed. Mrs. Leighton was too much excited to remain in the room. The captain, Frank, and the devoted Ann sat near the young girl, who alone of the whole group remained, calm, and apparently free from anxiety. Although Ann made a great effort to copy her example, the good woman was trembling in every limb. Captain Leighton vainly tried to conceal his anxiety under a forced levity of manner and conversation, while Frank's rapidly varying colour and eager eye betrayed his agitation. The physician himself looked at the delicate girl in evident fear, lest she could not bear the operation. He told her it would be longer and more painful than any she had yet undergone, and asked her if she felt sure of her strength to suffer it.

"Oh, yes!" she replied, in her usual quiet tones. "Fear not for me, good friends; I am not afraid!"

And, during the minute and delicate operation which followed, she sat pale and calm as a statue. Suddenly they were startled by a loud cry from her; and, with one bound towards Frank, she threw her arms around him, exclaiming, "My brother, I see you!"

He clasped her passionately to his heart for one second; the next he would have fallen from his chair but for the support of her arm. Overcome by his emotions, he had fainted for the second time in his life. He soon revived under Ann's care, while the physician drew Minnie away, and again consigned her for a few days to the darkened chamber, into which light should be allowed to penetrate by degrees, until her eyes became strong enough to bear the full brightness of day; but the night of that chamber was made bright by the radiant stars of joy and hope beaming in the hearts of the group there assembled. Minnie received with deep gratitude the caresses and expressions of pleasure and love of Captain and Mrs. Leighton, and the congratulations of her good Ann, and modestly thanked Doctor B. — for his beneficent care, and for the praises of her fortitude, which he lavished upon her. Frank said not a word, but sat at her feet, his face pressed upon her hands in uncontrollable agitation.

The Leightons sought not to prevent him. Why should they? Had not her first thought, her first look, upon recovering her sight, been for him? Her action had clearly revealed to the eyes of the kind couple the power and depth of her love towards the young man; and they had too much good sense and kindness of heart to desire that, for their selfish gratification, she should stifle so genuine a feeling.

A half hour passed, and Frank still retained his position at Minnie's feet, and his silence; then, abruptly rising, he left the room. His friends watched his strange conduct with surprise; they could not understand it, but we may. He felt that, if he staid longer, his heart must burst with its throbbings, or his lips break the silence to which his promise to Captain Leighton bound him. He did not return until evening, by which time he had regained the habitual lively manner which had hitherto made him so entertaining and welcome a companion in the dark room of the sufferer.

In a few days, light sufficient was allowed in Minnie's chamber to admit of the young man's reading aloud. He chose his former accustomed seat at the young girl's feet, and began, at her request, one of her favourite poems. He had read but a few pages, when Minnie exclaimed:—

"Oh, Frank, does it not remind you of our happy evenings in India?" Then, bending over him burst into tears.

"My dearest girl," said Mrs. Leighton, after a moment's pause, "are you unhappy now?"

"No, no, my dear friend," hastily answered Minnie. "In many respects I am far happier at present, blessed with such noble, generous friends" (taking Mrs. Leighton's hand with an affectionate pressure), "and with restored sight. How grateful I feel! But I have been overcome with recollections of past pleasures which may never return. It is only that thus we used to pass our hours together;" and the young girl's tears choked her voice.

"Ah, wife," broke in the good captain, in a tone in which jest and sadness were strangely blended, "I foresee that we must make up our minds, after all, to give up our daughter again to this young scapegrace!"

Frank darted a glance of inexpressible gratitude towards the speaker, then buried his face, after his usual fashion when deeply affected, in Minnie's hands; still he said nothing. What need of words? His eyes had long betrayed eloquently the tale his lips were forbidden to utter.

Captain Leighton looked half sorrowfully, half pleasantly upon the young couple, then continued:— "You are a brave fellow, Howard; you have borne the test to which I put your self-command heroically.

I absolve you now from your promise; still, I do wish that you would leave off daughter unfettered by any promise, free to look around her, and make her own choice, until you return from India. You must also look among other fair ones of earth; you may find yourself better suited. Who can tell? If you both bear unchanged the ordeal of so long an absence, then I—we will, with perfect confidence, trust our gentle girl to your care. Have you not a word to say, Howard?" he asked, after a pause. "Why, the boy is sobbing, as I live; and Minnie, too, is spoiling her beautiful eyes, and my wife joining them, I declare! I can't allow that!" he cried, good humouredly. "Such weakness! Cheer up, my boy; tell me—when are you going back to India?"

"I—I did not think of going back, sir."

"Not going back? Why, how is your business to be settled?"

"By letter, sir, unless—"

"Brother, you ought to go," whispered Minnie.

"Do you think so? I believe you are right," he answered. Then, turning to Captain Leighton, he said—"But Minnie thinks, and she is right, that it would seem ungrateful to Robson and Co. should I now leave their service without first going to them to explain my present position and future prospects. Do you agree with us, sir?"

"Most undoubtedly. I am glad you think so correctly about it; but you look as gloomy as though you were to be sent to Siberia instead of taking a voluntary journey to your old friends. Are you unwilling to go?"

"Oh, sir, it is not that! I do desire to see them (those noble-hearted brothers) once more, and to thank them for their generous trust in me, and for their rare kindness to Minnie. I must tell them, too, of the benevolent friends in whose care I shall have left my sister; for they are so good, they will appreciate your value, and rejoice with Minnie. And I"—here his voice faltered—"I have a confession to make to them. For many reasons, I do wish to go; but the voyage is so long, the separation so hard from Minnie, and—"

"Tut, tut, my boy; it will soon pass. You'll be back again in less than six months; and, meanwhile, we shall take good care of Minnie, show her about the world, let her see and be seen, for truly 'so fair a flower was never born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desert air' of an American wilderness. Say, wife, how do you like Leighton's improvement of Gray? By-the-bye, Howard, I wish before you return you would extend your visit to the United States, take possession of your funds, and bring them over to us. We could easily find you some pleasant occupation in England, and then we should still keep our darling near us; indeed you must, for it will break my dear wife's heart, as well as mine, to part with our pet."

"Oh, dear friends!" exclaimed Minnie, starting up, and throwing her arms around the good captain and his wife, "how you all love to spoil me! What deep cause for gratitude I have that I, an orphan, without a claim upon any living being, am thus surrounded by generous, devoted friends! What have I done to merit these blessings? What return can I make for such favours? I can only love you dearly, dearly—"

Captain Leighton pressed her to him for one instant, then laughingly thrust her away, saying—

"Have a care, you youth is watching us with a jealous eye."

"I defy any of you to see the 'green-eyed monster' in my eyes in this twilight," responded Frank, in the same jesting tone. "And as for jealousy, if you kiss my sister I'll kiss your wife." Then approaching Mrs. Leighton, he kissed her hand, adding earnestly, "My dear lady, your love and kindness to my Minnie have endeared you inexpressibly to my heart. May I not, too, claim—"

"Oh, good mother," interrupted Minnie, "embrace us both!" and, laying her arm upon Frank's neck, knelt beside him before the kind lady, who, while she fulfilled their request, could not restrain the tears which she had with difficulty checked during the preceding conversation.

"Here comes the garçon to announce dinner," cried Captain Leighton. "Tis lucky; otherwise the bad example of my tender-hearted wife would have infected us all."

A day or two later, Minnie was allowed to enter a bright room, and look with unshaded eyes upon the friends she loved, and the next day to ride out, and gaze upon the green trees, and flowers, and heavens, for the sight of which she had so often yearned during her temporary blindness. As she stepped from the carriage into the lovely Parc de Monceaux where she took her first ride, she fell impulsively upon her knees, and, with quivering lips, blessed God for his great mercy unto her.

Then followed a few brief, happy days for our young friends, perhaps the happiest they had ever yet known. Together they visited the interesting sights in Paris, and journeyed among its beautiful environs. Captain Leighton and his wife were the most discreet of chaperones, always keeping near them, yet never near enough to restrain the conversation of "their children," as they now called our young friends. True, Frank and Minnie were bound by no formal betrothal; but their confidence in each other was so entire that they needed no promise to make their simple hearts happy.

At length came the sad parting day. Frank could no longer delay his return to India; and Captain Leighton was anxious to take his wife and daughter from the heat of Paris to the bracing atmosphere of Switzerland, where their son was to meet them. Frank courageously forbore to demand from Minnie any promise for the future, but he felt that her heart would remain as unchangeably true to him as he knew his to be for her. With many a heartfelt embrace and fervent farewell, the party separated.

We have not time to follow Frank on his long, lonely journey, nor Minnie and her kind friends through their pleasant wanderings. Suffice it to say, young Richard Leighton met them at Geneva, and, even as his father had said, he seemed inclined to fall in love with our Minnie at first sight; but his mother soon warned him of the futility of any such inclination on his part, and he wisely restrained his budding affection within the limits of brotherly tenderness, reserving his devotion for a certain beautiful Lady Sarah F., with whom, although she makes our friend Richard very happy, our story has no concern.

Frank's friends, the Brothers Robson, welcomed his return joyfully, heard his tale with much astonishment, rejoiced with him in his good fortune; then, bidding him a fervent "God bless you," and promising to visit him at some future day in England, parted from him with regret.

Frank returned to Europe, paid a short visit to his friends, who were by this time sojourning for the winter in Italy, then left them to revisit the home of his childhood, to make the necessary arrangements for his future residence in Europe. He found his step-sister, for whom he had ever retained a tender regard, just budding into womanhood, and persuaded her father to allow her to accompany him on his return, and remain a few years in Europe that she might prosecute certain accomplishments for which she showed decided taste. (Friendly reader, I am that sister. After several years spent in improvement at school, and in joy in his bright home, I have returned to my father and family, and my pleasant American home, though but for a brief visit.)

On our arrival in England, we found Captain and Mrs. Leighton, with Minnie, eager to welcome us. I gazed upon Minnie with a feeling of adoration, which the intercourse of years has rather strengthened than lessened. I have seen many elegant and lovely good women, but never such an angel face, such lustrous, holy eyes! Indeed, I do not believe there is another pair of such eyes in the universe; and her spirit is as holy and serene as her face. My brother asserts that she has been his saviour; and may he to whom I have promised soon to give my aid and loving presence in his path through life find cause to bless our "Sister Minnie" that she taught his wife, by her beautiful example, that a pure mind, loving heart, and gentle spirit are a woman's truest source of influence upon earth.

About one year after our arrival in England, during one of my long vacations from school, there was a double wedding at Cliff Hall. Frank and Minnie, Lady Sarah F. and Richard Leighton, acting as principals, Florence F. (Lady Sarah's sister) and I, with our cavaliers (peculiarly interesting to us, but not to the public) serving as attendants to both parties.

We were a happy travelling party who, a few days later, "steamed" up the Rhine, spending a few days at various points of interest; then wended our way among the magnificent scenery of the mountains of Saxon Switzerland.

Four years have flown since then, yet dear Frank remains as truly in love with "Sister Minnie," as he still calls her, as on that memorable day when I first saw their meeting. May my future home and yours, my young readers, be as bright and happy as theirs! I have begged their leave to write their simple and yet strange story, hoping it may afford you a little of the interest in the reading which the hearing did to your friend, the writer.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

EDWARD BAINES, ESQ. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

EDWARD BAINES, ESQ.

EXPERIMENTAL philosophy has achieved a victory over visionary theory. It has been shown that the labouring classes appreciate the advantages of education, and employ them so well that our national character is thereby exalted, and our national prosperity advanced. We are gainers, not losers, by educational efforts. Every well taught man or woman is a valuable addition to our national greatness. Education has become the rallying cry amongst all classes of the community; it is the bond of union which joins together those who differ in almost everything else; it is the want which all feel; the want which all, but a limited and unworthy section, are anxious to supply. We have a brave host of educators united in a crusade against ignorance; men who, though they may differ as to the means, are agreed as to the end; who make common cause in this one principle, that the people require and must have education.

And foremost among the earnest advocates of education is Mr. Edward Baines, of Leeds. His constant and well-directed efforts have rendered his name familiar to all who are, in any degree, interested in the cause to which he is so warmly attached. By private effort, by public appeal, from the platform, the press, he has unflinchingly advocated the education of the people. For one-and-forty years (though he is now but fifty-eight) he has been occupied in this great work, the work which he confidently believes to be essential to the welfare of our country.

But Mr. Baines is no advocate for state education. He has no faith in placing the instruction of the masses in the hands of the government, no faith in permitting the exercise of universal guardianship to devolve on the state. He has no sympathy with compulsory education, or the admission of any principle which would involve an interference with the right of private judgment.

Mr. Baines is the second son of Edward Baines of Leeds, who represented that constituency in three parliaments. He is the brother of the Right Hon. M. T. Baines, M.P. He was born on the 28th of May, 1800, and received his education at a classical academy in Leeds, and the Protestant Dissenters' Grammar School, Manchester.

In 1817 his youthful sympathy with the education of the ignorant was shown by his undertaking to instruct a class of orphans every Sunday in the Leeds workhouse. The zeal with which he entered on this labour arose from something better and nobler than mere temporary enthusiasm; it was the desire to do good—a principle the permanency of which has been shown by his close and steady pursuit of the same object ever since, as from that day to the present he has been actively employed in Sunday-school labour. Religion and philanthropy are both exercised in the Sunday school. Mr. Baines saw in it at first, and has recognised in it ever since, a system which promised not only the means of ordinary school education, but of religious instruction; which appealed to the heart as well as to the mind, and which added as many moral as intelligent members to the community. Sunday-schools had been in active operation for many years when Mr. Baines commenced his labours. A society for the support and encouragement of Sunday schools was established in 1785. The Sunday Union was founded in 1802; but in 1817 the progress which had been made, the extent of influence which was exerted, the number of teachers engaged in the work, the number of children receiving instruction, were small in comparison with Sunday-school operations now.

Mr. Baines has long been connected with the press. He became assistant editor to his father in 1819, on the Leeds Mercury, of which journal he is now the proprietor and editor. The Leeds Mercury is published three times a week, and has a very large circulation in the north of England. It is one of the most influential amongst the provincial journals; and that influence has been invariably well directed, and consistently and uprightly maintained by its able editor. In his connection with the press he has promoted free trade, the abolition of the corn laws, Catholic emancipation, parliamentary and municipal reform, and every measure of religious liberty. Those who do not sympathise with his views are ready to acknowledge his integrity and consistency, and to own that he has maintained those principles which he holds sacred with courtesy and candour.

In 1820 Mr. Baines assisted in founding the Leeds Philosophical and Literary Institution. In 1825 he took an active part in establishing the Leeds Mechanics' Institution, and subsequently many other societies of a similar character in various parts of Yorkshire. In 1837 he proposed the formation of the Yorkshire Union of Mechanics' Institutes. Of that Union he has now been President twenty-one years. It comprises 128 institutes, with an aggregate of 22,000 members.

In 1834 Mr. Baines published the "History of the Cotton Manufactures in Great Britain," 1 vol. 8vo, with illustrations: the first history of these great manufactures. This work was republished in the United States. It has also been translated into German.

In 1843 he took a leading part in opposing Sir James Graham's Factory Education Bill. For this purpose he obtained and published valuable statistics of education and religion in the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire, with comparisons between the years 1801 and 1843.

Mr. Baines was an active member of the Anti-Corn Law League from 1838 to 1846. He opposed the Minutes in Council proposed by Lord John Russell in 1847; and in the same year published "Letters to Lord John Russell on State Education." From that time he has advocated the principles of voluntary and religious education in numerous pamphlets and lectures, and in the Leeds Mercury. A pamphlet issued by him in 1856, entitled "National Education: Remarks on the Speech and Plan of Lord John Russell," was much quoted in the House of Commons, and seemed to be a means of defeating that plan.

In 1851 he published the "Life of Edward Baines" (his father), and in 1854 "A Visit to the Vaudois of Piedmont," forming a volume of Longman's Travellers' Library.

In 1837 Mr. Baines became a Total Abstainer, "for the sake of example;" and in 1857 published "Twenty Years' Experience of Total Abstinence from Intoxicating Liquors." Of the second edition more than 300,000 copies were circulated.

As a Congregational Dissenter, Mr. Baines has, with his accustomed zeal, taken an active part in the Congregational Union and the Congregational Board of Education. He has published numerous tracts in favour of the Religious Observance of the Sabbath, on the Value of Education, on Mechanics' Institutions, Free Trade, &c.

In connection with this brief sketch of one so deservedly popular as Mr. Baines, we have pleasure in presenting to our readers a faithful portrait of that gentleman from a photograph by Mayall.

BARCELONA.—I.

THE French tell us that Africa begins on the other side of the Pyrenees, that is to say, in Spain. Bad as is the condition of Spain, it scarcely deserves so bad a character. That it has lost its prestige among the nations, that its glory has departed, that its chivalry, learning, and conquest are all gone, there can be no doubt. Spain is the shadow of her former self, but it still possesses some attractive features,—there are remains of its youthful beauty and grace still traceable.

One of the most interesting and remarkable places in Spain, is Barcelona; and to this old city we propose conducting our readers, guided by those obliging couriers, Pen and Pencil.

Barcelona is a seaport on the Mediterranean. It is the capital of the province of Catalonia. It is strongly fortified with batteries, fosses, and walls, and contains a citadel capable of accommodating 7,000 men. It dates its foundation from a very early period, namely, two hundred years before the Christian era, and it is said to have been called after its founder, Hamilcar Barcino. When the Carthaginians fell victims to the Romans, and the Romans to the Goths, Barcelona changed its masters, but steadily increased in importance. At the beginning of the eighth century, it was overrun by the Moors, but was delivered from them by the chivalry of Charlemagne and Ludovico Pio. From that time it was governed by Counts, who exercised an independent sovereignty, until it was ceded by marriage at the end of the twelfth century to the crown of Arragon. The commercial prosperity of Barcelona added considerably to the consolidation of the colossal power of Spain in the middle ages. Its citizens were renowned for their successful enterprise, and signally rivalled the maritime towns of Italy. It was among the first to establish consuls and factories in distant countries. The honour also of promulgating the famous Consolato del Mare, or code of maritime law, is attributed to the vigour and sagacity of its merchants. "Barcelona," says McCulloch, "has sustained seven regular sieges since its recovery from the Arabs. During the greater part of the war of the succession, it adhered firmly to the party of Charles; but, after a desperate resistance, it was taken in 1714 by the forces of Philip V., commanded by the Duke of Berwick. The French got possession of it in 1808, and kept it all through the Peninsular war. In 1821 it was attacked by the yellow fever, which is said to have carried off a fifth part of the population. Thirteen councils have been held here, and above twenty-four assemblies of the Cortes, down to the last in 1706. It has had, also, many visits from the Spanish monarchs, as they were obliged, by the laws of Catalonia, to appear here in person to be crowned and take the oaths as sovereign of this principality and of Arragon, which ceremony was observed down to the time of Philip V."

So much for the history of Barcelona. In our next article we shall begin our peregrinations in the ancient city, taking heed whenever an object of interest presents itself to "make a note of."

The building represented in our engraving, and known as the Old Man's Fountain, stands in the Rambla—a promenade which divides the city into two parts.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

▲ TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXXX.

Oh! there's nothing half so sweet in life
As love's young dream.—MOORE.
Her every thought an angel's tongue might tell;
Her only fault, a heart that loved too well.

BRIDE OF SIENA.

WHAT said bold Larky? He drew Hope a little aside into the embrasure of the old-fashioned window, and taking her hand with almost reverential tenderness, while his manly voice trembled, he whispered—

"Bless you, Hope, my own guardian angel, for those dear, noble words of yours! If you will, indeed, trust me, and tell me when any other tries to win you, I will nip in its bud what you have so well named a poison-flower. Hope, if you will deign to trust me, I will never be jealous more; but, Hope, I love you, not with a child's love—not with a boy's love—but with all the deep and full-grown love of a full-grown man. I know you are a lady now, and far above me, Hope, but if you will love me, I'll rise to be worthy of you yet. There's rich gold, and plenty of it, lass, to be had for the digging; there's all the wealth and grace of learning to reward him who studies in earnest. I don't ask you now, Hope, in your laces, and silks, and muslins, and with your lady talk, and ways, and feelings, and habits, to sink down into a working man's wife; all I ask you now is to love poor Larky a little because he loves you more than words can tell, and when he can come to you and offer you a name by him made great, and a home such as a lady could delight in, you will forget the difference between us, and be that guardian angel of a good man's heart, the wife of his bosom."

By the time Larky had finished this impassioned speech, his feelings had so wonderfully overcome him that he was obliged to bury his face in his hands.

Hope looked round: they were alone.

Some excitement was going on outside, and Apple Blossom, with all a kind mother's, and a delicate woman's, quick perception, seeing that her darling Larky was pleading to Hope Evermore for more than life, had led the others out with her to see what was going on in the street.

Hope, perceiving they were alone, sank into a low nursing-chair near the window, and said, gently,—
"Do not weep, Larky; dear—dearest—beloved Larky, listen to me!"

And Larky thought it no idolatry to kneel—great, strong, impassioned youth though he was—at Hope's little fair feet, and there to hide his agitated features in the folds of her snow-white dress.

"Speak, darling," he said; "but be kind, be merciful, or you'll break my heart, and if you do, you'll find your name engraved there, and your image enshrined there! so be gentle for their sakes."

"Larky Grigg," said Hope, bending over that young bowed head, until her own long, golden ringlets blended with his shining black hair,—
"Larky, why do you say I am above you?"

"Because I feel it, I know it, I see it. You are a lady; and there's as much difference between your station and mine now, Hope, as between my fustian working suit and your silks and muslins."

"And yet, Larky," said Hope, "the fustian, earned by honest labour, is to my mind far nobler wear than the silks and muslins Charity bestows. I am a companion, Larky—a needless appendage of a fine lady, dependent on her caprice, the child of her favour—liable, like my poor predecessor (and she a lady born, too), to be turned out at any moment, stripped of all the finery of life, and obliged to work, or beg, or starve, as it might be. But I do not complain, dear Larky. I was born in a hospital, where my mother died; and but for your mother and her angelic goodness, I must have been sent to the union. The ladies took a fancy to me, and as I had, alas! not strength, like Merry, for honest service, all thought it best for me to be brought up as their companion. Your dear mother and Jem Goodman, who knew my poor mother well, only stipulating that I should never be mixed up as she had been with gentlemen; for she, with a dying woman's keen glance into futurity, foresaw her unborn babe would be that helpless thing—a girl! And as to some fine gentleman she owed a broken heart and early grave, she wished to protect me from a similar fate; therefore, Larky, the few gentlemen who visit my ladies, never see me! And from what I hear from the old countess of the ways, habits, feelings, and conduct of those sad beings, gay men, I never wish to exchange a word with them. I have always, since the dear old ragged school days, looked upon myself," and here Hope blushed deeply and faltered a little, and hid her sweet face on Larky's head, "as your little wife. My mind, and dress, and person, may have changed, but my heart, dear love! is as humble, as fond, and as true, as when we used to go about hand in hand, and I used to call you Larky, good lad, and make you my mind. I have no parents but your parents, no will but theirs and yours; and therefore, whenever you say to me, 'Hope, I have a home ready, will you be my wife,' and your parents, wiser than we, Larky, think it right, and say, 'Take him, Hope, and bless ye both,' I shall gladly give up,—for your dear sake, and that blessed little home of true, first, only love,—the dainty living, and the fine dresses, and carriages, and servants, which have never made me feel half so vain or so proud as I shall be of the poorest little home which will be all my own, and which will be kept nice by my own hands, and maintained in honest plenty by your labour, Larky."

"Bless you—oh, bless you, for those heavenly words, my darling, my Hope!" said Larky. "But if such a home would content you, violet of the world! it would not satisfy my pride in you. No, Hope, I have not birth, education, wealth, or station; but I have what, in this country, can raise a man above them all: I have mind, will, energy, and love. I have, my Hope, I know I have it, and the world shall know it, too,—genius—mechanical genius—the genius most wanted, most prized. I have been kept down hitherto by a sordid master; but that's over now. I'm twenty next week, Hope. In three years from the day I'm twenty, I'll come to you, lass (if God blesses a true heart, full of love for you) with a name, a fortune, language, and manners like your own; in short, with the honest pride that every man must feel who has been the architect of his own fortune, and who owes to his unassisted genius, energy, and determination of character, that position and reputation among men which have rendered him worthy of the loveliest and best of women. Will you wait for me?"

"Yes, Larky. And should this prove a dream, and disappointment wait on genius—as, good lad, it often does,—come to me, and say, 'Hope, I can't offer you those bright castles in the air we spoke of once, but I can give you a cottage on earth, and make you the loved and cherished wife of a working man.' I'll say, 'I have no higher ambition, Larky, and thank heaven for so happy and so sweet a lot.'"

What manly reader will censure Larky when he hears that, as these words fell on his delighted ear, he caught Hope to his heart, and covered her brow, her cheeks, her lips with pure though passionate kisses; and if the gentlemen do not find fault with a line of conduct each feels he would himself pursue under the same circumstances, we hope the ladies will not be very angry with Larky, nor be too severe on Hope for not feeling very angry, or struggling much to get free, but only saying, "Don't, darling, now and then, and at last throwing her fair arms round her young lover's neck, and, as he drew her on to his knee, hiding her tears and her blushes in his bosom."

How long they sat thus, we cannot tell; and we are quite certain they kept no note of the time.

And they exchanged locks of hair, and rings, and broke a sixpence between them, and bound themselves to each other through time and through eternity in the calm presence of the fair, full moon that rose above the now dark buildings.

Yes, it was as affianced lovers they rose hand in hand to answer Apple Blossom's call, announcing that the carriage was at the door to fetch Hope home; and then, as kind, considerate Apple Blossom, perhaps remembering her own courting days, did not rush in, they held each other in a long embrace for a few moments of wild ecstasy, and then Hope took leave of all her early friends. She was going away for many months to the Highlands; but she went happy, betrothed, fond in love, firm in faith, high in hope; and Larky, as he handed her into that carriage, strong in the consciousness of the possession of that talisman which in England can turn all to gold—mechanical genius—thought: "One day I will hand her into a carriage of her own."

CHAPTER LXXXI.

Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?

Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow?—SHAKESPEARE.

HOPE's departure from London was delayed for a few days by the sudden illness of the Countess of Glenlonely; but Hope could not contrive another visit to her foster-mother, or her beloved, and now affianced Larky Grigg.

Lady Glenlonely required almost constant attendance when she was well; but the slightest indisposition multiplied her requirements almost ad infinitum; and any "companion" less patient, gentle, and loving than Hope would have been roused to irritation or would have sunk into dependency.

Unfortunately, too, for Hope, Lady Glenlonely would not endure Tariatian or even her own daughter Ada near her in the capacity of nurse; and as for a stranger, she was almost delirious at the idea of a Mrs. Gamp or a Betsy Prig approaching her crimson velvet hangings and downy bed.

Lady Glenlonely had, alas! no consideration for others; intense selfishness and pride were the great faults of her character. It never occurred to her that any one could be tired waiting on her. She fancied first one thing, then another. She would have a cup of tea, and, when it was poured out, she would tell Hope to hold it for a moment, she would take it presently; and poor Hope, whom she had kept up all night, would hold it till it was cold, and then she would scold her because it was a cold slop, and she would order broth, or gruel, or something else, and behave in the same way about all. Often, during the long, weary hours so thanklessly requited, Hope thought of Larky, and pictured to herself life with him, as a working man's wife, and felt it would be a much happier lot than to be companion to a fine lady.

"I should not walk in silk attire," she said to herself, "but I am sure my efforts to please, and to comfort, and to benefit Larky would be met with sweet smiles and warm thanks. I might wear a cotton gown, but my heart would beat lightly beneath it. I should have some one to talk with of old times and future prospects. If we read, it would be something worth reading, not the sickly old romances of fifty years ago. Our meals might be very simple, but I fancy a herring and some fried potatoes, or a bit of boiled bacon and some fresh broad beans would be so nice, compared to all the sickly dainties I share with my lady. I begin to loathe boiled chicken, and boiled soles, and boiled sweetbreads, and custard, rice, or batter puddings."

Hope always took her dinner in her lady's dressing-room in times of Lady Glenlonely's illnesses, real or imaginary, and they were of constant recurrence, one or the other; and a bed (a sofa bed) was made up for her in Lady Glenlonely's room, but it was a mere farce, for directly poor Hope had lain down, and, with the readiness for sound sleep peculiar to early youth, floated off to the land of dreams, and love, and Lark, a querulous "Hope! Hope! are you deaf, you unfeeling girl?" or an angry ringing of the hand-bell would rouse the poor companion, who always woke to a scolding and a lecture on the selfishness of youth and the endurance of age. This time Lady Glenlonely's illness was but too real—it was caused by grief, anxiety, and, worse still, remorse.

Nothing was known for certain, but there was every reason to believe that her son, her pride, her Eaglescliffe, who had been taken prisoner in India, had been killed.

"Had I been kinder, and more patient with him," she would say, "he would not have gone into the army at all; he would not then have visited that terrible India. Why did I not let him marry her? Had he married the girl he loved so madly, he would have settled quietly at home. What did it matter? She was a gentlewoman born, a distant cousin of my own; good blood flowed in her veins, and I am sure she loved him. And now he is a prisoner, and it may be by this time murdered by the natives, and she, oh, doubtless, she is dead, for I can find no traces of her. She fled from the boarding-school, to which my cruelty drove her as a teacher, and probably made away with herself."

Then she would toss her arms wildly about, and wring her hands, and groan, and rock herself to and fro, sitting up in her bed; and once Hope, who had dropped asleep while combing out "the loose folds of her amber dropping hair," hearing these groans, went in uncalled for, lamp in hand, in her white wrapper, at midnight; and Lady Glenlonely, seeing her, shrieked out, "'Tis she—'tis she! She is come from the grave to reproach me with breaking her heart—with crossing her love!" And as Hope advanced to comfort her, the poor lady fell back in a swoon.

However, the countess, who was naturally strong, and had she not been a fine lady, would have been a very healthy woman, rallied, and the day for the departure of the whole party for the Highlands was fixed. They were going to stay at a shooting box of Lord Arncliffe's, for he was still very fond of shooting, and as his health was delicate, Ada very anxious, and exercise and recreation being ordered by the faculty, it was decided that the grouse season should be spent at "Burnside."

Hope longed for any change; since the happy evening she had spent at her foster-mother's, she had not for a week breathed any atmosphere but that of the old countess's bedchamber and dressing-room.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

A fond, a trembling, but a deep emotion,
A woman's love with all a saint's devotion.

BRIDE OF SIENA.

It was a great relief to all the family to be able to trust the old countess so entirely to the dutiful and grateful attention of her young companion.

Lord Glenlonely, stronger in body and in mind than he had been when in the prime of his youth, was now a very active and eloquent debater in the House of Lords, where the cause of the people, the welfare of the million, always found a champion and an advocate in him; added to this, he was a popular and effective orator in the great cause of temperance, to which he was himself so very much indebted, through Jem Goodman, whose ardour in that great and good cause time could not abate, and when, with fervid but simple eloquence, Lord Glenlonely told his own tale, and dwelt on the result of temperance in his own case, he converted by hundreds men whom no arguments had been able to reach. Lord Glenlonely's intimacy with Jem Goodman never waned.

Often at temperance meetings the peer and the sweep were on the same platform; and if there was a man in the world for whom Lord Glenlonely felt a degree of respect amounting almost to reverence, it was Jem Goodman.

Of course, with so much to occupy him abroad, Lord Glenlonely could not spend much time at home, or devote himself to his nervous, irritable, and now often melancholic countess. Ada's company had never been very agreeable to her mother. Although there was a strong affection on both sides, there was but little sympathy; and Ada, Countess of Arncliffe, had not only her own lordly homes to regulate, but the deep responsibilities connected with high rank and great wealth. Nevertheless her zeal in the cause of ragged schools and the temperance movement had never abated. Many, who only found an excitement in these works while they had the charm of novelty, had fallen away, but Ada and her husband increased in zeal, to atone for the backsliding and defalcation of others.

Ada's time, therefore, was fully occupied, for she had a beloved husband and co-worker in delicate health, and a darling child to engross whatever time she could devote to home, its duties, and its pleasures. To her (although she delighted to have Hope with her) it was an unspeakable comfort to think her mother had such a nurse, friend, companion, and daughter, all in one; and even Ada did not consider, in her comfort and joy at an arrangement which relieved her of all anxiety, how trying to poor Hope was this constant attendance and confinement.

Ellen St. Ange alone, who dearly loved Hope, remarked to Mrs. Golightly how pale and weary the darling often looked.

Ellen was the same unselfish, thoughtful, pious creature of eight years ago, and as zealous a teacher at the ragged school, and advocate of the temperance movement, as when first we introduced her to the reader.

Mrs. Golightly, who was engaged on a very voluminous work, called "Husbands and Wives; or, the Ruffians of the Ring," agreed mechanically, but her thoughts were far away; and Ellen determined, as much as she could alone, to assist and relieve "poor Hope."

Ellen St. Ange was one of the few people the old countess admitted to her sick room. The tie between them was the deep and constant love which the mother knew Ellen had always cherished, and always would cherish while her gentle heart beat, for the absent Eaglescliffe, the only son.

To Ellen, Lady Glenlonely would talk by the hour of her own, her beautiful, her noble boy, and never found her listener's interest or attention flag. To Ellen, too, she would speak of that poor girl whose only fault was loving him too well, and being too fair in his eyes; and it was a great relief to the old countess to tell Ellen of her misgivings, her repentance, her remorse.

Two or three days before the whole family were to start for the Highlands, Ellen St. Ange called to see the old countess; and finding Hope, who had been much disturbed at night, looking pale and dejected, Ellen proposed to take her place as reader for an hour or two, and give Hope an opportunity to drive out and breathe the balmy air.

Lady Glenlonely gladly agreed: not on Hope's account—she never gave a thought to the feelings or convenience of a dependent—but she was tired of the sentimental old novel, the "Beggars' Girl," that Hope was reading aloud; and she liked the change of a chat with Ellen about Eaglescliffe.

So Hope, determining to drive to Holborn and see her beloved Apple Blossom, gladly hastened away to get ready for the first drive she had had since we saw her at her foster-mother's, on the evening of Apple Blossom's birthday.

Hope had good reason to think, in spite of the many advantages of her position, her elegant dress, and fine-lady life, that she should be happier as the wife of her beloved Lark, even if he were only a working man.

The servants were very jealous of the poor young companion—one who was neither a lady nor a menial—whose position, like that of a governess in a great family, is so painfully indefinite.

Tarlatan, especially, hated, envied, and maligned, as much as she could, the poor, innocent girl. She always spoke of Hope in the servants' hall, and when writing to Pertinette, as "Rag," in allusion to her having been at the ragged school.

When Lady Glenlonely was ill or out of spirits, she could not endure to have Tarlatan near her; and though Tarlatan was very glad to have her nights and her meals undisturbed, yet she was very bitter against poor Hope for being preferred to her; and when, one day, Lady Glenlonely, to atone to Hope for a violent outburst of unprovoked malignity, presented her with a little Geneva watch and chain, and bade her wear it, in order to regulate the time for her medicine and meals, Tarlatan confided to Townley, that to see "that 'Rag'—that twining serpent—that double-faced Janius (meaning Janus) with the very gold watch to her side which it was one she'd always had an eye to as a compliment for her own devoted attention, it completely turned not only her nerve but the very coat of her stomach inside out."

Tarlatan gave the tone to the rest of the servants.

They all took every opportunity of silly wounding, slighting, and insulting the poor companion. But Hope did not like to make mischief, so she bore all quietly, and did not complain, for fear they might lose their places.

The forbearance, which originated in the purest charity, they attributed to cowardice and a wish to conciliate, and they grew worse and worse.

When Ellen St. Ange kindly offered to take Hope's place for an hour or two, Hope ran lightly, almost joyfully, upstairs to a little dressing-room, in which her wardrobe was kept. The adjoining room was Tarlatan's, and Tarlatan and the housekeeper, Mrs. Makepeace, were at tea. A strong smell of ratifia made Hope suppose tea was not the strongest refreshment they were taking.

Not wishing to make them hate her still more by acting the spy on their perhaps rather questionable proceedings, Hope began to dress herself as quickly and as quietly as she could, when presently she heard Tarlatan say in a loud voice to Mrs. Makepeace, who was very deaf—

"Well, thinks it come to a fine pass now, when ragged school chits comes to wear goold watches to their sides, for all the world like the real lady, hat and feathers, and no mistake!"

"Who've got a goold watch?" asked Mrs. Makepeace, with her hand to her ear.

"Why, that 'Rag,' that nobody, that chit of a Hope Evermore, as she's called, though I don't believe she's any more right to that name than to any other. No one knows who her parents were, and I'm sure I can see low life in every line of her face, and every one of her ways—dressing so plain, that's low; drinking water, that's low; never entering into no conversation with the upper servants, though she'll talk by the hour to that poor gal the under housemaid, as my lady took out of sheer charity, if that ain't low, what is? But I tell you, Mrs. Makepeace, I hate the sight of her, and so do Mr. Townley. It's my opinion she's no honest woman's child! I has my own opinion about her pedigree, Mrs. Makepeace, I can tell you that, but a still tongue makes a wise head. Only Miss St. Ange is uncommon fond of her, and she first got Lady Hader to notice her—a word to the wise. What's your opinion, Mrs. Makepeace, about the birth, parentage, and education of this chit that's been taken from a ragged school to be made a lady of, and allowed to give horders to her betters and ring bells for 'em, and ride in carriages, and taught the music and the French? Blood's thicker than water, Mrs. Makepeace. I've my own suspicions, and so has Mr. Townley; which, he says, if this stuck-up companion is come over the left, as he suspects, he don't like to see me lowered to answer her bell; nor do he like to wait on dirt himself; so he thinks as we've long been engaged, and he can get a family hotel on good terms just now, we'd better give warning. It's my opinion my lady's fine companion's no honest woman's child. Sometimes I suspects my lord (who was gay even when first I come here); then there's Miss St. Ange, who looks as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, but cheese wouldn't choke her, for all that copy of her countenance here, she's up-turned thirty; and will you make me believe she's as prim as she looks? Then, sometimes, Mrs. Golightly comes in my head."

"La, Mrs. Tarlatan, what fancies you have to be sure. The girl is raised far above her station, and though it did not matter while Lady Arncliffe had her, 'tain't pleasant now. I dare say the family have some good reason for taking notice of her; and I should think her mother never had no marriage lines to show. But the girl's a good girl; and I'm sure she takes a world of trouble off our hands with my lady, when she gets into the doldrums!"

"Ah! so she may, Mrs. Makepeace; but I won't be rung up or hordered about by a base-born nobody, for all that. I'm an honest woman's child, I am; and before father broke, I was at boarding-school, at Ealing. I won't have a low child from the ragged school set above me. And to see her with all her yellow hair in drop curls, and often two clean white dresses a day! My lady won't have her wear anything but white—a ragged-school chit in white muslin! and her blue ribbons! and now, her watch to her side! A watch I've often been near having myself, and did covet so! No! I'll give warning, and I'll fish out that chit's pedigree and expose her, or my name's not Tarlatan, which it ain't long I mean it to be in any case."

"Well," said Mrs. Makepeace, "take another drop of ratifia; and here's to the bride-elect, and may I hope to dance at her wedding!"

"You'll always be welcome at Townley's Family Hotel, Berkeley-square," said Mrs. Tarlatan, pompously; "but I do hope, Makepeace, you'll help me to find out all about this chit of a 'Rag' that's come here to put my nose out of joint and yours too—a base-born brat it's my belief she is, and not fit company for the like of we. Townley, who's very particular about virtue, says the thoughts of what her mother most likely was makes his blood run cold, and his hair stand on end. But I'll find it out yet; and expose her, too!"

Poor Hope! She had not intended to be an eaves-dropper; but when the malignant conversation we have just recorded met her ear (carried on in a very loud voice by Tarlatan, on account of Mrs. Makepeace's deafness), she had sunk on a chair—pale, speechless, paralysed.

For the first time she felt ashamed of the poverty out of which she had been raised by Ada, and blushed for the mystery that had surrounded her from the cradle.

Now, all the ill-disguised animosity of the servants was explained; now, she fully understood why they envied, hated, and despised her.

It had not been so at Lady Arcliffe's (our Ada's); there every servant was of her choosing, and chosen for being a true Christian in precept and practice; there little Hope had grown up to womanhood, cherished and beloved by every member of the household;—but Lady Glenlonely's servants were all children of Mammon—servants who leagued with unprincipled tradespeople to defraud their employers; "eye-servants," all polish without, but within full of trickery, envy, hatred, and malice.

Hope could not conciliate them—they detested her; and as, poor child! even they could not find a fault in one so meek, so obliging, so industrious, so handy, and so clever, they fell back on her birth, and pretended to despise her for the sin they (in their cruelty and want of charity) attributed to her mother.

Poor Hope! She heard, distinctly heard, every syllable of that bitter outburst of Tarlatan's envy and hate. She could not speak—shame kept her tongue-tied; large drops gushed from her beautiful eyes, and stole over her burning cheeks; and for some minutes after Tarlatan and Makepeace (having finished their carouse) had left the adjoining room, Hope remained, her head bowed on her clasped hands, sobbing as if her little heart would break.

Then she rose, washed away her tears, smoothed her hair, and said to herself—

"Dear Larky Grigg! If he had heard them, he would not talk of my being a lady, and far above him, and of toiling night and day for years to become a gentleman, and worthy of me! If this is true, what am I? But I do not, I will not believe it! I will see my foster-mother Apple Blossom at once. I will ask her to tell me all she knows of my poor mother. She can tell me whether I am indeed a child of sin and shame—if Tarlatan and Mrs. Makepeace have any right to despise me, and if there is any reason why Townley's blood should run cold, and his hair stand on end, when he thinks of my mother."

So saying, Hope stole down stairs (a thick veil concealing her tear-stained face), and, stepping into the carriage, she desired the coachman to drive her to the Green Fields Ragged School, where, in spite of her altered and much improved circumstances, she knew that Apple Blossom still attended the mother's class, still battled with those elements which she had never yet mastered, and still listened to the expostulations and expoundings of that "bookish lady," the champion of her sex, the now celebrated authoress, Deborah Golightly.

SUCCESS.

THE secret of success—what is it? In this country, among people who are equally protected and encouraged, it lies in the steady pursuit of intelligence, industry, temperance, and frugality. There is no royal road to success—the path is oftenest humble. So far as outward comfort and competence constitute wealth, there is but a fraction of society who may not possess it, if each will but turn his or her hand and brain to the vocation for which their instincts and capacities most fit them. If the great fortunes which so dazzle the misjudging poor be analysed, they will be found, in ninety-nine out of the hundred cases, to have sprung and matured from calm, patient, and simple toil—toil which had an endurance and faith behind, and an object and hope before it. So, too, with success in whatever man seeks to accomplish. A clown may stumble upon a splendid discovery in art or science, but a fixed general law provides that high achievement shall require profound and ceaseless labour. The price of success, except in isolate cases, is the devotion of one's life. He is a fool who trusts to any dream for possession or advancement, unless he connects with it the prudent exercise of his own energy and judgment.

The Matron.

NO. XXXV.

To live comfortably on small means, judgment and economy must be shown in dress as well as in board and lodging. In this chapter I mean to give a few hints on dress. I consider the present season favourable for the subject. Preserving, pickling, and collecting and housing the fruits so richly bestowed on us, are occupations suited to summer and autumn, but a prudent housewife recollects that there is something else to attend to now, I mean the preparation of clothes for winter. It is only improvident people who allow cold weather to find them in summer dresses.

Some very valuable directions were given in the earlier chapters of "The Matron" on the subject of making clothes, but these related only to babies' clothes. I think a few words might now be very acceptable on the subject of clothes in general, and of the art of making them. This will introduce needlework.

The evenings are beginning to close in early, and there are quiet hours for occupation after sunset. Wives, mothers, daughters, and sisters may now give much time to the needle. And why should the hours thus employed be dull? Why should not the husbands and brothers, for whose sake the needle is often plied with such indefatigable zeal, enliven the workers by reading aloud to them some interesting and improving book or periodical? or music and needlework might assist each other. The fingers need not be the less active because the ear is regaled with a good song or a merry tune. With the aid of music, the tediousness of needlework occupation will not be lightened but banished.

However, there is one important point to which I must draw the attention of my female readers—it is the necessity of having all working materials at hand before they can sit down comfortably to their work. Money would be very well spent in providing a neat work-box, which should contain a good pair of scissors, needles, and pins in variety, a bodkin, a thimble, thread and cotton, bobbins, marking cotton, and, with a view to dress-making, a knife, a black-lead pencil, and a yard measure, will all be found serviceable.

I dare say many of my readers are excellent needlewomen, but some among them might be glad to have a few hints on this important subject. Whatever is worth doing at all, is worth doing well, and very few things are done well by chance.

I begin with rules about hemming. Mind you turn down the raw edge as evenly as possible. Give particular care to do the corners neatly. Of course, you know that you must hem from right to left. At the end of the hem fasten off the thread securely by sewing several stitches close together. Cut off the thread. Do not break or bite it. In fact, avoid using your teeth even in pointing the thread or cotton. It is a practice that greatly injures the teeth, and causes their premature decay. Besides, if you have thread or cotton of the proper degree of fineness, it is quite unnecessary.

For what is called a mantua-maker's hem, you should lay the raw edge of one of your pieces a little below that of the other; the upper edge is then felled over the other and turned down.

In running I advise you to take a back stitch occasionally, in order to keep the work firm, and mind if you run selvages together, that you keep them even. I recommend you to pin them together all along the seam; by this means you will avoid puckering, a fault of all beginners.

For sewing and felling, of course, you must sew the selva neatly together; and these you had better pin together before you commence working. If you have raw edges, turn down one of the edges once, and the other double the breadth, and then turn half of it back again; this is for the fell. Then (having first pinned the two pieces together) seam them, and let the stitches be only put deep enough firmly to connect the two parts.

Stitching requires skill; and I advise you not to attempt it till you are a tolerable proficient in hemming, running, and sewing. But when you attempt stitching, mind you keep your work very even. Draw a thread to stitch upon, and turn down a piece to stitch to. In stitching, you take two threads back and bring the needle out two stitches before. Go on thus to the end of the collar or wristband on which you are employed. If, during the process of the work, you should have to join your thread or cotton, manage so as to pass the needle between the edges, and bring it out where the last stitch is finished.

And now, lest I should weary my readers with too many directions on one subject, I will turn to another, viz., the choice of materials for outer garments. In prints, never choose any but fast colours. Lilac and buff are fast colours; green and blue are not. Pink patterns sometimes stand the test of repeated washing; but, unless warranted, they are not to be trusted. For those who can afford to buy silk, this hint may be useful. Never buy a black silk of which the narrow edge is black; for, unless it has been re-dyed, this narrow edge is always white.

A great deal remains to be said on the subject of clothing and needlework; but I have said enough for the present, and I shall conclude this chapter by advising my readers never to be tempted by "Wonderful bargains," "Articles selling off below cost price," "At an overwhelming sacrifice." The old saying will always be a true saying, that nothing is a bargain that we do not want; and in the way of female attire, materials cannot be called cheap, unless they will turn or wash.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. V.

A HERMITAGE had never an attraction for me at any period of my life. Had one been given me, such as I have seen so called, in different parts of the country, never intended indeed to be occupied by some tall, thin, venerable personage,

"The moss his bed; his drink the crystal well;"

but a well provided domicile for the mind as well as the body, rising amidst shrubs, and flowers, and trees, with a river just by, "wandering at its own sweet will,"—even then I should have exclaimed:—

"Give me a friend, in this my snug retreat.

At least to say to,—'Solitude is sweet.'"

Accordingly when Wilton was gone, I felt a loneliness of which I was not conscious before he arrived, and heartily did I rejoice when I found he would return during my stay at the sea-side; thus not only gratifying me by his society, but enlightening me by his varied information.

"What a number of limpets there are," he exclaimed, as we walked along, "clinging to these masses of rock; each one lodged in its house consisting of a single valve, so nearly round and conical; and as the Romans used in their sacrifices a small deep dish, called patella, they gave the same name, from the resemblance between them, to this little creature."

"It has required some little effort," said I, "to remove this one from its rocky bed; the pressure of the atmosphere acting upon it, doubtless, as it does on the school-boy's suckers, the goodness of which he is inclined to estimate by the weight of the stone it will carry. Has anything remarkable been discovered in the structure of so simple a creature?"

"Yes! its tongue is a curious and beautiful piece of mechanism. It is flat, between two and three inches long, and having the extremity shaped something like a spoon. Throughout its extent it resembles a rasp, with hooked teeth, four in each row. And, still more strange to tell, there is a space between each row, and at each side of this space is a tripod tooth—a tooth, rounded at the back, and with three points in the lower part—and placed rather obliquely on the tongue. This tongue, when in action, tears the creature's food, as sea-weed, in pieces, and, when at rest, it is retracted into the stomach. At other times the limpet feeds on the microscopic creatures so abundant in sea waters."

"I thank you for that fact. Is that a singular case?"

"By no means: however humble the rank of the creature, it has, somewhere or other, an apparatus for the proper reduction of its food to the state best adapted for its change into nutriment. Punch, some few months ago, showed us an engraving of a 'used-up' man, who had discovered a new sensation; you remember it, perhaps?"

"Yes; the sensation was that of riding on an omnibus, with the driver, from Bayswater to White-chapel, and picking periwinkles with a pin."

"Just so. Of course, the soul of such a creature must be about as large as would fill the hole made by a maggot in a nut; and as to his ideas, I suppose they might all be transferred to the brain of the grub, without the slightest disturbance to its own. But you will think it worth while to know that the tongue of the periwinkle is armed with a beautiful series of flinty teeth, which I have seen; while that little circular piece which the pin removed, was an admirably constructed door, to defend the creature's house from the entrance, at pleasure, of its marine enemies."

"You intimated just now that the apparatus for the reduction of food might be found in different places; where may we detect it besides in the tongue?"

"Where, most certainly, as a mere matter of imagination, we should never think of its existing. I have just referred to the limpet sometimes feeding, in common with all the tenants of the waters, on animalcules; and some of these have a gullet which leads to a gizzard, or perforating receptacle, in which, by means of curious mechanism, the food is either ground to pulp or cut into fragments. This apparatus is described as consisting of three teeth, which, by the action of the gizzard, and of certain muscles, work vigorously on each other, and so mince to pieces whatever is subjected to their operation. Each of these teeth is composed of two portions; namely, a basal part, fixed to the walls of the gizzard, and serving for the attachment of muscular fibres, and a free, movable portion, which may be regarded as the real tooth, while the other serves as a jaw. These three portions work with their inner edge upon the facets of the central piece, and this edge is ragged, or serrated, the better to tear the substances on which it acts. The hardness of these teeth is not a little surprising; they may be detached from the body of the animalcule in a perfect condition, and be submitted by themselves to examination beneath a microscope; they vary in form and size in every species, but their essential characters appear to be the same in all."

"Is it possible? and such an apparatus has actually been found in creatures far too minute to be observed by the naked eye!"

"It has; in beings absolutely microscopic. You are then prepared for a similar wonder in a higher race of animals, if such a distinction may be made. The genus of molluscs, called Bulla, takes its name from a bubble, which the creature greatly resembles. These molluscs are often larger than their shells, so that they cannot wholly retire into them; in many, indeed, the shell is so surrounded and enveloped in the body of the animal, that no part is visible. Now each one has a gizzard to masticate and digest its food, composed of two plates, which have a roughness and prominence in their centre, put in motion by a cartilaginous ligament, so that they may grind, like millstones, whatever is submitted to their action. The use of this organ has been fully proved on dissection, small shells having been found in it, and others reduced to powder."

"That, certainly, is decisive. How much are we indebted to the intelligent, patient, and persevering labours of men who have given years to the study of such creatures, and have then placed in our hands the sickle to reap their harvest of knowledge!"

"I most fully sympathise with you," said Wilton; "to the naturalists who have placed before me the facts with which I am conversant, I owe an obligation I can never discharge; and heartily do I wish that their claims were more generally and justly appreciated. It takes a very long time to add a single new fact to the storehouse of human knowledge. A pupil of one of our most eminent men thought he had suddenly discovered one, and hastened to his master with the joyful tidings of what he had just beheld. 'You are sure you saw it exactly as you have now described it to be?' was the question of the man of science. 'Oh, yes,' was the immediate and emphatic reply. 'Then go,' was the rejoinder, 'and watch that object once a day for three months, and if at the end of that time, it should appear precisely as it does to you now, come and tell me.' But, alas! a much shorter time sufficed to show that the eyes had been deceived. Réaumur, the French naturalist, gave twenty years to the observation of the wasp; and other instances might be mentioned of the examination of creatures which, in indefatigable and successful attention, rivalled even his."

Thus had Wilton and I conversed, or rather—for the knowledge had an Irish reciprocity, being all on one side—thus had he replied to my queries as we had sat on two opposite masses of rock, in the neighbourhood of others, about which so many limpets were clustering. "Are these creatures," said I, as he was rising to walk onward, "as numerous in other places?"

"No mollusc," he replied, "is more common than this, which is usually of an olive or yellowish colour, but never white. Only let a sea-wall be reared, over which the waters dash at high tide, and troops of limpets will arrive and take possession of it; and well is it that they may be numbered by millions. They are eaten by birds, and much relished by domestic fowls, while, like many other molluscs, they are of great value to the fishermen as bait. Dr. Johnston, of Berwick, reckons that no fewer than 11,888,000 limpets are employed annually for this purpose, and in consequence of this constant demand, the limpets of his neighbourhood are so diminished in number that it is a very tedious task to collect them. Nor is this all: limpets are eaten by the poor in our sea-coast towns; in the north of Ireland they are a common article of food, and the gatherers at Larne, in Antrim, thirty in number, are stated to have earned in one season of four months, no less than £100 sterling in collecting them; while of the extent to which they are consumed by the people of far distant lands we are utterly unable to form any idea."

"Is there only one species of limpet?" I asked.

"No," replied Wilton. "In the long leaf of the tangle—well known to sea-weed gatherers as being clear and thin, of dark olive, and rayed with brilliant blue—will be found the pellucid limpet, which lives on this plant. The foolscap limpet, shaped like a little cap of liberty, is found on most of our shores, but in great numbers on some parts of our southern coast. A more agreeable name for it is 'the Torbay bonnet.' Some limpets have an oblong aperture on their summits, shaped like a key-hole; hence they are denominated key-hole limpets. Another kind is the netted key-hole limpet, which is sometimes of a white, creamy colour, but at others of a rich orange, approaching to scarlet. The Berwick fishermen style another species the yard; it is known among us as the horse limpet."

We had now resumed our walk along the coast, when Wilton exclaimed, "I will do what I saw the Bishop of Oxford do the other day, as he was walking with another bishop on the sands at Rhyl. As soon as his eye detected a shell more than usually curious in form or beauty, he—all honour to his taste for natural history—picked it up and put it in one of his episcopal pockets. Here is one for mine—or it shall be for yours, if you wish it. See, my friend! Its name is taken from the Latin word for trumpet; and, perhaps, shells of this kind suggested the first idea of that musical instrument; for, if the apex be pierced or broken off, a variety of sounds may be produced by blowing into it. Triton, the fabled trumpeter of Neptune, is represented with a large species of these shells in his hand when he is supposed to be summoning the river gods to attend their monarch. This kind of trumpet is sometimes used by the Italian herdsmen to direct the movements of their cattle; and I have heard its deep and hollow sounds, when rambling in North Wales, breaking on the silence of those Alpine districts, when used by the farmers in calling to their labourers. Shells of a similar kind are also applied to pastoral purposes in Muscovy and Lithuania; and no sooner does the morning sun brighten the hill and then the valley, than the long-sounding, shelly trumpet of the herdsman awakens the echoes, and sheep, horses, mules, and goats alike attend with promptitude to the well-known summons. Then the shepherd heads his flock, and, proceeding to the best pasture land, guides them on their way. Another signal is given when he would direct them to some refreshing stream; and a third announces that they are to return homeward."

"The smaller race, like the one you have just picked up," said I, "must have a very different fate."

"True," replied Wilton; "this one is called by fishermen whelk-tingle, or sting-winkle; its usual name is the common whelk. This creature is useful for baits, and is also much eaten, but only by those who cannot obtain more agreeable food; for this is hard and tough, and without any niceness of flavour. The attention of those who have traversed the sea-shore has often been attracted to a strange-looking object; it consists of a number of firmly membranous little bladders, each about a quarter of an inch in breadth, flat on the inside and convex without, adhering together in regular order by their expanded margin, the whole forming a body which looks like a wasp's nest."

"Exactly," said I; "and often have I wondered what they could be; I am glad you are about now to solve this enigma."

"In early spring, as in March or April, you will find these membranous sacs on the beach: sometimes of the size of an orange, and at others as if two or three oranges were clinging together. Ask a sailor what they are, and he will answer, perhaps, 'bladder-chain,' and 'fisherman's soap.' Both names are appropriate: for the balls look as if chains of yellow bladders were wound round and round; and they are used by people about the coast for washing their hands; not from their possessing any detergent property, but because their rough surface acts like a coarse towel would in freeing the hands from adhesive substances. But the naturalist can tell that each of these little sacs, which a month or two later is empty and pierced with a hole, contains, in its earliest stage, a soft yolk, in which is gradually formed a young univalve mollusc, whose shell begins to take its proper shape before he emerges from the membranous egg. These masses of bubbles are, indeed, the eggs of the large whelk, which inhabits deeper water beyond the recess of the tide, where it attaches them to rocks and stones, from which they frequently become loosened and are cast up in rough weather, as are often the whelks themselves, whose dead shells are so commonly found—as this one we have just picked up was—on the sea-shore. The eggs of a common species, having a coarse, white shell, sometimes banded with brown and yellow, are frequently seen attached to small stones on the sides of rocky hollows. These are not like bubbles combined; but are, in fact, little oblong urns, each one raised on a short stalk fixed to a circular expanded base, and pierced by a hole. They generally occur in groups of ten, twenty, or more, together."

"I confess, Wilton, that hereafter instead of merely turning over these masses with my stick, as I have often done when I have met with them, I shall feel no little curiosity to examine them, and to mark that variety of form which I now find even the eggs of molluscs present to the eye."

"It will yet be long, my friend, before the wonders of the whelk family are exhausted. A very common creature, having yellow zones around it, and called the stone or dog-whelk, awakens in the mind no little interest. It is, in fact, one of the whelks which supplied the valuable Tyrian dye, referred to in the sacred Scriptures, as well as in the uninspired history of ancient times. The other mollusc from which this costly dye is procured, was the truncated Murex, or rock-shell. You are familiar with such a phrase, as 'the royal,' or 'the imperial purple;' you have seen, too, parchments and vellums, on the writing and illuminating of which many of the monks of former days spent long years, enriching their margins and capital letters with devices on a deep blue ground; yet these, and various other decorations are all owing to some little creatures taken from the waters of the mighty deep; and it may be springing from 'the bladder chains,' which have often been passed by, as unworthy of a glance."

"Is the blue colour of which we read in the Scriptures considered to have the same origin?"

"No; while the purple is traced to the creatures already mentioned, the blue is supposed to have been derived from another mollusc, which sometimes arises in considerable numbers, and is therefore frequently caught in our British seas. This is the common Ianthina; it looks as if cut out of thin, purplish porcelain, and has somewhat the figure of a snail. It is not only slightly tinged with blue, but it emits a blue fluid. The fishermen's wives call it, strangely enough, the 'bull-horn.' It is, however, endowed with no little beauty. Fragile as its bark appears, it sails securely in the deepest seas; and when the bosom of the ocean is unrippled, it floats along with its foot upwards, upheld by a little organ which resembles a bubble of foam. It will allow itself to be blown hither and thither by the zephyr-like breath of a summer's day; but only let the wind put forth a little more power, and the gentle Ianthina, shrinking from every struggle with the rising waters, finds safety and repose for its tiny head within the limits of its shell, and, though it has no sail to strike, takes in also its bubble-like float, and sinks to the bottom of the sea. And well it may:

"The water is calm and still below,
For the winds and waves are absent there;
And the sands are as bright as the stars that glow
In the motionless fields of upper air."

THE BIG TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

AMONG the many remarkable natural curiosities of California, not the least is that solitary group of gigantic pines known as the "Big Trees of Calaveras County." Many of our readers may have seen the sections of bark taken from one of the group, which are exhibited in the Crystal Palace, and which excite the wonder of all beholders, and the doubts of many, who cannot persuade themselves that so monstrous a mass could ever have grown upon a single tree.

The group in Calaveras County are solitary specimens of their race. There are no others of their kind or size on the known globe. It is a singular fact that the group, consisting of ninety-two trees, is contained in a valley only one hundred and sixty acres in extent. Beyond the limits of this little amphitheatre the pines and cedars of the country shrink into the Lilliputian dimensions of the common New England pine—say a hundred and fifty feet, or thereabout. They are situated in Calaveras County, about two hundred and forty miles from San Francisco, but may be reached in a couple of days by railroad and stage-coach.

A few hunters, in 1850, were pushing their way into the then unexplored forest, when one of them, who was in advance, broke into this space, and the giants were then first seen by white men. Their colossal proportions, and the impressive silence of the surrounding woods, created a feeling of awe among the hunters; and after walking around the great trunks, and gazing reverentially up at their grand proportions, they returned to the nearest settlements and gave an account of what they had seen. Their statements, however, were considered fabulous until confirmed by actual measurement. The trees have been appropriately named the Washingtonia Gigantea, though some of the savans of San Francisco have endeavoured to have the Washingtonia changed to Wellingtonia, because some patriotic botanist, availing himself of this discovery by American frontiersmen, hastened to appropriate the name for our own hero. The basin or valley in which they stand is very damp, and retains here and there pools of water. Some of the largest trees extend their roots directly into the stagnant water, or into the brooks. Arriving at "Murphy's Diggings" by one of the daily lines of stages, either from Sacramento or Stockton, or by the Sonora coach, you are within fifteen miles of the celebrated grove; and from here it is a pretty ride to the "Mammoth Tree Hotel." This has been erected within a year or two to accommodate the many visitors; for the "big trees" have now become objects of general interest.

Adjoining the hotel, with which it is connected by a floor, stands the stump of the "Big Tree," which was cut down three years since. It measures ninety-six feet in circumference. Its surface is smooth, and offers ample space for thirty-two persons to dance, showing seventy-five feet of circumference of solid timber. Theatrical performances were given upon it by the Chapman family and Robinson family in May, 1855. This monster was cut down by boring with long and powerful augers, and sawing the spaces between—an achievement of Vandalism as ingenious as the Chinese refinement in cruelty of pulling out the nails of criminals with pincers. It required the labour of five men twenty-five days to effect its fall, the tree standing so nearly perpendicular that the aid of wedges and a battering-ram was necessary to complete the desecration. But even then the immense mass resisted all efforts to overthrow it, until in the dead of a tempestuous night it began to groan and sway in the storm like an expiring giant, and it succumbed at last to the elements, which alone could complete from above what the human ants had commenced below. Its fall was like the shock of an earthquake, and was heard fifteen miles away—at "Murphy's Diggings." There fell in this great trunk some thousands of cords of wood, and it buried itself twelve feet deep in the mire that bordered the little creek hard by. Not far from where it struck stand two colossal members of this family, called the "Guardsmen;" the mud splashed nearly a hundred feet high upon their trunks. As it lay on the ground, it measured three hundred and two feet clear of the stump and broken top-work. Large trees had been snapped asunder like pipe-stems, and the woods around were splintered and crushed to the earth. On its levelled surface are now situated the bar-room and two bowling-alleys of the hotel, the latter running parallel a distance of eighty-one feet.

One of the most interesting of the group is that called the "Mother of the Forest." It is now the loftiest of the grove, rising to the height of three hundred and twenty-seven feet, straight and beautifully proportioned, and at this moment the largest living tree in the world. It is ninety feet in circumference. Into this trunk could be cut an apartment as large as a common-sized parlour, and as high as the architect chose to make it, without endangering the tree or injuring its outward appearance.

A scaffolding was built around this tree for the purpose of stripping off its bark for exhibition abroad. This was accomplished in 1854, for a distance of something over one hundred feet from the ground, and was effected with as much neatness and industry as a troop of jackals would display in cleaning the bones of a dead lion. Such was its vitality, that, although completely girdled and deprived of its means of sustenance, it annually put forth green leaves until the past year, when its blanched and withered limbs showed that nature was exhausted.

But the dimensions of the whole group pale before those of the prostrate giant known as the FATHER OF THE FOREST. This monster has long since bowed his head in the dust; but how stupendous in his ruin! The tree measures one hundred and twelve feet in circumference at the base, and forty-two feet in circumference at a distance of three hundred feet from the roots, at which point it was broken short off in its fall. The upper portion, beyond this break, is greatly decayed; but, judging from the average size of the others, this tree must have towered to the prodigious height of at least four hundred and fifty feet! A chamber or burned cavity extends through the trunk two hundred feet, broad and high enough for a person to ride on horseback through; and a pond deep enough to float a common river steamboat stands in this great excavation during the rainy season. Walking on the trunk, and looking from its uprooted base, the mind can scarce conceive its astonishing dimensions. Language fails to give an adequate idea of it. It was, when standing, a pillar of timber that overtopped all other trees on the globe. "To read simply of a tree four hundred and fifty feet high," observes a contemporary, "we are struck with large figures; but we can hardly appreciate the height without some comparison. Such a one as this would stretch across a field of twenty-seven rods wide. If standing in the Niagara chasm at Suspension Bridge, it would tower two hundred feet above the top of the bridge, and would be ninety feet above the top of the cross of St. Paul's, and two hundred and thirty-eight feet above the Monument. If cut up for fuel, it would make at least three thousand cords, or as much as would be yielded by sixty acres of good wood-land. If sawed into two-inch boards, it would yield about three million feet, and furnish enough three-inch plank for thirty miles of plank road. This will do for the product of one little seed, less in size than a grain of wheat."

These trees are not the California red-wood, as has been affirmed of them. They are a species of cedar peculiar to the western slopes of the Sierra Nevada. The growth, bark, and leaf are different from those of any other tree. Botanists class them, and probably correctly, among the Taxodiums. Visitors will doubtless continue to rechristen them after this or that national celebrity. All who write or speak of them should avoid being thus led, and perpetuate the appropriate name given them shortly after their discovery—the WASHINGTONIA GIGANTEA.

A LOVE SONG.

This is the birthday of my love,
Then vanish care and sorrow;
To-day shall mirth and pleasure reign
Though grief should come to-morrow.
My love draws near with airy tread,
And glances shy and sweet;
Sing, little bird! above her head;
Bloom, flowers! beneath her feet.
The happy earth is once a year
Drest out in Spring's array;
But, when my lady walks abroad,
With me 'tis ever May.

Chemical Experiments.

We will amuse ourselves this day with examining some cases of crystallisation. In ordinary language the term crystal is applied to objects which have natural angular facets, and which are moreover transparent. The saying "as clear as crystal," is probably familiar to most persons. Be it understood, then, that, according to the chemist, transparency has nothing whatever to do with the existence of a crystal. Some are transparent, others are not; mere angular form naturally occurring is, in the chemist's estimation, the sole necessary distinctive character of a crystal.

Whenever the particles of which bodies are composed have an opportunity of coming together, and arranging themselves slowly and tranquilly, they arrange themselves in crystals. Though only certain solids arrange themselves in crystalline fashion apparently to our senses, yet crystals far more frequently exist than we are apt to imagine, and though seemingly absent, may be rendered apparent by proper treatment. An irregular lump of alum may be shown to be built up of crystals, by the following simple treatment. Immerse it in water (cold), and, letting it remain thus immersed, watch it well. The alum will begin to dissolve, but the solution will not go on irregularly as you might at first imagine; the water will fret its way here and there, with seeming irregularity; nevertheless, if the alum be examined from time to time, it will be found "dissected out," so to speak, into separate crystalline forms.

In like manner, an iron bar or piece of iron wire may be demonstrated to contain crystals. Few things present a less crystalline appearance than iron wire, yet, if a piece be immersed in weak acid, such, for example, as aqua fortis, largely diluted with water, like alum in our preceding experiment, the metal will be eaten away, and a crystalline structure rendered apparent.

The presence of these crystals in wrought iron is often a matter of serious importance. Necessarily in proportion to the amount of crystallisation, other things being equal, will be the tenacity and general strength of the iron. Crystallisation is unfavourable to the strength of railway axles, of anchors, and, in short, of all wrought iron weldings. Moreover, unfortunately, wrought iron, not very crystalline when first forged, acquires that condition in time, owing to various causes, rendering forged pieces of the metal weaker than when their strength was first calculated by the engineer.

Nevertheless, compared with many other metals, iron is not very crystalline. Bismuth is pre-eminent in this respect; and the experiment which I shall presently describe has for its object the production of exquisitely beautiful crystals of the metal bismuth. Procure an iron ladle, if it be somewhat deep all the better. Having made it hot, throw in so much bismuth that the metal on fusion shall rise to the level of the rim of the ladle, or thereabouts. After complete fusion, remove the ladle from the fire, and wait a few seconds until a crust forms on the surface. So soon as this is observed, pierce a hole through the crust with a sharpened iron rod, and through the hole drain all the metal bismuth still remaining unsolidified. The ladle and its contents having been allowed to become thoroughly cold, the upper crust of solidified metal is to be removed, when beautiful crystals will be made apparent. This experiment shows that during the solidification of bismuth, the change from a fluid to a solid state does not ensue by means of successive crusts, but by the formation of successive crystals.

If, instead of bismuth, sulphur be taken and similarly treated, crystals will, in like manner, be developed.

The next experiment I shall describe will involve the formation of crystals in a different manner, namely, by the condensation of a vapour. Procuring a bit of camphor, place it in a large bottle, and, corking the bottle, set it in a window, so that the light may shine on one side; waiting now a few days, beautiful crystals of camphor will be perceived to have been deposited on one side of the bottle.

The most usual method, however, of forming crystals is by driving off fluid from a solution—in other words, by evaporation. There is much difference in the relative facility with which different bodies crystallise, thus treated; but by far the greater number of bodies admit of being crystallised when properly handled by the chemist. To illustrate evaporative crystallisation, we cannot do better than employ sugar. Taking a piece of white lump sugar, therefore, dissolve it in about three times its own weight of boiling water, put the solution into a cup or basin, immerse a few threads into it, and, placing the whole in a warm place, there allow it to remain, so that the water may evaporate, and cause the solution to become stronger and stronger. If the operation be carefully performed, the sugar will deposit in large crystals upon the strings; otherwise stated, common lump sugar will, by the method described, be converted into sugar-candy. Our process is, indeed, the exact process by which sugar-candy is prepared in practice.

Supposing the operation just described not to have been very successful, and that large crystals are required, they may be "nursed" into bigger dimensions by the following treatment:—Prepare a solution of sugar much stronger than that just described; in other words, boiling water being taken, continually stir in powdered lump-sugar until no more is dissolved. The solution thus made, immerse the little crystals, strings and all, and, repeating the other conditions of last experiment, the crystals will be found to increase still further in size.

Small Change.

We are told that, in Birmingham, the common bats fly only at twilight. Brick-bats, however, fly at all hours.

Nothing is so difficult as the apparent ease of a clear and glowing style. Those graces, which, from their presumed facility, encourage all to attempt an imitation of them, are usually the most inimitable.

A POINT IN PRIVATE FINANCE.—Two sixpences are preferable to a shilling. A cabman never has any change; and the dignity which a largeness of the smaller coin would maintain, would be incompatible with a donation to the amount of that sum, effected by giving twice as much, and receiving half of it back again.

TENNYSON describes a lover as clinging to the lips of his mistress in a passionate kiss, till he draws her whole soul through them. Those who make a mistress of the bottle often cling to her mouth till they draw her whole spirit through them.

VOLTAIRE says that the reputation of Dante will continually be growing greater and greater, because there is nobody now that reads him. This sentiment must be a source of great consolation to many of our modern poets, who have already lived to see themselves arrive at this point of greatness.

INDISPUTABLE.—A lady's will.

To make a pretty girl's cheeks red, pay her a sweet compliment. To redder those of an impudent man, slap them.

A POWER above all human responsibility ought to be above all human attainment. He that is unwilling may do harm, but he that is unable can't.

A LADY'S MAN.

The talk aforesaid, nicknamed "smat";
Seldom embarrassed, never slow,
His maxim always "Touch and go"—
From grave to gay he ran with ease,
Secure alike in both to please.

A PHENOMENON.—A governess advertising for a situation says she is a perfect mistress of her own tongue!

BETTING AMONG BIRDS.—A considerable number of Hens this year laid eggs on the Derby Day. Not a few Chickens also came in for the Plate.

THERE is only one love, but there are a hundred imitations.—De La Rochefoucauld.

FRIED SOLES.—Take a chair opposite a blazing fire, place your feet on the top bar; or perhaps a quicker method is to place them across all the bars together; in a few minutes your soles will be done thoroughly. N.B. (H)ocks may be cooked in like manner.

DINNER is now a meal taken at supper-time. Formerly it was considered a means of enjoying society, and therefore was moderate in expense and frequent in occurrence; now it is given to display yourself, not to gratify your friends, and is inhospitably rare because foolishly extravagant.

A PRODIGAL starts with twenty thousand pounds, and dies with nothing. A miser starts with nothing, and dies worth twenty thousand. Which has the best of it? We should almost say the prodigal: he has spent a fortune—the miser has only left one; he has lived rich to die poor; the miser has lived poor to die rich; and, if the prodigal quits life in debt to others, the miser quits it still deeper in debt to himself.

"PAY your score," said a publican to a customer who was running up an account for ale. "Wait till I've had a score, first; that last mug made only ten."

A CONTEMPORARY says that a dealer in his town advertises "iron slates" for sale. He suggests that they should be framed with pine oak.

And wins, play as Black may.

(a) This ingenious variation (which we owe to Mr. M'Donnell), if not correctly met gives to the first player a most overpowering attack.—(b) The usual move is Q to K R 3.—(c) K Kt to B 3 is perhaps better. The move adopted, however, by White, permits of a most rapid development of his forces, and gives him an attack that would be considered by most players an equivalent for the pieces sacrificed.—(d) His best reply. If he had taken the B he would obviously have lost his Q; and had he retired the K to Q sq, White might have won a piece by Q to Q R 3.—(e) It is difficult to decide what is Black's best move at this juncture. B takes Q P seems bad, as White would have replied with K Kt to K 2, threatening B takes K Kt next move, if Black left the B at Q 5 or supported him with Q Kt, in either case winning a piece.—(f) Better than checking at B 7 at once, as it drives the Black Q from her present position and tempts Black to advance his Q B, whereby White is enabled to bring his Q round to the K side.

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

IN order that no difficulty might attend the procuring of the back numbers of our New Series, we have kept them continually in print, without extra charge. As these reprints, however, are attended with so much additional cost as to entail considerable loss, we propose, as soon as Mr. J. F. Smith's exciting tale of "Smiles and Tears" is completed, to discontinue the issue of the back numbers of Vol. I. New Series, which will be then only to be had completely bound in the volume. Our readers are therefore requested to order any numbers they may require as soon as possible. Any back number of the New Series may now be had at one penny, and any number of the Old Series at three halfpence, as heretofore; and should any difficulty arise in procuring them from a bookseller, postage stamps can be forwarded to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, La Belle Sauvage Yard.

OTTO.—We have already given a description of Cherbourg. You will see it in a recent number. The details of her Majesty's visit to the great French naval arsenal would exceed our limits; suffice it to say, that our gracious Queen was most enthusiastically received at Cherbourg. It was on the evening of the 4th ultimo that the august visitors reached their destination. The escorting squadron met the royal yacht five miles from Cherbourg, and entered the harbour in two lines, the royal yacht leading the centre. Her Majesty was received by a general salute from nine line-of-battle ships, a heavy frigate ranged in-shore, within the breakwater, and from all the batteries. This was returned by the English ships, and the roar of 2,000 pieces of cannon produced a most striking effect. The royal yacht anchored within the French line of battle, surrounded by the escort, at half-past eight in the evening. The Emperor Napoleon and the Empress came on board, under a general salute. This much talked-of visit to Cherbourg did not exceed forty hours in length, but it is supposed it will exercise a powerful and permanent influence on the state of politics. At any rate, we must hope and pray that it may have the effect of consolidating the English and French alliance. Should this desirable object have been achieved by the Queen's visit to Cherbourg, we may feel confident of the lasting peace of Europe.

W. ELTON.—You are mistaken in supposing that sportsmen have to wait for the 1st of September for grouse-shooting. According to the game laws, grouse-shooting begins in August. The grouse, like the cuckoo and the swallow, only passes part of the year in this country. This migration of birds is a very curious subject; but some light has been thrown upon it by the indefatigable labour of naturalists. At a degree per hour, swallows can pass from England into Africa in twenty hours. The males in general precede the females. Migrating birds go in a direct line from north to south, and never deviate in their course from east to west. Birds of passage, which pass to very distant climes and regions, return to the same localities, and often occupy the same nests, though absent for many months, at three thousand miles distant. Their migration can, of course, only be the result of instinct. The flight of migratory birds to and fro is often witnessed in the Mediterranean. Some fly a hundred and twenty miles an hour, and start when the wind is fair. The greatest deviation in the time of the arrival of these birds is a fortnight; and in the time of their departure four weeks.

L. M. N.—It was on Friday, the 5th ultimo, that the following glorious news reached us:—"Electric communication is maintained perfectly between the Old and New World." On our side the end of the cable was safely landed on Thursday the 4th ultimo. The reception in Ireland of a preconcerted signal gave the first intimation of a success, the effect of which will powerfully influence the destinies of the whole human race. Of course, in the first instance, the sending of a regular message was impossible, for the transmitting apparatus had not been fitted up at each end. However, the alternate currents were in wholesome play. It may be interesting to our readers to hear that it is twelve months since the Earl of Carlisle, as Viceroy of Ireland, hauled the Irish end of the cable on shore at Valentia, aided by Lieutenant Whiting of the Niagara, and a number of the crews of the British and American men-of-war. Since that period disaster after disaster has shaken the confidence of some in the possibility of the scheme; but the directors, nothing daunted, persevered with national courage and determination. It is a remarkable fact that on the anniversary of the day when the first effort was made, this triumph was achieved—a triumph which, opening up a new era of progress to both hemispheres, was hailed, when not a day old, by England and America as the greatest scientific and practical achievement of our age.

MARY.—Perhaps you are unaware of the antiquity of the superstition which has so much offended you in ignorant people. Drayton, quoting from Pliny (who lived in the first century), says:—

"The greedy raven that doth call for death."

It is proverbially the harsh dreariness of the raven's croak that has made the imaginative consider it a prognostic of death. Warrington, speaking of the raven, thus expresses himself:—

"Ill-omened bird! as legends say,
Who hast the wondrous power to know
When health fills high the throbbing veins—
The fated hour when blood must flow."

MIGNONETTE.—"Mignonette" states that she is a young milliner, and that she has often had occasion to go to a certain draper's for small purchases connected with her business. She was generally served by a very handsome young man who took the opportunity of paying her very pretty compliments and of looking unutterable things. "Mignonette" made sure that the enamoured swain would soon find means to cultivate her acquaintance, and to make her an honourable proposal. She had entertained serious thoughts of giving up her business, when a young friend called on her and said she had something private and confidential to communicate. What should the secret be, but that she had received an offer of marriage from our correspondent's beloved. "Mignonette" cannot describe the shock she has sustained from the discovery of the inconstancy of the man she almost looked upon as her future husband. She asks us what she is to do. In the first place let her dismiss the gay young shopman from her thoughts as speedily as possible, and determine never to believe any man seriously in love with her till he has proposed marriage; and in the meantime return with renewed energy to her business as milliner.

EGG.—A Panorama is a picture in which all the objects of nature that are visible from a single point are represented on the interior surface of a cylindrical wall, the point of view being in the axis of the cylinder. When a painting of this kind is well executed, its truth is such as to produce a complete illusion. A Diorama produces a far greater degree of optical illusion than the panorama, arising, chiefly, from the contrivance employed in exhibiting the painting, which is viewed through a large opening, partly by reflected and partly by transmitted light, and light and shade are produced by coloured screens or blinds.

PROPRIETY, HOPE EVERMORE, LILLIAN, AND A CORRESPONDENT.—Under the circumstances it would have been contrary to the laws of etiquette to conduct the gentleman to the door.—In spite of the inclination you feel to make the "amende honorable," it is now the only step that gives you a chance of recovering the affections and good opinion of your lover.—We must know if you are deserving of affection before we can feel disposed to assist you to gain it.—After sending a present and receiving the thanks of the lady who has received it, another communication on the subject would be superfluous.

Y. LOYD.—Ducks are still in season, but the flesh of these birds is most delicate just at the time when the peas are green and young. There must be a great many people who consider a roast duck a very good thing, for in Aylesbury alone the sale of ducks realises £15,000 a year; but a chicken, on account of its being remarkably easy of digestion, furnishes more digestible food than a duck. The consumption of poultry in England is greater than is generally supposed. In Kent and Surrey £300,000 is received annually for poultry. It is a strange fact, but one that has been proved, that a hen is more profitable than a ewe.

A DISGUSTED APPRENTICE.—If, as you state, the hours during which your attendance would be required were fixed at the commencement of your apprenticeship, you cannot be compelled, legally, to attend beyond those hours; but it would be better for you to have a clear explanation with the firm, than to indulge in "disgust" at their conduct in requiring from you any extra service.

EXCELSIOR.—You must obtain a marriage license from the Superintendent Registrar of the district, for celebration in any parish or registered church, chapel, or place of worship within or near to his district, or at his office, on a certificate by him that one clear day's notice has been given, and no objections entered. Such license will be granted on deposition of fifteen days' residence of one of the parties in the district, that both are of age, no impediment to marriage, &c., or that if both, or either, is a minor, under twenty-one, the proper guardian has given consent. The cost is about £2 10s. Marriage may be celebrated one day after the date of the notice or license.

W. H. B. C.—The first volume of "Cassell's Illustrated History of England" will be sent from our office, by post, on the receipt of 7s.—Rome was founded by Romulus, B.C. 753. He is said to have died, after a reign of thirty-seven years, B.C. 716; but we have no account of the time and place of his birth except what is legendary and uncertain.

TODDY BANKS.—To render quills hard and transparent, suspend them in a copper over water sufficiently high to touch the nibs; then close it steam tight, and apply four hours' hard boiling; next withdraw and dry them, and in twenty-four hours cut the end of the nibs, and draw out the tip; lastly, rub them with a piece of cloth, and expose them to a moderate heat in an oven or stove. The best tooth-powder is charcoal newly burnt and finely powdered; this should be kept in well-closed bottles or boxes, as otherwise it loses its virtue.

S. M. D.—Your penny loaf, if placed in the petrifying waters of Derbyshire, would not literally be changed into stone, but its particles would be gradually displaced and the cavities would be filled, by infiltration, with silicious earth or lime in composition with iron or iron pyrites.

SHELF.—You must state your question more clearly before we can answer it. "Delivery" of what? Of the deed, or of the goods and chattels?

LILLIAN STUART.—You may obtain the first volume of the New Series by post, from Messrs. Petter and Galpin, by sending 5s. 4d.

J. BOWMAN.—You will be required to prove—1. That the money was really bequeathed to your grandfather; 2. that your father was his son, and that the money was bequeathed to him; and next, that you are his son, and that the property was bequeathed to you, or that you are the heir-at-law.

AN APPRENTICE.—The precise number of hours during which a master may require an apprentice to work, must be determined by the rules of the trade to which he is apprenticed. Generally speaking, twelve hours is the allotted space; but this rule can scarcely apply to shopkeeping. If you become free of your town by having served your apprenticeship to a freeman, you are, of course, entitled to send your son to the "Free School."

SHAKESPEARE.—Labourers of all kinds are needed at the Cape of Good Hope, but we do not find that there is any dearth of schoolmasters.

F. M. R.—Plaster of Paris busts and figures may be made to have the appearance of polished marble by the following process:—Put into four pounds of clear water, one ounce of pure curd soap, grated and dissolved in a glazed earthen vessel; then add one ounce of white bees' wax cut into thin slices; as soon as the whole is incorporated it is fit for use. Having well dried the plaster figure or bust, &c., before the fire, suspend it by a piece of string, and dip it at once in the varnish; upon taking it out the varnish will appear to have been absorbed; in a few minutes stir the varnish and dip the plaster a second time; this usually suffices. Cover it carefully from the dust for a week, then with a soft muslin rag, or some cotton wool, rub the figure gently, when a fine gloss will be produced.

A MAN OF THE TOWN.—The name Crinoline is given to an article much in use from the fact that it is made of horse-hair. Crin, in French, and Crinis, in Latin, signifying hair of the tail and mane of the horse and other animals.

GOLD CLASP.—Allan Ramsay, author of "The Gentle Shepherd," &c., was born in the south of Scotland, in 1685, and died January 5, 1758.

UN GARÇON.—Of the plays you have named, only three are to be found in the authorised editions of Shakespeare's works, namely, "Antony and Cleopatra," "Cymbeline," and "Pericles." The other six have been attributed to him, but, as the best commentators imagine, without sufficient foundation.

EXCELSIOR (Bridport).—It is not for us to discuss the merits or demerits of the journal you have referred to; we believe the number stated to be altogether in excess of its real circulation, and we regret this tendency to put forth exaggerated statements. We decline to state numbers, but we have no hesitation in saying that our circulation is very far in excess of that of the publication in question, and, moreover, is constantly on the increase.

DON PEDRO.—The number of words in the English language is variously estimated. Todd's edition of Johnson contained 58,000 words; Webster increased the number to 70,000, since which, a further addition of, at least, 15,000 has been made. So that according to this last estimate the number is about 85,000.

DAME JOSWELL.—Your motto may be rendered thus in Latin:—Bene fac, et crede Deo.

A SUBSCRIBER (Manchester).—Chester was founded by the Romans, and was the station of the 20th Legion, called Valeria Victrix. The wall and castle was first built A.D. 908, and William I. rebuilt the castle in 1084.

T. FROST.—Little is known of the history of Limerick until the arrival of the Danes in the year 812, who obtained possession of the place. It was successfully invaded by Henry II. of England. The castle was built by order of King John about 1211. In the rebellion of 1641, Limerick was seized by the Roman Catholic party. English government was restored according to a treaty signed in 1691. The cathedral was founded by Donald O'Brian about the time of the arrival of the English.

LIZZIE.—We do not believe that there is any process by which the scars of which you complain can be effaced.

D. M.—We fear you will not be able to obtain a free passage to Australia; but you had better apply to the Government Emigration Offices.

JOSEPH WELLS (Sunderland).—The provincial council of Otago, New Zealand, assist emigrants from a fund formed for that purpose. The amount of assistance varies according to circumstances. Persons who consider themselves qualified for assisted passages must apply to the Emigration Office.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—A certificated bankrupt can be indicted for perjury, if it appears that he has given false and fraudulent statements.

PUER.—Chapelle (chapel), and chapelain (chaplain), are probably derived from the Latin word capella (diminutive of capra), a small box, in which the relics of martyrs were formerly kept. From the box, the term may have been extended to the oratory, or part of the church in which it was deposited; and, finally, to the whole church, or chapel.

DELHI.—A remedy for sea-sickness was recommended in No. 27, p. 16.

CLANRYE.—"Tractarian" is a term applied to those who follow the teachings of the "Tracts for the Times," or "the Oxford Tracts," written by Pusey, Newman, Keble, &c. &c.

A TRUE SCOT.—Scotland is now an integral portion of Great Britain. It was for many centuries a kingdom in itself, having its own monarch, laws, and form of government. In 1707 it became part of what is called the United Kingdom. It has still some legal and ecclesiastical provisions peculiar to itself.

PUSSEY.—It is far more safe and profitable to apply to a medical practitioner of established character, than to resort to men of the class referred to.

K. B. (Dundee).—The parties are highly respectable. A CONSTANT READER, R. F. J., J. W., and AMY ELLERSLEY, &c., should submit their cases to skilful medical practitioners.

RESPECTFULLY DECLINED.—J. Dalsiel; Valerius North; J. Chalmers; T. Bonnar; T. H.; W. D. Lister; A. Brick; Try; Scriba; Chilton; F. Hall; Tom King; C. F. O'Leary; J. S.; E. O'Donnell; A. E. E.; J. H. Miner; B. W. H.; Gingham; Branch Gore; H. Biggs; Harry; J. H. Eccles; Cedile; Nelly; J. T. Chapman; Ploughboy; Joshua Reed; W. Lee; Aspirant.—Many of the above contributions—chiefly in verse—evidence good feelings on the part of the writers; but they are not quite up to our mark as specimens of poetic genius.

X. Y. Z.; M. E. M., Agogos, M. A. K., Romeo and Juliet, Herbert Hall, Sportsman, The Hawk, W. J. L., Ada Lawford, Paddy Wroxall, Willie, J. A., General Havelock, X. Y. Z. (London), A. N., J. R. P. D., A. B. C., Amicus, An Actor behind the Scenes, Manrico, R. G. B., Ignoramus, Honour Bright—have all asked legal advice, but they have put their questions in such unintelligible language that it is impossible to assist them.

NEMO.—We should prefer saying, "He is not a very good grammarian."

MILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

THOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

Why didst thou choose the cursed sin
Hypocrisy—to set up in?
Because it is the thriving'st calling,
The only saints' bell that rings all in.

BUTLER.

ow frequently have we heard the judge upon the bench, when the career of some notorious criminal has been unrolled before him, and every dexterous, cunning, and winding scheme laid bare by the patient investigations of justice, observe with regret that the same amount of forethought, tact, and knowledge of the world displayed by the guilty man in the pursuit of crime, must, if it had been employed in any honourable pursuit, have led to fortune; and there is little doubt but the judge was right in his assertion, for wealth, after all, is not so much an affair of chance as the idle dreamers of the earth suppose. In the pursuit of it, honesty and prudence constitute the chief elements of success: the first may be regarded as the vessel which is to bear us safely into harbour, the second as the ballast to steady it.

In such a craft, when the mind of the commander is active and his temperament sanguine, the only real danger is, lest he should throw too much of this precious ballast overboard before he has taken in sufficient cargo; but even then, after a great deal of tossing on the billows of anxiety, it is ten to one but the good ship Honesty will right itself again.

These reflections have been suggested to us by the extraordinary amount of perseverance shown by the reader's old acquaintance Fiddler Dick, in the plan of hypocrisy he had laid down. No disappointment, and he experienced many, was permitted to ruffle the surface of his temper; on the contrary, he bore them with such seeming patience and resignation that even the governor was deceived; and he consented to add his recommendation to the chaplain's for a ticket of leave.

"Done him, at last," whispered Dick in the ear of his friend Mike.

"Done whom?" demanded his hearer, morosely; for his sojourn in the dockyard had not increased his amiability.

"Holy Joe and the grinder."

The first was the cant name, amongst the prisoners, for the chaplain—the Reverend Mr. Meanwell; by the grinder, the speaker meant to designate the governor.

MIKE ESCAPING FROM CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

"Why, yer ain't got it, have yer?" exclaimed the old convict.

"Not yet, but I shall have it in three days," was the rejoinder, accompanied by one of those knowing winks which, like the signs in freemasonry, convey so much in so little.

This intelligence—although his own chance of ever obtaining his freedom depended upon the liberation of the speaker—appeared to afford anything but satisfaction to Mike; jealousy and envy filled the thing which anatomists would call his heart, and which we, for want of a more fitting word, designate by the same name.

Although the speakers had known each other for many years—shared in prosperous and evil days together, there was nothing like friendship between them; a circumstance not to be wondered at, for friendship is incompatible with crime—the generous passion can only dwell in an uncorrupted heart.

There is nothing but companionship in guilt; it is, and ever must remain, a stranger to true friendship.

"Well, we are lucky," he observed, after a pause. Fiddler Dick repeated the word we with a low chuckle, as if he did not exactly see the propriety of it.

"We," said the speaker, with still stronger emphasis. "You don't suppose I am a-goin' to remain here alone, do yer?"

The question was a poser, for the mountebank knew that his esteemed friend and pal, as he used to designate Mike, could, if he thought fit, effectually prevent it.

"Why, you ain't goin' to peach?" he muttered. The old convict uttered an inarticulate "umh!"

"Is that your friendship?" "Friendship is one thing and bizziness is another," philosophically observed his companion. "You are the only one I has here that knows me, with whom I can talk over old times, and I can't make up my mind to part with you for long, and that's the fact on it."

Dick looked around the shed where the above conversation had taken place. There was no one near, and an iron crowbar, which one of his fellow-prisoners had left, lay temptingly within his reach; but he restrained himself. He could do so at times, as the years of hypocrisy and cant he had passed in the dockyard proved, added to which, great as was the indignation he felt at the implied intentions of the speaker, and bitterly as at the moment he hated him, there was still one being in the world whom he detested more—whose life it would afford him greater pleasure to take—Bet's.

As there was no chance of indulging in the luxury of murdering both, Fiddler Dick speedily made his choice.

"Look yer, Mike," he said, "if I worn't as true as steel, your un'ansum behaviour would make me turn agin yer. Of course I ain't a-going alone—my feelin's wouldn't let me; haven't we talked it over and over agin? but you are so cursed suspicious!"

"Trust to no one," muttered the old man; "that's wisdom."

"Not allays," observed his companion. "If I wor as suspicious as you are, should I trust to your promises about the money yer say yer have got stowed? Where did you say it wor stowed, Mike?"

The question was put in so natural a tone, that with one less practised in the craft of life than the convict, it might have succeeded; as it was, the old rascal only grinned at what he doubtless considered a very clever move to entrap him, and patted the speaker affectionately and approvingly on the back.

"Capital!" he exclaimed; "but no go; I ain't to be done!"

Here the ruffians both laughed heartily: Mike at the attempt to throw him off his guard; the mountebank at the penetration which had discovered it.

"Mustn't forget bizziness, after all," observed the former. "I think we understand one another without any more words."

"Exactly."

"In three days yer gets yer ticket."

"Holy Joe told me so."

"When am I to get out?"

"As soon as I can get the brads to purchase a rope to throw over the wall, and a fake for you," replied Fiddler Dick, looking serious; "for yer knows as well as I do there is nothing to be done without money."

His companion in crime nodded approvingly, as much as to say "Go on."

"If you had only had the swag, or a part on it, here," continued the speaker, "it might have been all right at once."

"In what way?" demanded Mike, suspiciously.

"You know Brandt?"

"The wardsmen?"

"Yes."

The old convict gave a dissatisfied shake of the head, and intimated that he had no great faith in him.

"But I have. He is one of the right sort," whispered Dick, "and has long been tired of this place; in short, he can't very well remain here much longer."

"Why not?"

"He has been doin' a stroke of bizziness on his own account—backer, and—you understand."

The speaker illustrated his meaning by raising his hand to his mouth.

"Gin," said Mike, a supposition which his companion confirmed by a knowing wink.

"And never to tell me on it!" exclaimed the speaker, reproachfully. "Well, I must say that, bad as the world is, I didn't expect that of you, Dick, so often, too, as we have taken our glass together. I wondered," he added, "how you contrived to keep your spirits up after them awful gronin's and singin' a hymns in chapel."

"Where would a been the use of me a-tellin' on yer," said his pal, somewhat touched by the appeal. "Brandt brought it in to sell, not to give away, and you had no brads."

"Haden't I?" muttered the old man.

"Had you?" demanded the mountebank.

"Never mind that now," answered Mike. "We'll come to the pint in time. After what ye have told me, I begin to think better of Brandt. And so he has been a-doin' bizziness on his own account!—well, I like a man of bizziness. I am a man o' bizziness myself. What's his game?"

"Meriky."

"And a very good game, too, if he can only get there. Why doesn't he start?"

"Short of tin."

"Dare you think he'd be true?"

"True as steel," replied Dick.

"I wish I could think so," observed the former, cautiously; "we might—"

"Why, yer'd never trust him with yer money," interrupted the mountebank, in the tone of a person whose susceptibilities were justly wounded, "when yer have an old friend and pal like myself by yer side."

"I ain't agoin' to trust no one with that," answered the wily convict, sharply; "but I should like to be convinced that I could trust him, too."

There was a pause in the conversation, during which the speakers continued to exchange regards; as if each were doubtful how far he might venture to confide in the other.

Fiddler Dick was the first to speak.

"I could transport him," he whispered.

The eyes of Mike flashed with joy.

"Will that content yer?"

"When I can transport him too," was the reply.

"What an old serpent yer are," observed Dick, with a chuckle; "there is no keepin' a secret from you. But mind, it must be all square this time, for I mean fairly; and if you split," he added, knitting his brows to a ferocious scowl, "I'll wring your neck, though I swing for it the next minute."

Many persons might have felt rather uncomfortable at this assurance; not so the aged rascal to whom it was made; in fact, he felt rather pleased by it than otherwise, for it was an indirect proof, he considered, of the speaker's sincerity.

"And serve me right, too," he said, at the same time holding out his hand as if to seal a bargain.

Fiddler Dick wrung it earnestly.

"Out with it."

"Well, then," said the former, drawing closer to him, to make sure that not a syllable would be overheard, "you and I, Mike, know that what with the excise, free trade, the police, and such innovations, it's a hard thing for a man, no matter how industrious he may be, to pick up a honest livin'. Although his dodge is never so clever, one or t'other is sure to be down on him."

"That is true," observed his friend.

"Brandt had done, or rather was beginnin' to do, well, when one of the gate-keepers found him out."

"Which?"

"He as acts as clerk to Holy Joe on Sundays. The chap is a reglar sneak—hasn't the pluck to do anything for himself, and—"

"Threatened to peach?" ejaculated Mike.

"And had ha' done it," said his pal, "if Brandt hadn't stopped his mouth by dividin' the profits. So, findin' that he won't likely to git his passage-money for Meriky by that move, he tried another."

"Was that found out?"

"Only by me."

"And you?"

"Kept his secret for three quarters a day," replied Fiddler Dick. "It won't much," he added, modestly, "but I couldn't find it in my 'art to be 'ard on a poor fellow as was a-tryin' to get on in the world."

His hearer grinned at the idea of the speaker being swayed by the last consideration; but he felt too much interested in the narrative to interrupt him.

"He took to picking up copper bolts, and bits of odds-and-ends laying about in the storehouses," continued the speaker; "they would only have been lost," he added. "I have often felt riled when I saw how our money was wasted."

"Ours!" repeated Mike.

"Ours," said his pal; "aint we the people?"

This was a proposition too flattering to be disputed, although the old convict had never looked upon it in that light before.

"Dick!" he exclaimed, "you ought to have been in parliament."

"Well, they might have done worse than sent me there," observed his friend, complacently. "But a man's talons" (probably he meant talents) "are seldom found out till it is too late to make any use of them."

"And so you found Brandt out?" said his companion.

"Partly, yes, and partly, no," answered Fiddler Dick. "I suspected him, and as he could not get the things out of the yard without a friend, I helped him."

"In that case," exclaimed Mike, in a triumphant tone, "you could transport each other;" an observation which the narrator, to say the very least of, thought ungracious and uncalled for.

"And I could transport them both," added the speaker, mentally; for he wisely kept the last remark to himself.

"And how did yer manage to get the swag out?" he asked.

Fiddler Dick made a motion as if throwing a cord over a high wall—quite sufficient explanation for his companion.

"And that's the way we must manage for you," he said; "only the rope must be a strong one."

Mike nodded knowingly.

"And the new togs?"

"I will find the means to procure them," said the convict, "now that I find yer are in right down earnest; and may be when we are all three out, I can put ye up to a spec or two afore starting for Meriky."

"I have one on my account," observed Fiddler Dick, "which must be settled first."

"And very natural too," observed his companion in crime. In fact, both their ideas had been directed in a similar channel: one had thought of his wife—the other of his twin-brother.

At the expiration of three days, the long-sought ticket-of-leave—the reward of years of hypocrisy—was obtained. Dick once more became a free man—free to direct his steps to good or evil; the world before him; a vast amount of speculative benevolence in it ready to advise, but not one hand to assist him.

In this society acts with its usual caprice and injustice; for, after taking the greatest pains to reform the convict whilst undergoing the penalty of the outrage he has committed against its laws, it sends him forth, in nine cases out of ten, only to be tempted and to fall again.

There must be something radically wrong in the system, when those who framed it and advocate it betray such utter want of faith in the stability of their own work.

Fiddler Dick was summoned before the governor of the dock-yard and the chaplain to receive the document which confirmed his freedom from the former, and to listen to a lecture from the latter, which, as it was accompanied by a sum of money, he heard with pleasure.

"Ah, sir!" said the hypocrite, trying very hard to squeeze out a tear, "I scarcely know how to thank you. Only to think of so much goodness to a sinner like me. I don't deserve it—I feel I don't."

"True repentance always merits mercy," replied the reverend gentleman; "and if you persevere, as I trust you will, in the path you have chosen, I doubt not but you may yet become a respectable—hem—that is to say—respectable in a useful point of view—member of society. Do not let temptation master your better principles," he added, "and squander the means which the bounty of government, and the charity of a few Christian friends have placed in your hands."

"I won't, sir."

"But get into good and respectable employment at once."

By this time the liberated convict had placed both the ticket-of-leave and the money in his pocket.

"Perhaps, sir, you will be good enough to tell me where I am to find the good and respectable employment you name; if you have any friends who would give me work, a recommendation from you might be of service to me."

Unfortunately, none of the chaplain's friends were in want of such a person. It was the same thing with the governor: both were quite ready enough, in their public capacity, to give him a certificate of good conduct, to express their conviction of his reformation, but neither of them would take upon himself to recommend him to his private friends.

From this one fact may be judged how far the much lauded scheme of criminal reformation has succeeded or failed. Its most zealous advocates appear to have no faith—that is to say, practical faith in its results, for we never hear of one of them giving employment to a ticket-of-leave man.

Neither have we any faith in it.

These words, we fear, will sound harshly to many of our readers, but before they judge them, let them be fairly understood.

The criminals we despair of are those who have graduated in the university of crime, taken its honours, and frequently passed through the hands of justice. Such fellows know, as Fiddler Dick did, the exact amount of cant and hypocrisy necessary to excite a morbid, unhealthy sympathy in their favour. The satisfaction of having subdued, as he imagines, a hardened nature, excites in the breast of the chaplain an interest which is frequently based upon a false premise, and a clever actor is let loose upon the world, instead of a repentant man.

Where the repentance is really sincere, we would employ such persons as labourers and guardians over their fellow prisoners in the dockyards; not send them into the world with the certainty of being driven back upon their old resources for a livelihood.

Still more strongly would we advocate a law separating the children of convicted criminals from their parents, and training them to a life of labour and usefulness. By educating the offspring of the ignorant felon, society would in some degree repair the wrong neglect of duty inflicted on the father.

In training the youth, it is by no means necessary to neglect all that is practicable for age. What would the world say of a physician who never attempted to cure his patients till fever reached delirium, or loss of blood produced exhaustion? Pronounce him mad; refuse to follow his prescriptions. And rightly, too.

And yet, in dealing with a moral disease, it proceeds exactly upon the principle we have described.

As is usual under the circumstances, the manumitted convict was not permitted to mingle any more with his companions. Not that Fiddler Dick regretted this, for he had made his arrangements beforehand, and could, at all times, communicate with Mike, by means of his friend Brandt, who rejoined him the same night at a low beer-shop in the neighbourhood of Chatham—one of those dens in which crime may always secure a refuge, provided it can pay for the accommodation.

Instead of finding the mountebank drunk, as he expected, Brandt was agreeably surprised at seeing him perfectly sober.

Freedom, in one respect, had made a new man of him; or rather re-awakened all that was brutal and revengeful in his nature.

"Have you got the money?" he demanded, as his confederate entered the chamber, in which he had taken a lodging.

Brandt pointed to the bundle he had just placed upon the table.

The speaker hastily opened it, and proceeded to examine the contents. First there was a complete suit of clothes, fit for a yeoman or respectable tradesman.

"Umph!" exclaimed Dick, "Mike will scarcely know himself in these togs. Too fine," he added, "too fine."

"They were the only ones I could get likely to fit him," observed his confederate; "but you are rather difficult to please."

"Not in the least; give me a reason and I am satisfied. I only spoke because I thought the old man would grumble at the expense. What's this?" he added, drawing forth a ball of twine with a leaden weight at the end.

"The string to send over the wall."

"Why it would not bear the weight of a child," observed the former.

Brandt pointed to a long knotted rope which lay coiled like a serpent at the bottom of the bundle, and Dick at once comprehended that the finer cord was intended only to enable his friend Mike to draw the stronger one over the wall to him.

"Capital!" he said, "couldn't have arranged it better myself; and now that my mind is easy on that pint, just tell me how the old rascal contrived to conceal his swag."

"Well, he hadn't much of it."

"How much?"

"Twenty pounds," replied Brandt; "and where do you think he kept it? You'll never guess, so I may as well tell you at once."

"Why don't you tell me, then?" demanded his hearer, impatiently.

"You remember the old greasy pad he wore in his handkerchief?"

"Yes."

"Well, it was quilted up in that. The note was so discoloured that if I had not been known, no one in Chatham would have changed it for me."

"A note?" repeated his confederate, suspiciously.

"Yes."

"And only one?"

"Only one!" said Brandt, emphatically, for he felt annoyed at the question. "I'll tell you what it is, Dick," he added, "it seems to be a part of your system to doubt every one; now, I don't like it. Speak out plainly at once; and, if you can't trust me, let us shake hands and part: I'd much rather of the two."

Well would it have been for the speaker if he had yielded to the impulse; for as yet he was not too far steeped in crime to retrace his steps. A little further, and the companionship of those with whom he was about to link his fortune would render all chance of doing so impossible.

"Habit, only habit," replied the mountebank. "When you have played at hide-and-seek with justice—tricked and been deceived as I have been, you will be suspicious, too. Say no more about it," he added, in a joyous tone. "I am all right now; shake hands."

His visitor extended his with a reluctance which the liberated convict pretended not to see, for he shook it heartily.

"When do we start?" he inquired.

"Not before midnight."

"That will do. I long to be away from this accursed neighbourhood—the air of the dockyard is stifling—to feel my limbs at liberty—free to roam where my fancy leads me."

"That can only be in America," observed Brandt.

"Perhaps I shan't see Meriky," replied Fiddler Dick, suddenly looking serious, "and perchance I may. It all depends upon luck. Let's have one glass to the success of our voyage."

It was near midnight when the two speakers arrived at that part of the wall of the dockyard where the attempt was to be made. Acquainted with the internal discipline, the posts of the sentinels, and the hours when the rounds were made, every chance had been duly calculated, and accident, as far as human prudence could suggest, guarded against by the treacherous wardman.

"How will Mike get out?" whispered his companion.

"Easily enough: he is in the infirmary."

"Pretends to be ill," chuckled Dick; "cunning old serpent. Let us make haste," he added, "for the wind cuts as keenly as my knife; and this drizzling rain is enough to wet a fellow to the skin."

The man who accompanied him gave one shrill whistle, and then paused to listen.

"Mike can't whistle; never could," muttered the mountebank.

"I don't want him to try."

"What then?"

The reply came in the shape of a pebble, which the old man cast over the wall.

"All right," exclaimed Brandt; "heave the lead."

The next instant the weight was cast over the wall. He for whom it was intended groped on his hands and knees till he found it, and then began to draw up the twine with the knotted rope attached to it.

Three jerks announced that he had succeeded.

"We must hold our end firmly," observed Brandt.

"Of course we must," replied his confederate;

"we ain't agoin to let the old 'un down, eh?"

"What did you say?"

"It would break his neck. What a lark!"

Whether this was put as a feeler or not we must leave our readers, who by this time are pretty well acquainted with the character of the speaker, to form their own opinion; but certainly, if it was, Brandt did not choose to understand it so; for he held his end of the rope all the tighter.

In half an hour—for it was a work of time—Mike stood beside the speakers on the same side of the wall.

"Now, then," said his pal, "here are the togs. We have no time to lose."

Long before dawn the three men were far away from Chatham.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

The soul of music slumbers in the shell,
Till waked and kindled by the master's spell,
And feeling hearts—touch them but lightly—pour
A thousand melodies unheard before.—ROGERS.

THERE was something exceedingly touching in the untiring, affectionate solicitude with which Peter Mangles watched day after day by the sick-bed of Mr. Bently, who, at one moment, appeared plunged in the profoundest melancholy—humble and weak as a child, and the next, so nervously irritable, that it was impossible to address a single word to him without provoking some bitter retort.

At times, when his senses wandered, the sorrow-stricken man would rave wildly; and the words "poison!" and "murder!" escaped him, to the intense horror of the old clerk, who very naturally wondered what it all meant.

"Poison, and murder!" he repeated to himself; "what can Richard have had to do with such unbusiness-like proceedings?"

Peter's curiosity was doomed to be still further tantalised, by hearing his patient mutter something about dishonoured bills from India.

"If I only knew what bills from India!" exclaimed the old man, mentally, "I might be able to satisfy him; but we have no bills, there can be no bills that concern our firm."

Then the faithful fellow would rack his brain with conjectures, and run over in his mind all the transactions of the house of Bently and Company with their Indian correspondents for the last ten years, when, just as he had discovered a faint clue to some unsettled transaction, a fresh exclamation from his employer would direct his thoughts into a different channel, and set them speculating as widely and uselessly as before.

Sometimes he asked himself what Mr. Bently could possibly have meant by calling his nephew an assassin. For, bad as Peter's opinion was of Carus, he never for an instant imagined that he had plunged so deeply in crime as to seek the life of any human being.

When the evil passions are once unchained, who can prescribe their limit?

A week nearly had elapsed; the clerk was seated at his post by the bedside of his friend—no ordinary test of friendship to one of his active temperament and business habits—when the sufferer turned upon his pillow, like one who had just recovered from a painful dream, and, gazing slowly round him, pronounced the name of Peter.

"Thank heaven!" exclaimed the latter, with a sigh of intense satisfaction, "he knows me at last."

"I have been ill—very ill, have I not?" demanded the invalid.

"On the verge of bankrupt—no, dissolution, I mean," replied Mangles. "Haven't had such a fright since the great panic; but you are better, much better now—firm as the Bank of England again."

"Have I been dreaming?" said the merchant, fixing his eyes upon those of the speaker with an inquiring expression.

"Well, Richard," answered the old man, "I should think you must have been dreaming. I am sure I hope you have, for you have talked the strangest things: bills from India dishonoured!—now I am certain we have no bills," he added, anxiously, "that we are not prepared to meet; the credit of the house stands too high for that."

"True," murmured Mr. Bently, "quite true; we have gold enough. The spirit of avarice might sigh with repletion as it summed up the amount. But it has not purchased happiness, Peter."

"I am afraid not, Richard," was the reply. "And yet," added the speaker, "it ought to have done so, for it has been honestly acquired."

"But it brought pride with it," observed the former.

"True."

"And hardness of heart—"

"Never mind that now," interrupted his friend, soothingly; "I knew you would come to your senses one day. Strike a balance with your conscience, and forgive your child as a Christian and a man of business should do. It is not natural to bear enmity for ever."

His employer sighed deeply—he thought of his grandson.

"Of course you will forgive her," added Peter Mangles.

"Yes, yes—I promised him I would."

"Promised whom?" demanded the clerk, exceedingly puzzled, for it was the second time he had received the same answer.

The man of wealth made no reply; he felt that the death of our hero must be a continual reproach to him. How could he ever acknowledge to his daughter that for years he had deprived her of life's dearest blessing—the presence of her son—robbed her of the joy of witnessing his growing virtues; of exercising that healthful influence over his heart and mind which nature consecrates as the mother's peculiar privilege; how confess to her that he had refused to listen to his grandson's prayer, and condemned them to a separation which death had made eternal?

As these thoughts agitated him, Mr. Bently resolved to bury, if possible, in oblivion the sad tale of his grandson's fate. His secret was known only to Morton and Mr. Curry, as he imagined; and on their friendship he felt assured he might rely.

"Why don't you speak to me, Richard?" demanded Peter, fearing from his moody silence that his senses were once more wandering. "Shall I call the physician?"

"No," said the merchant; "the fever of my brain is passed. I have been deeply stricken; but the wound is not mortal. Time is left me to fulfil my promise. And then," he mentally added, "rejoin my poor lost boy."

"What promise?"

"You forget I have a child."

"No, I do not forget it, Richard," replied Peter Mangles, affectionately. "Do you imagine that after having been your friend from boyhood, and connected with you in business for nearly forty years, I would permit you to leave the world with an unbalanced account?—nothing of the kind," he added; "and, if I thought that you could bear it—"

"I can endure anything now," interrupted the invalid.

"Well, then," continued the clerk, "Rachel is in the house."

Mr. Bently had miscalculated his strength. The intelligence had such an overwhelming effect upon his shattered nerves, that for several moments his friend regretted the precipitancy with which he had made the communication.

"Be firm," he exclaimed, greatly distressed; "pray be firm. Remember what we have borne up against—three panics, Alexander's bankruptcy, besides that wretched New York affair,—and recovered from them all, as we shall do now!"

"How can I face her," thought the unhappy father, "and know myself the secret cause of all her misery?"

"Better see her at once, Richard," added the speaker, "and settle the account."

In all probability, had time been given him to reflect, the merchant would have refused, not from any lingering feeling of resentment, but want of moral courage. A stifled sob at the door of his chamber informed him his daughter was there, and involuntarily he pronounced her name.

The next instant Rachel was kneeling by the side of his bed, clasping his attenuated hand in hers, and murmuring the word "pardon."

"God bless thee, poor stricken flower," exclaimed her parent, clasping her in his feeble arms, "and forgive me my unnatural harshness."

Peter Mangles waited to hear no more, but instantly quitted the room, rubbing his hands with delight. It had been the desire of years to see his old friend reconciled to his child, and the wish at last was gratified.

"I knew he would," he muttered; "I always said that his heart was in the right place. I am so glad I sent for her; the doctor advised me not, but I felt that I was right; doctors know nothing of business—how should they? Nothing like a clear account in the ledger of life to set a man's heart and mind at rest. He will get well now—he must get well—he shall get well, and in three days, or, perhaps four, I can return to the City. Bless me," he added, in a tone so piteous that it sounded almost ludicrously in contrast with the joyous one in which the preceding words had been uttered, "what have they done all this while without me?"

"But we shall get over that, too," he continued, as more pleasing thoughts stole over him. "Only to think, all that I have toiled and prayed for has arrived at last. Richard is reconciled to his daughter; her husband will have a share in the firm. He must take the name of Bently, though; I think we ought to insist upon that; and Mary shall marry some clever, active man of business—one of the Barings, now, or a—no, no, I think it shall be a Baring."

To his astonishment, the speaker, who had been uttering his thoughts aloud, found two delicate white arms thrown suddenly round his neck, and a pair of blue eyes gazing into his with an exceedingly arch expression.

The arms and eyes both belonged to the sister of our hero, now a lovely girl, just rising into womanhood, the consolation of both her parents, and the idol of Peter Mangles' old and affectionate heart.

"Haden't you better consult me upon the subject?" she whispered in his ear, at the same time with difficulty suppressing an inclination to laugh.

"Pooh! pooh!" replied Peter, kissing her affectionately upon each cheek. "What can girls know about business?"

"More than you imagine," observed the young lady, archly, "about the affairs of the heart. You speak of disposing of me as if I were a bale of goods."

"If you were a bale of goods," observed the clerk, gallantly, "all I have to say is, that he would be a lucky fellow who obtained the consignment."

"But I don't intend to be consigned by any one or to any one," answered Mary.

"You don't!"

"No. I intend to consign myself; and when the time comes, you shall sign the invoice. Won't you, Peter?" she added, coaxingly.

"You forget I am not a principal in the firm," replied Mr. Mangles, seriously.

"But not the less to be consulted in my estimation," observed Mary.

Although the conversation had been carried on in a spirit of badinage rather than sober earnestness, it caused the old man no small amount of uneasiness, for where affection is interested, the perceptions become doubly keen, and he fancied that beneath the veil of mirth and archness, he could discover traces of a deeper feeling.

Decidedly it was unwise of Peter Mangles to have set his heart upon the marriage of his young favourite with a man of business.

"Hush!" he said, pointing to the door of Mr. Bently's chamber. "There is one who possesses a greater claim on your obedience and love."

"On my obedience, I admit," answered the fair girl, "but not upon my love. You cannot reason me out of that conviction. He is my grandfather by blood; but you have been more than a grandfather to me by adoption. I trust I shall be able to love him," she added, seriously, "and forgive him the misery his unrelenting sternness caused my parents."

Deeply as the old man felt gratified by her words, he was too just and true a friend not to set the conduct of Mr. Bently in its proper light.

"Mary," he said, "if I have never spoken with you upon this subject before, it was to avoid giving you pain. Now it is my duty to speak; for you must not misjudge your grandfather. He had just cause of anger against both your parents, who married without even asking his consent, whilst he was absent in India."

"So I have heard," replied Mary; "but the blessing of one parent hallowed their union."

"That is what I never could understand," observed Mr. Mangles, scratching his ear, his usual habit when puzzled; "for Mrs. Bently was a good woman—an excellent woman, and must have had reasons for her extraordinary conduct."

"Surely that ought to have pleaded—"

"Yes, yes," interrupted the former, "and doubtless it would have done so if George—your father, I mean, had waited patiently. But, in short—"

The speaker hesitated and stammered; not even to justify his friend, could he bring himself to expose the errors of a father to his child.

"You make a poor special pleader, Peter," exclaimed his hearer; "better give up the cause at once."

"Not so."

"Go on, then."

"You shall plead it for me."

"I! how is that possible?"

"By your recollections!" answered the old man, seriously. "Do you never recall to mind a home of poverty, wretchedness, and want, when cold and hunger were familiar to you?"

"I remember such things," exclaimed Mary, turning exceedingly pale, "but they appear like a dream to me."

"They were no dream, but a hideous reality," continued Peter Mangles. "When a child you were too young to reflect upon the cause of these things, nor would I have called your attention to them now, had I not found your mind embittered against your grandfather. He has erred, but not to the extent you think; he has suffered more—far more, I trust, than you will ever feel. Love him, Mary, try to love him; you will find the path of duty sweet and easy when you pursue it earnestly."

The fair girl flung her arms around his neck, a feeling of veneration as well as affection mingled in the caress, for she felt all the truthfulness of his words, the delicacy with which he had alluded to the early errors of her father.

It was the first and only time, perhaps, that Peter had ever indulged in anything like a sermon. If any of his City friends had heard him, they would have doubted the old man's identity, or the evidence of their own ears.

When the first emotions between Mr. Bently and his long-estranged daughter had subsided—emotions which must be experienced to be fully understood, for they are too sacred to be described—Rachel rose from her knees, and, opening the door of the chamber, beckoned Mary to join her.

"Remember what I have told you," whispered Peter Mangles in the ear of his young favourite, as she quitted him.

The fair girl smiled through her tears, for she fully appreciated the motives which had led the old man to cause her a momentary pain.

Taking her by the hand, her mother led her to the bedside of her grandfather, and asked his blessing for her child.

The merchant raised himself upon his pillow, and stretching his hands over her, blessed her with a parent's blessing.

In the deep contentment of that moment, when the wish, the prayer of years was accomplished, Rachel felt a weight of sorrow removed from her long-suffering heart, and her happiness would have been complete, but for the one sad recollection which mingled with every thought, and cast a veil over the sunshine of existence.

"I had a boy, sir," she sobbed—"a noble, generous boy—whom it would have been my pride, had Heaven willed it so, to present to you to share your blessing; for he possessed all those qualities of heart and mind which give rich promise of the future man. But he was torn from me—lost, to me—and I have not even the consolation of weeping over his grave."

"Dead!" murmured Mr. Bently, with a burst of feeling which nearly betrayed his secret.

In an instant Mary was by the side of her mother; her arms entwined around her neck, endeavouring to console her.

"Not dead," she exclaimed; "God is too merciful. He has heard our prayers—I feel he has. Besides, have we not received tokens that he is in existence; and those who love him still remembered?"

"He lives, at least, in my heart," answered the sorrowing woman. "In my dreams I continually see him, hear his voice, and feel the warm pressure of his lips upon my cheek. Father," she continued, with sudden excitement, "should I live to realise my dream of years—to clasp him in my arms—what happiness on earth could equal mine? Sometimes I feel as if I should," she added. "Your blessing is a pledge that Heaven's will will follow it. Oh, what a home of love and joy would then be mine!"

The future brought thus vividly to his imagination extorted a groan of remorse and anguish from the old man. He felt that he might once have realised it, and bitterly did he accuse himself of having yielded to the impulse of pride and resentment rather than to the more generous one of forgiveness; but he was punished—punished where he had sinned—in his affections.

"Speak not of the poor boy," he sighed; "my nerves are aspen-like. I have not the strength to hear it."

"Where is George?" he added, after a pause.

"Staying with Mr. Thornton at the Elms," answered Rachel.

"Send for him," said her father; "the work of reconciliation must not be incomplete. Let us exchange forgiveness ere I die. I have been harsh, Rachel—very harsh. I feel it all now when my heart is broken."

"Do not speak of dying," sobbed his daughter, deeply touched by the old man's sorrowful words and accents of self-reproach; "life has many years of happiness, I trust, in store for you—years of love and honour."

"They might have been," was the self-accusing reply.

Mr. Bently called his granddaughter to his side. Parting the long ringlets from her forehead, he gazed upon her long and tenderly; Mary looked up in his face and faintly smiled.

"You have your mother's eyes," he said, "bright as hers once were, before sorrow had dimmed their lustre; her clear, open brow and smile. May your fate be happier than hers has been!"

At this instant Peter Mangles peeped cautiously into the room. His employer saw him, and beckoned him to approach.

"Thanks, old friend!" he said; "you have soothed the death-pang."

"Nonsense, Richard," faltered the clerk; "you mustn't talk of dying now everything is comfortably settled. Who ever heard of closing the accounts of a firm when the balance-sheet is all fair, and every error detected? What is to prevent our all being happy?"

The merchant sighed as he thought of his grandson. "My father has inquired for George," observed Rachel.

"Has he?" exclaimed Peter. "But, why do I ask? I knew he would—always said he would. I'll fetch him, Richard; he is a good husband, isn't he, Rachel? an excellent father—only ask Mary; and a capital man of business—you may take my word for that. The Elms is only a few miles from the hall—I'll be back in an hour or so."

"Think you he can bear it?" whispered Mrs. Markham, alarmed at the paleness which had now succeeded the flush of excitement on the features of her parent.

"Bear it!" repeated the clerk; "certainly he can. With a clear ledger—heart, I mean—a man can bear anything."

With this observation he hopped, rather than walked out of the room; and in a few minutes was on his way to the residence of Mr. Thornton.

Leaving Mr. Bently, for the present, to the care of his daughter and Mary, we must follow the messenger of peace and reconciliation upon his errand.

HISTORY.

THE study of history is one of the most natural pursuits of the human mind. We are curious to ascertain by what means everything was brought into the state in which we see it, and are desirous of being informed concerning the generations of mankind who have held possession of the world before us; whether their condition was better or worse than our own, and what influence their schemes, practices, and institutions have exercised over the destinies of our race. These inquiries history alone can satisfy.

History is the record of the past. It has been common to range the events of history under two divisions, and to call the one sacred, and the other profane. The word profane is ambiguous, and objectionable on that account. The idea intended is secular. But the division of sacred and secular is artificial, for, rightly considered, all history is sacred. "What are all our histories and other traditions of actions in former times, but God manifesting to us that He hath shaken, and tumbled down, and trampled upon everything that He hath not planted?" Thus history becomes a homily full of examples, and whether it tells of battles, triumphs, or defeats, of the subjugation of a nation, or the founding of an empire, it is lustrous with divine light. Unless we view history as a whole—as one grand unity, embracing all nations and all events, and running on to one great final consummation—its study is neither intelligible nor interesting.

And what a marvellous and complex story is the record of the world's history! Kingdoms and empires, like stars, rise, culminate, and set. The wild barbarian becomes polished, and sinks again into barbarism. The desert becomes a peopled city, and the busy mart of commerce grows desolate. Where the wild beast wandered, and where the wild bird built her nest, there spring up palaces and temples, and where these once attracted the attention of all the world, the wild beast seeks his lair again, and again the wild bird builds her nest. "Westward the course of empire takes her way." Wars, battles, and stirring exploits, leave a strong impression on the mind, but in the gradual advance of civilisation there is something much more remarkable.

History, properly regarded, is fraught with instruction. It is a representation of mankind, in all the various circumstances and conditions of life. It lays before us their characters, counsels, designs, and the results of them. All this tends to the enlargement of the understanding, and proves the best security against the prejudices and false impressions men are apt to contract from education and the prevailing vices of the age in which they live. The court which we see paid to men of wealth and power is calculated to excite in us ambition and avarice. We are prone to attach too much value to the outward condition of life, and to affix ideas of worth and dignity to mere external advantages. But the study of history corrects these false notions. We are rendered capable of forming a true judgment of what is deserving of admiration and praise, as we are presented with numerous examples of men whose position was most exalted, and who were much flattered in their lives, but whose memories are covered with infamy; while, on the other hand, we are introduced to those whose lives were obscure, who were poor, and perhaps despised, but whose names are now held in the highest estimation, and the result of whose lives is still felt beneficially in the world. Thus, history directs us to the pursuit of what is truly great and praiseworthy.

History also teaches us the instability of all human things. When we look back into the annals of past ages we see not only particular men or families, but whole nations and empires undergoing the most astounding changes. To these changes we have already alluded; history abounds with them, and they are full of instruction. They teach us to acquit ourselves well in any position of life; preserving us from pride and folly in the hour of success, and arming us against the adverse accidents of life.

The study of history is in every respect well worthy of our attention. We propose returning to the subject in our next paper.

"What you wish to know shall form part of to-day's lesson," replied George; "and it will come in very appropriately, for a clock is an article of household furniture—the subject of your last page of vocabulary; so begin with—

"I will now comply with your request about the French idioms used in speaking of the time of day. If you wish to say it is exactly such an hour—for instance, 'It is one o'clock,' you must thus express yourself, 'Il est une heure précise;' for 'It is past one,' 'Il est une heure passée;' 'It is a quarter past one,' 'Il est une heure et un quart;' 'It is half-past one,' 'Il est une heure et demie.'

"In all these expressions, there is very little difficulty; but, observe, if you wish to say, 'It wants a quarter, or ten, or twenty minutes to such an hour,' you must change the English idiom, and say, 'It is such or such an hour less than a quarter, &c. &c. I will give a few instances: 'It wants a quarter to two,' 'Il est deux heures moins un quart;' 'It wants ten minutes to six,' 'Il est six heures moins dix minutes;' 'It wants twenty minutes to seven,' 'Il est sept heures moins vingt minutes.'

"Your exercise for to-day, Robert," said the teacher, "will be on the formation of the plural in expressions composed of two nouns separated by a preposition. I will give you a few examples of such expressions: Une queue de cheval, a horse's tail; Un jeu d'enfant, a child's play; Une action de fou, an action of a fool. In these sentences, the second substantive being used rather in the sense of an adjective than of another substantive, does not take the s. And in cases similar to the above where no peculiar rule requires the plural, the second substantive remains singular. Thus, we write, des troncs d'arbre, stumps of trees; but we must write des pieds d'arbres for sets of trees, because plurality of idea is conveyed. But in words something similar to des pieds d'arbre, in which the distinctness of the objects is less evident, the second substantive does not take the s; and you also say des pieds de marjolaine, plants of marjoram; and des pieds de giroflée, plants of gilly-flower. In the following expressions the case is different: plurality is understood, and the s is added, un marchand de gravures, a merchant of engravings; une couple de chevaux, a couple of horses.

"By all these distinctions, Robert," observed George, "you will perceive that a person who does not reflect can never be a good grammarian; and, to tell you the truth, many French people write their own language incorrectly, although they may speak it with purity and elegance. All the niceties of French grammar require much study and attention, and these I trust you are willing to give, in order to master them; but for your consolation I may here observe that through the vocabularies, idioms, dialogues, and also through seizing every opportunity of speaking French with those who understand it, or with any native of France whom you may happen to meet, you may become a good practical French scholar, long before you are quite perfect in the theory of the language."

"I have not quite concluded the rules for the exercise, so I must request your patience a little longer. Now, in such expressions as the following—des marchands de vin, wine-merchants; and un marchand des vins fins, a merchant of rich wines—the word vin, wine, requires no s in the first; but in the second, the sign of the plural is necessary, because the idea of a variety of wines is conveyed to the mind."

Nous aurons à dîner aujourd'hui une purée de pois, un coulis de champignons, et un pot de confitures. 15. Aimez-vous la purée de pomme-de-terre?

"We must now think of our travellers, Robert," remarked George. "You may remember we left them just retiring to rest, at the 'Hotel de la Reine Victoria,' on the quay at Dieppe. Now, by rights, they should start for Paris early the next morning; but, in order to furnish you with useful French sentences, I shall allow of their loitering on the way."

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XVIII.
SOUND.

PRODUCTION OF SOUND.—ECHOES (continued).

458. Give an example of a WHISPERING GALLERY. —At the base of the dome in St. Paul's Church, London, the feeblest sound is conveyed from one side to the other of the dome, a distance of more than 130 feet, but is not heard at any intermediate point.

459. When we speak in a room, why do we not always hear distinct echoes from the walls and ceiling? —Because, unless the room is large, the interval of time between the sound of the voice and the return of the echo is too short; the two are heard as one sound.

* Monsieur a raison. Observe that inferiors often address superiors in the third person. The third person may also be used in addressing a stranger or a very slight acquaintance. A raison is another idiom. Literally translated, "has reason." Monsieur a raison, literally translated, "Mr. has reason;" freely translated, "Sir, you are right."

† Particular attention should be given to all the idiomatic expressions for asking the way, as English people are apt to make absurd blunders on this subject.

‡ The French say, "make a walk," faire une promenade, instead of "take a walk," prendre une promenade.

460. Why do we hear so much better in a room than in the open air?—Because the sound is strengthened by the reverberation from the walls, ceiling, and floor.

461. What is the effect of curtains, carpets, and furniture in a public room?—They make it less easy to speak in, by deadening the echo and dispersing the sound. We may see this, by observing how much louder the voice sounds in an empty than in a furnished room.

462. How are deaf people enabled to hear?—By putting an Ear Trumpet to their ear.

463. How does this act to strengthen the sound?—It concentrates at the ear all the rays of sound that enter the large open mouth of the trumpet.

464. When a person wishes to throw his voice to a distance, what instrument does he use?—A Speaking Trumpet.

465. How does a speaking trumpet act to strengthen the sound?—The rays of sound are reflected from the interior of the trumpet, and all proceed on in the same direction.

466. How far may a strong man's voice, sent through a trumpet 24 feet in length, be heard?—At a distance of three miles.

PROPAGATION OF SOUND IN LIQUIDS AND SOLIDS.
467. Is sound conveyed through liquids and solids, as well as through the air?—It is, and with greater velocity.

468. What is the velocity of sound in water?—4,708 feet per second, or about $4\frac{1}{2}$ times the velocity of sound in the air.

469. Can sounds be heard farther under water than in the air?—They can. Franklin, plunging his head under water, heard distinctly the blows of two stones struck together, at the distance of half a mile.

470. How far has the sound of a bell, struck under water, been heard?—A distance of nine miles.

471. What is the velocity with which sound is transmitted by cast iron?—11,090 feet, or a little over two miles per second.

472. What is its velocity of propagation through solid substances in general?—From 7 to 17 times greater than through air.

473. What general truth may be stated with regard to the conduction of sound by solids?—Sounds are conducted with greater distinctness by solids than by the air, or even by liquids.

474. Mention one or two facts that strikingly illustrate the facility with which sounds are conveyed by solids.—The scratching of a pin at one end of a long beam can be distinctly heard, if the ear be applied at the other end. The ticking of a watch can be heard as well by placing it between the teeth as by putting it at the ear.

475. Is the ground a good conductor of sound?—It is; by putting the ear to the ground we may ascertain the fact of the approach of a horse, wagon, or train of carriages, before the sound reaches us through the air.

476. Do sounds pass from the air into a solid, the wall of a building, for instance, and then into the air again on the other side?—They do; but in doing so they experience a great diminution of intensity. We can hear in a perfectly tight room sounds from without, but they are much weakened.

KATE ELDEN; OR, THE EIGHT-DAY CLOCK.

CHAPTER I.—THE STRANGE BOARDER.

As the sun went down behind the hills that sentined the western approach to the beautiful village of Aytown, old Josiah Kent came in from feeding his horse, cow, and pig, and taking a seat near the arm-chair occupied by his "old lady," he asked her what she supposed the reason was that their boarder had not arrived.

"I'm sure I don't know, Josiah; but this I do know—I wish she wasn't coming at all. It flusters me dreadfully only to think of having her here. I dare say she is good enough, and quiet enough, as the minister said, but mercy knows we are not the right sort of folks to take a boarder. I've been thinking, 'Siah, whether or no I hadn't better send her word that she needn't come."

"Why, old lady, what would Mr. Hinsdale think of that, after your agreeing to take her? He wouldn't be apt to like it very well, and no wonder. I think, myself, that it would be serving the young woman any way but well to disappoint her now. Mr. Hinsdale, you know, mentioned how tired she was, and how anxious to get settled in a quiet and retired home. For my part, I think it will be pleasant to have her here."

"Perhaps it will, but I feel so nervous about it. She is from the city, and perhaps has high notions and queer ways; then 'tis so long since we have had a young person about the house; not since poor Allen went, no one knows where."

The old lady wiped her eyes, and sank into silence. Just then there came a timid knock at the door.

"Come in!" said the old man, and a tall, slender, lady-like young woman, dressed in black, with a sad and lovely countenance, that betokened intelligence, refinement, suffering, and resignation, obeyed the invitation. She looked tired and depressed, but smiled pleasantly and thankfully at the old people for the immediate attentions they offered.

"Have you had supper?" asked the old lady.

"Yes, 'm, thank you," was the reply, in tones so gentle, that they went to the hearts of the hearers. "If you please, I would like to be shown to my room," she soon said.

Mrs. Kent went up with her, and after having shown her all through the chambers, and having told her that she was to make herself as much at home as she could, and not to feel confined to one room, or to any one part of the house (which was a large, well-furnished, and home-like mansion, made for comfort and convenience), she said—

"How do you think you shall like us, my dear? Do you think you can be contented to live all the summer in a house with three old people?—for Judy, our help, is a great deal older than you are, though young compared to my husband and me."

The stranger, henceforward called Miss Elden, or Kate, replied, with great earnestness—

"I think that I could not have been directed to a house more agreeable to my taste, or more suited to my circumstances, than is this pleasant house of yours; and if I never like its owners less than I do now, I shall always like them very much indeed."

She smiled cordially upon the delighted old lady, who bade her good night, and hastened down to tell "Siah" what a nice, "accommodating" person their new boarder was.

"I'm glad she's come, after all; I like her a great deal better than I expected I should. She isn't high in her notions at all—I mean, she don't seem to be."

"The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it, old lady. There is no telling much about anybody on once seeing. But the minister gave her a good recommendation. He seems interested in her, anyhow, and he is a judge of folks. Wonder where he came across her, and how long he's known her!" concluded the old man, meditatively.

"I imagine she was one of his members when he was curate in the city," suggested the wife.

"Yes, I suppose so," concluded the husband.

"She's got a good friend in him, whether she has any other friends or not. How he spoke up for her! Wonder if he will see that she always has plenty to do."

This latter remark was caused by a thought of the board money, and the source from which it was to come. The old lady was to have, for her pocket-money, the half-guinea a week that their boarder was to pay.

The subject of this conversation was preparing to retire when Mr. Kent knocked at her door to say that her trunks had arrived. She requested that they might be brought up; it was done, and as he helped to bring in the last one, the old man said, kindly—

"I hope ye'll not be lonesome nor homesick with the old folks, my child. If you get frightened in the night, and think you are too far off from the rest of us, just knock, and I shall hear you. We mean to do all we can to make you feel at home and happy. My old woman says she is right glad we took you, though we never should have done it if it hadn't been for the minister's recommendation."

"Thank you for all your kindness, and good night," replied Miss Elden, as Mr. Kent departed. "Blessings on that dear minister," she added to herself, with clasped hands. "Oh! it is good to know that on the earth there is at least one on whom I may rely as a friend, that will not fail in time of need. God bless him."

She laid her tired head on her pillow, and, although she was so glad and grateful, that pillow, ere she slept, was wet with tears.

"Oh! my patience," cried the old lady, on visiting her boarder's room the day after her arrival, "what beautiful work! It's just like what they have here in the shops to sell, only five times nicer. Wherever did you learn to do that?"

"I learned in London, of a lady who had worked in France at the business. She used to work collars for my mother and my sisters, and, as I wished very much to learn, she taught me her art."

"And so your mother lives in London, does she?"

said the old lady, fixing her blue eyes on the pale face before her. "I did not know whether you had any parents living."

"I have," was the slow reply.

Mrs. Kent longed very much to ask a good many questions, but the manner of Miss Elden did not invite inquiry.

"How long have you known Mr. Hinsdale?" asked Mrs. Kent, abruptly.

"For many years," was the answer.

"Does he know your family?"

"Yes, madam, he knows them all."

"I expect you'll be for leaving us and going back home in a few weeks," said Mrs. Kent, experimentally.

"No, I shall never again go home," was the sad-toned reply.

The old lady dared ask nothing further. She sat meditating whether it would do to "pump" the minister in regard to the history of her boarder; but she concluded that that would not be best, as she stood in too much awe of the reverend gentleman to be likely to succeed very well.

"Well," said she, sighing heavily, "it is strange, here I have got somebody's girl to take care of, but there is no knowing whether anybody will take care of my poor boy."

"Have you a son away from home?"

"Yes, dear, he went away eight years ago, and we have never heard of him since."

The poor mother kept wiping her eyes with the corner of her apron, but the tears came so fast now that the apron would not do.

"I will go down stairs," she said. "Come down, my dear, whenever you are lonesome," and she went out.

CHAPTER II.—THE EIGHT-DAY CLOCK.

A CRASH—a scream. Kate sprang, half awake and bewildered, from her bed. What had taken place? Where was she? In the deep darkness of midnight she could not find the door, and half wild with a confused terror, she began to scream for help.

A mingling of voices now met her ear, and in a few moments more her door was opened by a young lady, a relative of the Kents.

"Oh! Helen, what has happened?" cried Kate, so frightened that she was trembling from head to foot.

"No one is killed or hurt—don't be so terrified," returned Helen. "The old eight-day clock that for fifty years has been fastened to the dining-room walls has fallen, and is smashed to atoms. There will be great mourning and many superstitious fears, I dare say, but nobody need be so pale and trembling as you are."

"Let us go down," said Kate, throwing a wrapper about her, and stepping out into the passage.

The two hurried down to the scene of the disaster.

Old Mrs. Kent sat weeping beside the fragments of the shattered clock; but she was smiling also.

"Whoever would have thought it!" she burst out, as the two young women entered. "Whoever would have thought that the old clock's falling, and coming within an inch of knocking my brains out, would have been the means of my finding our boy's picture. We lost it soon after he went away, and could never tell where it went to; but some child must have had it and stuck it in behind the clock; and here it is safe and sound, as much like the dear boy himself as possible. Only see him."

The dear susceptible old woman held the precious picture towards Kate.

With an eager and startled motion she caught it, looked with wild eyes upon it and then at the mother, gasping out from white lips:

"Your son?" and fell fainting upon the floor.

"Father, father," screamed Mrs. Kent, "come here quick. Miss Elden has fainted or is dead."

The old man, who had retreated to the bedroom when the young people entered, now came hastily into the scene.

"What made her faint?" he said.

"The sight of Allen's picture. Isn't it singular?"

It was a long time before any signs of returning life were visible in Kate. When she did at last open her eyes, it was only to close them with a groan.

"I always had a fancy that you looked like him," she said, as Mr. Kent bent over her to lift her to a better position.

"What do you know of our boy? Tell us as soon as you can, dear Miss Elden. Oh! do, my child," entreated the impatient mother.

"Soon," was the faint reply.

"Go to bed, mother, and let her rest till morning," commanded the old man; and the wife rather unwillingly obeyed. Kate lay on the settee until morning, Helen remaining by her side.

The story that, when day broke, was related to the anxious and sorrowing parents was as follows:

KATE'S STORY.

My parents loved their children devotedly, but they were proud and haughty; and when a rich young man sought my hand in marriage, it was not because they did not know from what source his wealth came, but because he was unknown in the high society in which he moved, and because he could not, or would not show himself to be of some "good" family, that they refused to listen to his wish.

But I loved the man; and, led captive by that love to the will of its object, I secretly married him. My family at once disowned me; but so happy was I in my elegant home, and in the company of the man dearer to me than all else on earth—dear as the very hope of immortality—that I hardly felt that act to be painful to me. I lived, for one short year, in a perfect intoxication of joy. My husband seemed everything that I could desire. He met every want of my being. To him turned affection, intellect, will, and each was satisfied. But I was deceived. A wretch who pretended to love me, in order to wean me from my Edward, stated to me that he was a gambler, and that our marriage was but a sham. Of my feelings concerning this I cannot speak. I charged my husband with the crimes; he could not deny them; and, ruined and heart-broken, I fled from his house. This was a year ago. I had no money, but my books, clothes, &c., which were my own, I took with me. My parents I never was to see more, nor my sisters. Indeed I did not desire it. I hid all the winter in such places as I could pay for by the industrious use of my needle. But such a life was intolerable. I tried to think if there was not one friend left to whom I might apply for relief. My former pastor had removed to this place. He was, I knew well, a man to be safely and entirely trusted. I wrote to him, telling my sad story. He at once sent me money to come here. He found me a shelter—a peaceful home; but none but Heaven above knew that it was beneath the roof of the parents of him who was my destruction. Your son Allen and the Edward whom I loved—aye, love—are one and the same.

CHAPTER III.—OLD JOSIAH GOES IN SEARCH OF HIS SON.

THE discoveries of the foregoing chapter were perfectly overpowering to poor old Mr. and Mrs. Kent. They sent in haste for their pastor, and to him they related the whole strange disclosure.

Mr. Hinsdale was somewhat bewildered.

"How can it be possible that your son could live so long in such an open way," he said, "and you never hear of him when he was so near?"

"He has taken another name, you remember," said Mr. Kent.

"Ah! yes, I had forgotten." The reverend gentleman was really quite bewildered by the sudden turn of affairs.

The idea of Kate's having been directed to the house of her betrayer's parents, and that through his own instrumentality, was astonishing, and not at all unpleasant to him.

"Tis as it should be," he said to himself, "as it should be. They'll love her—they can't help it; and they'll take care of her; 'tis the least that they can do. Poor child! poor lamb! the Lord has indeed provided for thee a home."

He stroked the hair of Kate, who was still lying pale and weak upon the low settee—and she felt a tear fall softly on her forehead.

"Thanks!" she said, lifting her eyes, beaming with grateful affection, to the mild face which bent above her. "Thanks! It was all through you that I found this place in which to die."

"Die! My child, you will not think of that now, when you have just found out that you are at home," said the clergyman, and both Mr. and Mrs. Kent hastened to assure her that she must live for their sakes; for she was now, and ever should be, unto them as a beloved daughter.

A look of pleasure fluttered over Kate's wan face, but it quickly gave place to a troubled expression.

"Edward," she said.

"He must be found," said Mr. Hinsdale. "It may be that the sight of his father will recall him to some sense of honour and justice. You told me that you believed that he really loved you."

"I never doubted that," said Kate, sobbing heavily.

"Mr. Kent and I will go at once to the City and see if we can find him. You must get her well by to-morrow noon, for we may bring a stranger back with us."

Taking leave of the three females, the gentlemen hastened to the railroad station, and were soon on their way to London where they arrived late in the afternoon. They found the house described by Kate, and were shown into its parlour. In a few minutes a gentlemanly man entered the room, and came towards them.

Suddenly he paused, then sprang forward and fell upon his knees at the feet of Mr. Kent, crying—

"Father, forgive—forgive your penitent son!"

The scene which followed may be left to the imagination of the reader. The old man's heart was melted into entire forgiveness. The son confessed all his guilt, folly, and misery, and ended by declaring that, since the flight of Kate, who was really his lawful wife, he had not known one moment's happiness or peace of mind. He had been married lawfully, but had managed so that Kate had not noticed the name he signed to the certificate, which certificate he afterwards hid, that she might not see it. He said also, that he had resolved to give up all his evil ways, sell off his house, and make what restitution was in his power of his ill-gotten gains; after which he had purposed going back to his father's house to beg his parents' forgiveness, and remain to try and be a comfort to their last days. He knew that his wife was a Christian woman, and his desire now was to become worthy to meet with her in heaven, if he never more beheld her on earth; but he had, he said, been advertising everywhere for her, and stating that she left in consequence of a very great mistake in regard to the matter on which they last spoke.

"I was in a bad humour when she charged me with having vilely deceived her, and on the spur of the moment admitted that I had—as, indeed, I had in many respects, but not in regard to her being my own true wife. But I have been bitterly punished—and I fear that my punishment will endure for ever!" concluded the unhappy man.

"What would you say if we should tell you that your wife is already sheltered in the home of your youth?" inquired the minister.

"Sir, do not mock a stricken man!" exclaimed Kent, gazing with frenzied eye on Mr. Hinsdale.

"Not for my life, sir, not for my life," returned that gentleman, earnestly.

"But I will tell you a strange story—a providence kind and remarkable above anything that has come under my observation for many years." And he repeated Kate's history.

"Let us go!" cried the young man, starting up. "Let us go instantly. We can catch the evening train. I would not sleep out of the train to-night for the whole of London—and certainly I shall not sleep much in it."

Early the next morning the three men reached Aytown, and all went directly to Mr. Kent's house.

The meeting between the mother and son was affecting in the extreme; but when poor Kate was made to believe that it was her husband who knelt before her—when she fell upon his neck with cries and tears of almost delirious joy, what heart could have remained unmoved? None there present, certainly. There was a universal thanksgiving of tears. The end of our story is with joy and rejoicing. Edward—or, as Kate ever after called him, Edward Allen—had really reformed. He remained there contented in his father's home, and one happy family they made as long as they all lived. Allen opened a shop in the village; and far more happy was he in the enjoyment of its moderate profits than he had ever been as the successful gambler. Young children gathered in the wide old house, and a merry place they made of it. Grandfather and grandmother spoiled them all to their hearts' content. The good minister had not a family in all his congregation which he loved better to visit, or by which he was more warmly beloved; and even yet he thinks with reverential wonder and devout gratitude upon the most "especial providence" which led him to choose for the stricken lamb of his former flock a shelter in the very home which was hers by right of love and marriage, and which was to be her own to the end of her long and useful life.

THE "BOOK."

O THAT each thoughtless, wayward youth
Would study well this Book of Truth!
In it he'll find a friend and guide
Watching for ever by his side,
To show the path that must be trod,
To raise his thoughts from earth to God!
Though gently chiding, yet it smiles,
And pleasantly the hour beguiles.
If worn with care his heart be sad,
This cheers his spirits—makes him glad;
Or should temptation him assail,
The Tempter's arts will not prevail,
If he will heed the counsel given,
And pray for fortitude from Heaven:
In short, this "Book" a guide will be,

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

THE RIGHT HON. EDWARD HORSMAN, M.P. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

RIGHT HON. EDWARD HORSMAN, M.P.

THE Reform Bill which swept away so many rotten boroughs, and extended the electoral privilege to a numerous body of constituents all over the country, gave to Stroud, in Gloucestershire, the right of sending two "fit and proper persons" to parliament. Since that day, Stroud has been well represented. But never, since its members were first admitted to the house, have worthier men done credit to the electors' choice than those which now occupy that responsible and distinguished position.

The Right Honourable Edward Horsman, M.P. for Stroud, was first returned by that constituency without opposition, in June, 1853. As a consistent and conscientious liberal, he has ably supported those measures which he was pledged to maintain. Those matters in which he has taken the most active part are an efficient church reform, vote by ballot, and the removal of all taxes on knowledge. With respect to the first two, great diversity of opinion exists. The necessity for reform in the church is a question that has excited much controversy; and the same may be said of vote by ballot. But with regard to taxes on knowledge, there is an universal desire for their abolition: parliament is touched to its very core on this momentous point; the Chancellor of the Exchequer admits the advisability of their removal, and out of doors the agitation is gaining strength; so that we may confidently anticipate a complete and glorious success. And whenever that success comes, as come it must, the name of the Right Hon. Edward Horsman will be proudly associated with that triumph.

To effect the abolition of taxes on knowledge should be the first object of every legislator. Human ingenuity could scarcely contrive an impost more detrimental in its consequences than that of the paper duty. We alluded last week to the educational exertions of Mr. Baines of Leeds. Successful as are those exertions, how much more successful would they be were these knowledge taxes abolished. One of the greatest difficulties in carrying on our day schools and Sunday schools is the comparatively high price of books. Many of our boys and girls leave our schools with not a hundredth part of the knowledge they would have if these taxes were abolished. We cannot regenerate the world without books. The book is the great agent of modern times, to enlighten, emancipate, elevate, and bless our species. He who has good thoughts, and can wield a pen, possesses an empire which surpasses that of any illiterate emperor or conqueror that has ever ascended a throne. Such power is there in thought—in the action of mind upon mind. One of our great missions on earth is to circulate good thoughts through the world, especially among the masses; but we cannot do this effectually while our efforts are hampered by an impost at once so oppressive and impolitic as that of the paper duty.

The Right Hon. Edward Horsman is the son of William Horsman, Esq., and Jane, daughter of Sir John Dalrymple. He was educated at Rugby, to which school we are indebted for some of our best men in the church, the state, and at the bar. The subject of our sketch turned his attention to the last-named profession, and was called to the Scottish bar, but his energies have been chiefly employed in offices of state. He contested the borough of Cockermonth in 1835, but without success. He recommended the contest in the following year, and was triumphantly returned. He sat for Cockermonth from that period till 1852, when he was thrown out. He was returned for Stroud in the year following, and again at the last election. He married in 1841 Charlotte Louisa Ramsden, only daughter of the late John Charles Ramsden, Esq., for many years M.P. for Malton.

As Commissioner of Church Inquiry in Scotland, the Right Hon. Edward Horsman exhibited both ability and candour; he served for a short time under Lord Melbourne as one of the lords of the Treasury, and in 1855 he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland.

The accompanying portrait of this distinguished man is taken from an excellent photograph by Mayall.

BARCELONA.—II.

QUARANTINE is one of the miseries of foreign travel. A town or seaport takes alarm at the plague which is raging somewhere or other—or is supposed to rage—and lo! the innocent folk in a clean, healthy ship are placed in durance vile for any given number of days the authorities please to mention. By an affair of this description a week or two ago, we ran the risk of a fortnight's delay in our Indian mail; and only escaped by a ruse and a special train across the desert. Now the Barcelona people are afraid of the plague, and they are firm believers in quarantine.

Everybody has heard of quarantine, but in our favoured country there are many untravelled persons who do not precisely know what it is, and no doubt wonder why it should be such a bugbear. It is an ordeal which no one wishes to encounter twice. There, floating off the town, under the suspicion of plague-smuggling you lie, with all the miseries of a sea-voyage and none of its excitement; and there you remain, cooped up with people who lose their temper because they have lost their time, until it shall be the pleasure of the great governor of Barataria or elsewhere to pronounce you clean.

When the Barcelona quarantine is over, you are permitted to take boat and approach that venerable city. It is a long trip from the ship to the shore, but were it twice as far the voyage would be delightful, after the tedium and imprisonment of the last few days. So away you go, steering pleasantly up the old harbour; but as you reach the shore and are about to land, a host of ragamuffins presents itself in battle array.

Who are the ragamuffins, and why are they in battle array? They are Barcelona porters, ready to carry you and all that you have anywhere or everywhere, regardless of your convenience or your comfort. One seizes your trunk; another takes your bag, another lays hands on your hat-case, another shoulders your chest, two more seize your umbrella, and struggle manfully for its possession; in which struggle they are bravely imitated by two others, who have a stand-up fight over your portmanteau. All are clamorous for gratificacioncita, but all this has been described before;* so we will imagine ourselves free from the platoons of porters, free from the custom-house officials, free from the Noah's Ark-like omnibus which rattles us over a pavement laid down by the Phenicians, and never mended since; and, finally, seated at a Spanish table d'hôte, in an atmosphere of garlic,—suppose, if you please, even this passed, and that we are out for a stroll.

"All days," says the proverb, "are not feasts in Barcelona." But Spanish life is pretty well filled up with holidays. The calendar is full of anniversaries—saints' days that have to be duly observed. All the Spaniard's holidays have therefore somewhat of a religious character. His is not the independent and uproarious holiday of a Yankee on the fourth of July; nor is it the capering enjoyment of a Frenchman; nor the chattering hilarity of an Italian; the Spaniard is more grave and sober. His happiness requires less muscular movement. To stand, wrapped in his cloak, statue-like, in the public square,—to sit on a sunny bank, or beneath a shady bower, is about as much activity as suits his dignity. Only the sound of castanets can draw him from his propriety, and the steps of the fundango work up his brain to a state of intoxication.

Spain is remarkable for gravity. It is a land of wonderful solemnity; that which other people would do with ease and freedom, the Spaniard discharges as a very serious affair. The spirit of the Knight of La Mancha has not departed. You observe its influence everywhere; in church, state, army, commerce—from the grandees holding solemn council, to the lazy beggar at the church porch. With the Spaniard Spain is still as colossal a power as when Columbus gave her the New World, and she is ready to enter the lists, mounted on her Rosinante, with a barber's basin for a helmet, and do battle with us all.

But even grave Spain sometimes condescends to be jovial—to wear the cap and bells and jingle a bauble; and once a year there is a carnival at Barcelona, which is to Spain what that of Rome is to Italy.

Fun and frolic are let loose in the streets. There are music and masquers everywhere. Crowds upon crowds are in all the public thoroughfares—a sea of life, made up of waves of all the colours of the rainbow. Windows and balconies are all full—such eyes, such lips, such tempting little hoods, and provocative dominoes that many a heart is set on fire. Banners, and flags, and flowers, and tapestries, and devices of all sorts are seen everywhere; and over all these is a sky of intensest blue and the glory of Castilian sunshine. In the face of that sunshine, fraternities of good fellows, and odd fellows, and all sorts of fellows parade their folly. And he is the best fellow of them all who wears the most fantastic apparel, who makes the most absurd harangue, and utters the most unpardonable of puns. The crowds are bent on fun. They mean to be merry, and merry enough they are. The car of pleasure is not standing still; freighted with joy and youth it is rolling through the city. Here are gallant cavaliers in ruffled shirts, plumed hats, jackets covered with spangles and flowers, and their horses' manes and tails all braided with ribbons. Here are colossal figures, representing the genii loci, borne about the town, and surrounded by a mixed multitude that defies description. What are these masquers meant to represent? Who shall say? They are all nose or all moustache; some of them have shirt collars that reach above their ears, others coat-tails that hide their ankles; conical caps a yard high, plumed bonnets as large as a gig umbrella; horns, too, they wear of all sorts, and wings and tails; and they are of all colours, so that the eye is dazzled and the brain grows dizzy at the sight. The ear comes in for its full share of the fun of the carnival, for the noise is such as Bedlamites might make who had grown hilarious. There is music, a storm of sound, which is like nothing—but itself.

At night everybody goes to the public balls. All the theatres and halls are converted into ball-rooms. The merchants are turned out of their exchange, and that grave place of business is transformed into a casino. The centre of attraction, however, is the opera house, which is consecrated to masquerade from midnight until morning. High and low, all the Barcelona world is there—in character or domino, in burlesque or black, galloping over the temporary floor with a furor which if vulgar, is certainly hearty. By two or three in the morning, the mirth grows boisterous. The laugh is louder than the music. The dance goes on faster and faster till daylight, when the motley crowd turns out, blinking like owls at the sunshine in the street.

But soon we are at it again. There are fresh sounds of revelry as the day wears on. The guitar is struck with a gaiety not heard in serenades, the violin leads youthful feet a round of pleasures, too fast for sureness of foot; out ring the castanets merrily above laugh and song, exciting the heart with merriment which comports not well with Castilian gravity.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXXXIII

He was a man, take him for all in all,
We shall not look upon his like again.—SHAKESPEARE.

HOPE EVERMORE, whenever she had an opportunity, always visited, as a teacher, that admirable school, where, under the excellent, pious, and gifted Mr. Stephen, she, with God's blessing, had so early become wise unto salvation. She was welcomed with delight by her good master, and the new generation of ragged little ones, who had sprung up since she was one of the lambs welcomed to that Christian fold. When she entered noiselessly the crowded room, an eloquent philanthropist was addressing the children on the long-suffering of the Saviour, and as he wound up a glowing, earnest lecture by a description of the agony in the garden, the taunts, the insults, and the outrages, and the death on the cross, her own small woes shrank into a vanity, and she felt almost ashamed of the tears she had shed so passionately over her own selfish mortifications and petty trials, when she had so often read without emotion of all He, who alone was without sin, had suffered for sinners.

Nothing could have been more strengthening and refreshing to poor Hope's drooping spirit, or more soothing to her sore and wounded heart, than this admirable lecture. After it was over, and the children were singing a hymn, she looked round on the walls, the roof, the texts she remembered so well, associated as they were with her humble but happy infancy. Everything looked the same; even the black cat, hale and vigorous in a virtuous old age, still looked down from his height in the roof, clothed in glossy sables, well fed, and so evidently a favourite of fortune still, on the lean, hungry, and ragged ones, who, but for that school, would be so much more hungry, ragged, and wretched, and would not know that, however wretched their portion on earth, there is a world where the beggar Lazarus lies in Abraham's bosom, and that there is a day coming, dreadful only to the impenitent sinner, when rank and riches shall avail nothing, since all shall rise from those graves into which they have taken nothing of their worldly wealth, the pauper and the peer side by side, and lost and saved, faithful and unfaithful, good and bad will be the only distinction. It was a good angel that led Hope, at such a time of heart trouble, to that scene.

She felt ashamed of her discontent and dejection, when she contrasted her fate with that of the lean, ragged ones around her. If she was, indeed, the sinless child of sin and shame, what a kind Providence had watched over her. How, in that very school, had she been early taught, so gently, so kindly, by precept and practice, to "remember her Creator in the days of her youth."

How many had been her blessings! How few her trials! And yet, at the first insult offered to her pride, her heart was on fire; at the first thorn in her path, she was ready to sink down in utter despair, or go on her way discontented and ungrateful.

"How," said she to herself, "how can I, a child of the Green Fields Ragged School, be so soon weary of well-doing? I think it hard to sit in noble, airy chambers, richly furnished and every want supplied, nursing, tending, watching, talking, and reading to my lady; because I see from the windows the sun shining on the bright water, and the green trees and daisy-studded sod in the park; and I long to sport on that sod, and bask in that sun, and pine to sit with Larky Grigg, as other young lovers do, under those shady trees stirred by the summer breeze. Ungrateful Hope! Look at Mr. Stephen! I am now in my seventeenth year," she said to herself, "and I was a little child when I first came to this ragged school, and he was master here then, as he is now—honorary master—not for pay or worldly profit, not to please any earthly king or lord, but to find favour in the sight of the King of Kings, and the Lord of Lords."

"He does not weary of well-doing. Year after year, with zeal, patience, and energy unabated, he foregoes the sweet summer air and the winter fireside, out-door amusements, and home comforts, and is at his post—a self-assigned post—reclaiming the wanderer, teaching the ignorant, converting the infidel, breathing the air which, in spite of all ventilation can do, is hot and heavy with the effluvia of crowds of ragged ones; never disgusted by foulness of mind or body, never disheartened, however slow to learn good, and quick to learn evil; never weary of the irritating wanderings of vagrant attention; with instinctive tact, and acquired perception, and priceless experience, tracking the truth through all the mazes of habitual falsehood; not estranged by ingratitude, or chilled by indifference; loving the sinner while loathing the sin, and seeing in every little foul and ragged outcast a lamb to be brought into the fold of the True Shepherd. The evening sun, which tempts others abroad, and suggests sweet thoughts of the harvest homes of England, where all are making so merry, does not tempt him. The Sun of Righteousness is his sun, and his harvest home is here, where he is preparing the crops for the garner of Heaven. And side by side with him in this good work is Jem Goodman. Side by side have they toiled on earth; side by side, I trust, will they be rewarded above."

The hymn was over, and Hope rose from the obscure corner in which she had sat down, and approaching Mr. Stephen, was welcomed by him as a father might welcome a favourite child. Jem Goodman, too, welcomed her with true affection, and she then made her way up stairs to the mothers' gallery.

Apple Blossom, hot and flushed, had just closed her book, assured by Mrs. Golightly that she never would or could learn anything; but Apple Blossom, who, even in her childhood, had elicited the same remark from her village schoolmistress, had made some progress, and could, with the aid of spelling a long word now and then, get very fairly through the Testament. That was learning enough for good, simple Apple Blossom. There were many changes in the mothers' gallery since we last looked in.

Molly Muddle had carried her sloth, her slatternly ways, her rags, her unwashed children, her drunken husband, and Apple Blossom's flannel petticoat to Sydney.

Sally Slink, in spite of her being marked with the small-pox, blind of one eye, and harpelled, had got a husband; and as he was stone blind, she was as fair to him as Venus herself would have been.

He was pretty well off, and was given over in the small-pox, when Sally was sent for to help nurse him. He never saw her, for he was blind when she arrived. She immediately formed a plan for getting him, if he recovered; and therefore she nursed him with the most anxious and tender care.

Her conduct formed a great contrast to that of the Mrs. Gamp who had preceded her.

He required some one to mind his business, a small eating-house, and to watch over himself. He married her, and she was so glad of a good home, and of the title of Mrs., and the power of adorning her ugliness with bugles, and ribbons, and flowers, that she determined to deserve her good fortune by good behaviour. She was clever and active, as many very ugly women are. She was a good cook, too, and very cleanly. Everything at her eating-house was cooked to perfection, and served up with scrupulous cleanliness. To her blind husband, Mr. Price, Sally seemed a beauty.

Poor Kitty Slybrute was no more. She, too, at one time had frequented the mothers' gallery, led there by Apple Blossom; but Slybrute coming out of the hospital more savage, more exacting, and more violent than ever, and he and "mother-in-law," as he called her, being more than ever devoted to "the brew," Kitty was treated worse than ever, and died of a broken heart, having seen all her large-headed, small-bodied children die of water on the brain, and all buried by the parish.

"Mother-in-law" was found one day a heap of ashes, having fallen into the fire some said, others that she went off by spontaneous combustion.

There was an inquest, and some little time after her death, as she had made no will, a son just returned from sea pounced down on the blind, maimed, crippled Slybrute, and seized on everything she had left.

Slybrute then started off as a regular street beggar, having got Larky Grigg to make a song of the story of his accident, and Slybrute, who had a stentorian voice, sang it about the streets to a kind of dirge. He was led by a dog, and feeling his way with a stick, and with a placard "Pity and Relieve a Poor Blind Man," strung round him, he made money enough to keep him like a gentleman; for ladies used to weep for pity to see so fine a man blinded and mutilated by a mere accident; and woman's pity is always an active feeling. Some tried to reform him, but though he was a great cant, he was an incorrigible drunkard, and his greatest lady patronesses were obliged to give him up as a bad job in that respect. But at night he always slunk off to the "Good Intent," the "Rose and Crown," or the "True Briton," and never went to bed sober.

But to return to Hope Evermore. She was received in the mothers' gallery, as everywhere else in the Green Fields Ragged School, as an especial favourite, a sort of pet of the school. Every one took a pride in Hope.

Hope, still very anxious to know something of her own birth and parentage, but no longer discontented, dejected, and unhappy, whispered a few words to Apple Blossom, who told her that Milly Trudge could tell her more than any one else, as she had known Mrs. Evermore both before and after her marriage. Hope's heart danced for honest joy. However poor and wretched, then, her mother was not to be despised.

"Jem Goodman knows a good deal, too," said Apple Blossom, "but he won't tell what he knows. He has a box of papers and other things to give thee when thee's of age, or when thee marries; but he don't like to be axed no questions, so I don't advise thee to tackle him. But, whatever's up now?" she said, directing Hope's attention as they stood on the stairs of the mothers' gallery to the school beneath, where Hope with blushes and tears recognised in a tall, strong young man, carrying a cripple on his broad back, Larky Grigg, bringing Lame Luke to the ragged school at last.

Lame Luke had had many severe attacks of gout and rheumatism since we saw him last. He had begun to dread death, and to tremble for his immortal soul. Larky Grigg tended him like a son, and at last got him to consent to be carried (he could no longer even hobble) to the Green Fields Ragged School.

How handsome Larky Grigg looked as, flushed and panting with exertion, he laid Lame Luke down at Mr. Stephen's feet, saying, "Here he is at last, master. I've been at him for years, but here he is at last."

"And right welcome, too," said Mr. Stephen, cordially shaking hands with Luke; "never too late to mend, my man."

"Splice my timbers," said Lame Luke, "you can't say that of some of the soles brought me to mend, but—"

"But the souls we care for here," said Mr. Stephen, "are always worth mending, always can be mended, my man; and as they are to last through all eternity, they're always worth mending."

"Larky Grigg," said his mother, Apple Blossom, in a low tone, afraid of offending Mr. Stephen if she spoke loud.

Larky did not hear.

"Larky Grigg," said Hope's sweet voice—the one loved voice, the music of youth.

Larky turned crimson, and looked up. In a moment he was by her side. He had but an instant to stay—his master, the ironmonger, was waiting for him at the workshop—but that instant was an age of joy.

Every one was intent on Lame Luke, and if Larky, sheltered by the matronly figure of Apple Blossom, stole one ambrosial kiss, we do not know; but as Hope blushed deeply, and said "Fie, Larky," we think it very likely.

At any rate, after his black locks had for one moment been blended with her golden ringlets, and after one hug of his dear, kind mother, he darted off, promising Lame Luke to call for him at nine o'clock to carry him home.

Hope then took a fond leave of Apple Blossom, and a respectful one of Mr. Stephen and Jem Goodman, and hastening back to Green Street (where she had left the carriage) with a lighter heart and a feeling of filial pride in her wedded mother (however poor and lowly), she ordered the coachman to drive her to Little Ebury-street.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

Her every thought, an angel's tongue might tell;
Her only fault, a heart that loved too well.

BRIDE OF SIENA.

HOPE was fortunate enough to find Milly Trudge at home and alone. Her daughters, who at one time were pupils at the Duck-lane Ragged School, were now voluntary teachers there; her husband was gone to a temperance meeting; Tom to make up a lover's quarrel with his fair tormentor, Merry; and Milly Trudge, being a monthly nurse in great request, who never knew when she might be wanted, was sitting at home darning stockings, and singing very merrily to herself the songs that were in fashion in her youth—"Sally in our Alley," and "Black-eyed Susan." It was so long since Mrs. Trudge had seen Hope Evermore, not, indeed, since she had grown up to womanhood, that when that tall, slender figure, robed in white, with long, floating ringlets of gold falling from under a Spanish hat, and shading a sweet, oval face, met her view in the twilight, she started and shrieked out; for a moment, so strong was the likeness of Hope to her poor departed mother that Milly Trudge thought she was gazing on the spirit of Mrs. Evermore. A word from Hope explained who she was and what she wanted. Being very frank and confiding, she told Milly Trudge of the conversation she had overheard, and the shame and pain it had caused her; adding that she did not care how poor or humble her mother might have been, but she did, as she had always thought of her with love and reverence, ardently desire to know that "she had never done anything to forfeit her child's respect."

"Set your heart at rest then, Hope Evermore," said Milly Trudge. "I knowed her, poor dear! both before her marriage and after. I didn't know her right maiden name; she told me 'Morris'—the name she went by—wasn't her right name; and that she'd reasons for not telling her real name. At that time, miss, I lived in Stamford-street, Blackfriars, and I had a first floor to let, and a small back parlour. Well, it was getting dark, and a wet, windy night—an autumn night, at least eighteen years ago—when there came a trembling knock to my door. I went to see who was there: it was a poor young lady, very wet, her hair—the very shade of yours—all blown about by the wind and steaming with the rain. She had a basket in her hand, and looked so pale, bewildered, and frightened, I thought she'd surely run away, perhaps, from some good home to avoid some hated marriage. She asked me if she could have the small furnished back parlour by the week, and if I would let her come in at once."

"I'll pay the rent in advance," she said. "I'm quite respectable, and a lady born; but I'm in great and sore trouble; and if you won't take me in I must lie in the streets."

"Well, to make a long story short, I took her in. I lent her some dry clothes, poor dear! I soon had a good fire blazing; and I got her into a warm bed, and gave her a good hot cup o' tea. La! she wor thankful. How she enjoyed her tea! and how she thanked me! and, just as she was beginning to give me some little account of herself, her head sank on the pillow, her beautiful blue eyes closed, and she fell fast asleep. I remember I thought she looked like a sleeping angel as she lay there."

"Well, she woke no more that night; no, not till ten o'clock the next morning, and then I took her some good hot coffee and toast. I wor as kind to her as if she'd been my own—that's my natur; I'm always the same, and I never knowed no good come of being harsh and sharp with people in trouble. So she made a good breakfast, and then she said, 'Now I'll tell you what brought me to your door.'"

CHAPTER LXXXV.

Relics of love and life's enchanted spring,
Of hopes born, rainbow-like, of smiles and tears!
With trembling hand do I unloose the string
Twined round the records of those earlier years.

ALABIC WATTS.

It was with feelings of intense interest, and with a mental absorption at once painful and fascinating, that Hope Evermore gazed on many well-preserved relics of past years, that were intimately connected with that fair and unknown mother, about whom she had ever felt a thrilling and mysterious anxiety.

Hope had indeed, through life, been haunted by the thought of that young, gentle, suffering being, of whom Apple Blossom had never spoken but with a sigh, a tear, and a portentous shake of the head at some unseen culprit.

This feeling of vague and almost poetical sympathy with the unknown trials of her mother changed into an intense and personal interest, when Hope heard, with beating heart and burning cheeks, the suggestions of Tarlatan and the housekeeper—as to the probability that she, Hope, was the child of sin and shame; and their impertinent and malicious speculations as to her real parentage.

Hope never for a moment admitted the belief that her mother, however unfortunate, could have been a degraded or guilty creature; but she thought some terrible mystery might render it impossible for her to ascertain and establish the certainty of her having been legally married.

It was therefore a great comfort to her to hear from Mrs. Trudge that she knew for certain that "the poor dear young lady," as she always called her, was married—married in a church; and had her marriage-lines to show, for, before being admitted into Queen Charlotte's "Lying-in Hospital," they had to be produced, and Mrs. Trudge had herself procured them, for the sum of half-a-crown—"which," she added, "the dear, innocent young creature never dreamed them lines costed me half-a-crown; and never did I reveal the same, seeing if I wor short, I knowed well she wor shorter, and when she took the bit o' writin' into her little white hand, she paid me with a smile wuth all the money, never thinking there wor anything else owing."

"Let me pay you the half-crown now, dear, kind friend!" said Hope, taking out her pretty little porte-monnaie—a present from Lord Glenlonely.

"Bless the child! I'm spaking of times when half-a-crown with me wor half-a-crown—hard to get and hard to keep—a time before my Tom joined the temperance folk, and when everything went in drink;—since he've turned sober, things have gone well with us. I've crowns enough and to spare now, my lass; and a gold watch, and three good silk gowns, and a nice little sum in the savings' bank. I'd rather put a pound in your purse, Hope, than take a shilling out, and you a fine lady's companion, and always obliged to be fine yourself! And now I think of it, Hope, I'll give you a new golden sovereign, that I've long had put by in paper for you; and you mustn't go for to think of refusing an old friend, as wor a friend to your mother, and knowed you from a baby."

"Well," said Hope, unwilling to refuse, and yet not liking to accept it, "keep it for me, dear, kind old friend. At present, I have no use for money, no want of any; 'but service,' as the old saying has it, 'is no inheritance; and though I'm called a companion, and treated as a friend, I know, as I'm paid for my services, I rank as a servant; I know the domestics at my lord's take a pleasure when they count up the number of domestics including me; and even my lady—the old lady, I mean—when she's vexed, or in pain, takes care to let me know what I am; then, too, I am well aware that at any moment I may give offence and be dismissed. A companion—though, as you say, she must dress and appear like a lady—is but a hireling after all. I may some day come to you yet, bitterly in want of that sovereign."

"I hope and trust not, Hope," said Mrs. Trudge, "but there's no knowing what's afore us, and so it shall be as you wish; and now I'll take you up into my little room, and show you a sight of small matters that once wor your poor dear mother's, some of 'em she gave me (she loved to give, sweet, generous, open-hearted, open-handed soul as she was), and some she left behind her when she was taken ill all of a sudden, and I had to go with her in a cab to the hospital where you wor born."

Mrs. Trudge led the way to a neat little store-room, in which she kept her best dinner service, and a few glasses, and a purple finger-glass that was used on grand occasions as a sugar dish, and two decanters, and all her boxes, and baskets, and preserves, and, opening a very old oaken chest of drawers with a bureau at top, she took out a pair of screens, a scent bag, an embroidered reticule, a hair bracelet not quite finished, a bundle of paper matches, a pair of watch-pockets, and a journal, the ink brown, and the paper yellow with time.

"Now," said Mrs. Trudge, drawing a chair for Hope, and sitting down on an old trunk herself, "those screens the poor lady painted for me her own blessed self, with her own dear, little, white hands, but after she died I never had the heart to put them on my mantel-piece, they always sets me off a-crying; and Tom's a good husband, though I says it as shouldn't, but he hasn't no patience wuth what I calls a regular good cry; few men has. Ain't them flowers done nat'ral, miss—Hope, I means?"

Hope gazed through her tears on a prettily drawn, delicately tinted group of flowers, painted in a style now quite obsolete, meagre, and rather stiff, and with a preponderance of stalk, in which a sweet pea, a white rose, and a fuschia, tied with a bow of blue ribbon on one white card-board slab bordered with gold paper, was matched by a pink rose, a heartsease, and a convolvulus on another, which group was tied with pink. They were specimens of a weak, bad school, but they were delicately and correctly drawn, and worked up with an ease and finish that spoke of industry and perseverance.

"Ain't 'em natural? and no wonder, for the poor dear lady took 'em off from a bunch of flowers as Bob Blossom brought me on my birthday to pass the compliment. He said when he went to market to lay in fruit for Apple Blossom's stall, he got 'em gived into the bargain. Lor, I remember it as well as if 'twor yesterday; and my Tom, who in them days wor always more or less in liquor, and very spiteful and vicious in his cups, as all of 'em be, whatever they may make their brags of being 't'other way, he choosed to flare up and be as jealous as a Turk over them flowers, and so I gived 'em to the young lady, who said with her sweet smile, 'I'll give them back to you some day, Mrs. Trudge,' and I couldn't, for the life of me, think what she meant, till about a week after she presented me with this handsome present!"

Hope gazed at them with an admiration and interest which no masterpiece of flower-painting by Baptiste or Bartholomew would have awakened, and then she took up the bracelet.

"Ah," said Mrs. Trudge, "that was made of her own beautiful gold hair, just like your own. It's my belief it wor meant for her husband, she as good as told me so. I think she said he'd have to go to battle, and he wor to wear it on his arm, as a harmulet; but when he forsook her, she put it by, and never looked at it again; and I found it thrust away in the drawer of her little work-table, with this writing on the paper:—'Begun in love and hope, and cast aside in estrangement and despair.—CONSTANCE EVERMORE.'"

"Besides these things," she said, "I've got several of her clothes, and a hat and shoes; look 'ee here," and Mrs. Trudge opened a closet, and there was a hat of black velvet, brown with time, of the fashion of eighteen years back, and shoes, quaint and high-quartered, and with pointed toes, but which could fit none but a very small, delicate foot, and a pair of gloves neatly folded up, too small even for Hope. There, too, was the guitar which had once solaced her sad and lonely evenings. The strings were all broken, the blue ribbon faded almost to white. There were songs, too, the pretty songs then in vogue—we have none half so pretty now—"We met, 'twas in a crowd," "I'd be a butterfly," "Oh, no, we never mention her," "She never blamed him, never," "Gaily the Troubadour," "Home, sweet Home," "Of what is the old man thinking," "Lilla's a lady," and many others, but all sentimental; and "Constance, with fond love," written upon them in a manly hand.

"Where are my mother's Bible and prayer-book?" said Hope. "I should so like to have them."

"Ah! and so you will, I believe, some day, Hope. Jem Goodman has them and another little book that the poor lady found such comfort in, and knowed by heart, 'The Christian Year.' She always said, for comfort and faith, it come next to the Bible. No one don't dare ax Jem Goodman what wor in the box the poor lady told Apple Blossom to put, locked, into his hands; but it's my belief there's all the account of the whole pedigree of her life, and what few valuables she had, and her pictur, and her husband's pictur, and her Bible and prayer-book, and a letter to her unborn child, which she seemed to know it would be a gal, and a few lines to Jem Goodman, desiring him not to open the box till her child wor of age, or a-going to get married. So, if you're in a hurry to get the contents, Hopy, you must name the day; I think I can name the young man."

Hope blushed, but not with shame. It was with maiden modesty and womanly pride that she said, "Of course, I'm too young to think of marrying yet, Mrs. Trudge; but whenever I do become a wife, it will be to the only one I can love or trust, and that's my own dear Larky Grigg."

"That's my brave, true-hearted girl," said Mrs. Trudge, embracing her. "I'd give somehut if my poor boy's sweetheart, Merry Blossom, wor like thee. Hope. But she's got such a flirting way with her, and sets her cap at the fellows so, that, what with her merry laugh, her bright eyes, and sunny face, my Tom hasn't a minute's peace. I believe Merry's a good girl, and fond of Tom at heart; but she's been precious nigh losing him; and he'd have broke it off afore now, only, when he went for to propose it, he busted out crying, and she likewise; and then he fell on his knees, and down plumps she on hers; and then they fell to fondling and a-begging each other's parding; so that worn't no way of breaking off."

"No, indeed," said Hope, smiling. "If Tom had been wise, he'd have begged her then and there to name the day."

"Tom's a careful chap," said Mrs. Trudge. "He wants to be partner first, and that won't be for nigh a year."

"Tell him," said Hope, "that I, who know Merry well, and love her dearly, think he'd better not wait. She'll make him a good wife, for she knows her duty; but she thinks a girl has a right to plague her lover as much as she pleases; and there I differ from her. The poet says—

'The rose we wear upon the heart
Should have no thorn to wound us.'"

"Well, that do sound foine, that do," said Mrs. Trudge, "and hits the nail on the head. We'll let Tom repeat it to Merry."

"Say it after me, Mrs. Trudge."

Mrs. Trudge did so till she got it by heart.

"I know Merry's ideas; she always said, 'The man must obey before marriage and the wife after.'"

"Well," said Mrs. Trudge, "if she don't look sharp there won't be no 'after.' Tom doats on her, and loves the ground she treads on; but he's a resolute chap, and he's got a fellow workman at Melbourne a-making money as fast as he can count it, and he's always a-tempting Tom over, and he's got a sister out there, an unkimmon nice, pretty gal, and unkimmon fond of Tom, too! so Miss Merry had better mind her p's and q's. But what are thee trying on thy hat for? Thee sha'n't go till thee've had a good strong, hot cup of tea."

"I cannot wait, dear Mrs. Trudge," said Hope. "My poor lady is so ill, and though she often finds fault with me, as yet no one else can please her half so well. I will take all these things in the carriage with me. There's not a pin or a bit of ribbon my mother ever touched that is not in my eyes as the relic of a saint."

"Well, I'll not persuade thee to stay if thee's wanted home. I never did make young folk forget their duty, and I never won't; but I'll put all them things in that old trunk for thee, and as it ain't smart enough to go on the great lady's fine carriage, I'll send it by the Parcels Delivery Company, after my boy has covered it over tidy with a bit of new tarpaulin; I ain't one to send anything to a grand house so shabby as to be made game on."

"A thousand thanks, dear, kind Mrs. Trudge! I'll take the journal and the bracelet with me, please, and let me have the rest of the dear treasures as soon as you can."

"Aye, I'll warrant you, Hopy, when my Tom knows it's to do a good turn to Hope Evermore he's wanted, he won't sit still with his hands before him, as he often do when he and Merry have had a tiff, poor lad! he won't let the grass grow under his feet when he can show thee a kindness. Ah! I only wish that Merry wor like thee, Hopy!"

"She'll be a good wife, I'll answer for it," said Hope, "and a comfort to you all. When once she has sworn to love, honour, and obey Tom, she'll do it."

"Well, if she do, she'll have a good mother in me, and it's a great comfort to my heart that you think so well of Merry; for I knows, with all your gentleness, you're the moral of your own mother, Hope, and could never bear the thing that is wrong, and are of too 'pure eyes to behold iniquity.'"

So saying, she kissed affectionately the sylph-like, lovely Hope, who returned the warm embrace of her poor mother's humble, but devoted friend.

Hope drove home with a heart lightened of a great burthen. She had pondered too much of her poor mother as an angel in heaven, to bear to think of her as a daughter of sin and shame on earth.

Close to her gentle, loving heart, she pressed the little clasped volume that contained the private history of her mother's life and heart, promising herself to read it on her knees at night, while sitting in the little room adjoining Lady Glenlonely's; for that lady, in the comfort she found in Hope's presence, seemed quite to forget that it was cruel to keep so young and delicate a girl up half the night, and then require her to bring her tea at an early hour in the morning.

And Hope never complained, while Tarlatan grumbled all the next day if she was not in bed before twelve, and declared her constitution must sink under it. Hope, strong in duty, gratitude, and love, gave no token of exhaustion, but what might be traced in the pallor of her cheek, and in her drooping form.

"Please go to my lady at once, Miss—What's yer name?" said Tarlatan, in an insolent tone; "if she's asked for you once, she has fifty times. The more fool she," she added, as Hope hurried upstairs. "She must be a fool indeed to prefer being waited on by a chit like that, to the attendance of a lady like me—a first-rate milliner, and accomplished dress-maker and hair-dresser, accustomed to travel, and acquainted with all the capitals of Europe."

"And a hornament to the best of them," whispered Townley, the handsome groom of the chambers, whose black eyes and white teeth often made Tarlatan forget that she ought not to give herself to any domestic under the rank of a butler.

"That's all you know about it," laughed Tarlatan, as she hurried away, blushing and bridling, to her tea in the housekeeper's room.

When Hope reached Lady Glenlonely's chamber, she found her noble patroness asleep; and requiring a book she had left in the drawing-room, she hurried down to fetch it.

She found Lord Glenlonely there, talking politely to Captain Greville, who was supposed by Lady Glenlonely, by Hope, and by Esther Fitz Darrell, to be an ardent admirer of the last-named young lady.

He more than once adroitly introduced her name, glancing furtively at Hope the while, to see if she took any notice of his doing so. Hope, who was the kindest creature in the world, hearing him speak of his intention of also visiting the Highlands, and dwelling on the beauties of the very spot to which they were going, thought how enchanted he would be if Lady Glenlonely would invite Esther Fitz-Darrell to spend a few weeks at Burnside; and, whispering her desire to the kind old lord, he at once empowered her to invite Esther. Hope, who thought Captain Greville looked pale and anxious, said kindly, as he rose to take his leave, "If you come to see us at Glenlonely, Captain Greville, you will find our young friend, Miss Fitz-Darrell, with us."

"At any rate, I hope so," said Lord Glenlonely, "as we mean to invite her to inhale our northern breezes; and I own I should like, as we row or sail about on the lake at Glenlonely, to hear those duets you used to sing with Miss Fitz-Darrell, and the glees in which Hope has joined. At any rate, if you come to the Highlands, you will find us there, and a hearty welcome."

Captain Greville blushed as he replied, "I shall find everything that can make earth a Paradise if you are all there."

And, confused at having betrayed so much emotion, he hurried away.

"I suppose that will be a match, Hope," said Lord Glenlonely, kindly. "Well, she's a nice girl, and he's a fine, soldierly young fellow, to whom her little fortune would be a great advantage, as it would enable him to purchase a step or two; and, as she has no parents, a husband's protection would be invaluable, if they like each other. I'll give her away myself, and give them a wedding breakfast too."

"How kind you are to every one, my lord!" said Hope, taking his hand and kissing it, as a grandchild might have done; and the next moment, hearing Lady Glenlonely's bell ring loud and impatiently, she tripped lightly away.

Lady Glenlonely made no objection to the proposed invitation to Nessy (now Miss Fitz-Darrell).

But there were so many things to be done, that Hope did not find a moment for the perusal of her precious volume (the journal of her poor mother).

Late at night the box containing all the relics of that unhappy lady arrived, so neatly covered with black tarpaulin by Tom Trudge, that it was quite a respectable addition to Hope Evermore's luggage.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—NO. VI.

"I HAVE been thinking again and again, Wilton," said I, "of a host of whelks springing from those froth-like masses you have recently described; are the egg-clusters of other molluscs equally curious?"

"They are," he replied; "but they are commonly found in deeper water. Other creatures are much more frequent on rocky ground, preferring, it must be admitted very naturally, a fixed nursery to one borne hither and thither by the waters. There is, however, one species of sea-snail having a polished, light-brown shell, elegantly marked with dark streaks and spots, which either leaves its cluster of eggs loose in sandy places, or attaches it to any object so slightly that it often becomes so. These greatly differ from the eggs of the whelk. They are firmly gelatinous, or of the consistency of gristle, nearly or quite transparent; in shape resembling not a bubble or an urn, but the hoof of an animal; and moreover, they are slightly coated with fine sand. When dry, they have been compared to pieces of thin Scotch oat-bread. The eggs are defined in the surface of the mass by little hexagonal spaces. But the form of the curves which the hoof-like body assumes may well awaken, as the justly celebrated Dr. Harvey remarks, special admiration, for they fit it for lying on loose sand without becoming deeply buried beneath the surface."

"Well! that is certainly the most remarkable fact that you have mentioned as to molluscs' eggs. Were they to sink into the sand, the young would perish, and so the calamity is averted by a special curve, which the mass assumes whenever it is extruded from the body of the parent. Who, then, can reckon up the millions of instances that have occurred without a single failure as to this form? What a proof is here of the hand—the mind of the Infinite!"

"Assuredly, my friend, facts meet us every moment in the study of God's creatures which, if they cannot make Atheism blush, must strike it dumb. To employ the words of Spenser—

'Look on the frame
Of this wyde universe, and therein read
The endless kind of creatures which, by name,
Thou canst not count, much less their nature's aim,
And which are made with wondrous wise respect,
And all with admirable beauty deckt.'

Hence it was the devout Fenelon exclaimed—"O my God, he who does not see thee in thy works has seen nothing! He who does not confess thy hand in the beautiful productions of this well-ordered world is a stranger to the best affections of the heart. He exists as though he existed not, and his life is no more than a dream!" Not only is every creature precisely adapted to drop into the niche he was ordained to fill, but there is no arrangement whatever in its entire economy that has not stamped upon it the same absolute perfection. Take, as an example, the hinge of this shell that lies in our path. What can be more complete than its obvious mechanism! The tooth-like parts are exactly adapted the one to the other, and then they are united by a ligament no less appropriate. In this shell the ligament was composed of two kinds of texture: the one, which is always external, is perfectly inelastic, the other, on the contrary, is highly elastic, having more of the proportions of cartilage. This portion is formed of parallel series of condensed transverse fibres, passing from the hinge of one valve of the shell to the corresponding part of the other valve, and having generally a deep black colour, and a pearly lustre. The cartilage is always situated within the ligament, sometimes in immediate contact, and forming with it one mass, and at others, placed at a distance, in a triangular cavity, among the teeth of the hinge. Now, what is the end of these simple, yet complicated arrangements? The bivalve mollusc, you observe, must have its two shells generally gaping, as we may say, that its gills may obtain air, and its stomach food, as the waters of the sea enter, and bathe its little body; and the elasticity of the cartilage is just what is required that these purposes may be answered."

"Is the shell closed by the same means?"

"No. Even so humble a part as the cartilage of a mollusc is not to be overworked, or to expend unnecessarily its vital force. All that is required of it is done when the valves are kept duly apart. That when danger is apprehended by the mollusc they may be instantly closed, he has one, two, or it may be a greater number of strong muscles placed between the valves, by which his dwelling is made secure. The force with which this is done is often surprising. Linnaeus mentions a giant clam, which, he says, weighed 498 pounds, and furnished 128 men with a day's food, and so great was the strength of its muscles, that, by suddenly closing its valves, it cut asunder a ship's cable. The hinge of another of these creatures has a cartilage of a dull colour, but when duly cut and polished, it is as beautifully iridescent as opal."

"There is no resisting an argument for the perfection of every part of a creature's economy, Wilton, when you can sustain it by such demonstrations as these."

"They are innumerable," he added. "Take another from the fleshy piece of the common cockle, called 'the foot,' which is, assuredly, a most serviceable instrument. Often have I seen it vigorously digging a domicile for the creature in the sand, and with equal alacrity preparing for its exit. Like our lower extremities, it enables the cockle to advance and to retreat. Unlike our limbs, however, this foot can lengthen itself at pleasure, and lock itself to any object by its extremity, when the mollusc wishes to descend; and the animal can thus shorten it and bring the shell to its point, cutting the sand with the edge. It can also curve the foot into an arch when it chooses to spring, then quickly straighten it again, and thus raise the whole body with much agility. It can even jump above the soil to a considerable height by a similar manœuvre."

"And this remarkable foot, I suppose you would maintain, is granted to no insignificant creature."

"Assuredly. Who will undertake to calculate its millions? A large kind called the red nose, with a solid, coarsely wrinkled shell, is abundant at Torbay. If you visit that place at spring tides, you may see them appearing just above the surface. The people gather them in baskets and panniers, and after placing them in cold spring water for a few hours, they fry the molluscs in a batter made of crumbs of bread, and thus obtain a wholesome and savoury dish. Children gather cockles on the sandy shore, and eat them raw at all parts of our coasts. Their shells, strewn about the doors of cottages and along the neighbouring alleys and lanes, show how plentifully they have regaled the indwellers. They were almost entirely the means of subsistence to the poorer people in the Orkney Islands, during a great failure of the potato crop. And many a traveller in lands far distant has told of their worth. The shell, moreover, has its subordinate uses, as when it is employed in the Hebrides, as it is to the present day, for skinning milk; and, if you believe Macpherson, in the feast of shells, celebrated in the days of Fingal, it was the sliga-crechin, or the drinking-shell."

"A goodly array of services assuredly rendered by the cockle to human kind; but what is the shell which you just picked up?"

"It is a scallop," said Wilton, "whose family is extensively known, richly tinted as they are with brown and orange. So common is the speckled scallop that we can rarely walk over the sand without seeing it. Its tints vary in different individuals, but they are most frequently of a reddish brown, or deeper orange hue; the older specimens being mottled with white. Look, too, at this one, and you will see the colouring of the upper valve is much more vivid than that of the lower one. Why, then, is this? Light acts much more freely upon it than it can on the valve beneath. The splendid hues of shells brought from the East arise from the brilliant light of that region. And if in our wanderings we should find a shell enveloped in a sponge, or deep in the sand, or in some shady place, in which the mollusc liked to live, you may depend upon it it will be much paler than that of a creature delighting in the sunbeams."

"I can believe that fully, should we not actually find such a shell. If the gardener wants his celery or endive to be duly blanched, he shuts them up from the light by the earth he gathers about them; on the other hand, where can we find birds so gorgeously arrayed as those which are brought from the tropics? and even humanity itself loses its florid hues, and becomes pallid and sickly when consigned to those cellars and other underground dwellings which have long remained, in some places, a foul blot on our boasted civilisation. But let me not interrupt you."

"The coast-dwellers," said Wilton, "are accustomed to cook the mollusc of the scallop with bread crumbs in its shell, and also to fry it for the table.

HINGE OF SHELL.

The women and children also form the shells into watch-pockets for our bed-heads, and pincushions for the gentler sex. Linnæus considered that as such shells were found abundantly among oyster-beds, the scallop was a species of oyster—a kind of 'country cousin' to the suburban 'native'; but as this mollusc differs alike in itself and its dwelling from the oyster, it has been detached from it, and that very properly, by later naturalists. Some of the scallops are found in the seas of most climates, and in great abundance on the coast of Palestine. The French denominate these shells pelerines, or pilgrims, and they are still called in other lands, and especially in Spain and Portugal, shells of St. James. Are you familiar, may I ask, with the history of that personage?"

"Not particularly," said I. "At all events, I have no doubt you can tell me much in reference to him that will be novel and valuable."

"Of that you will be better prepared to judge presently. However, according to the legend, a star pointed out the place where his body was concealed, and hence it was called Compostella, from campus, a field, and stella, a star, and became, in fact, a town in the ancient kingdom of Galicia; but, in later times, having the name it still bears of Santiago, which is literally, the city of St. James. Hence, in the middle ages, the pilgrimages to Compostella;—those 'excursion trips' of the time—which, as Chaucer has shown, having no little merriment and fun under a thin guise of religion, were so popular among the middle classes, and so profitable to the priests. It became, therefore, a practice for pilgrims to the shrine of St. James, to ornament their cloaks and hats with scallop-shells; and no fewer than three popes, Alexander III., Gregory IX., and Clement V., actually issued bulls, exclusively granting to the archbishops of Compostella a faculty to excommunicate all persons who should sell these shells to pilgrims anywhere except in that city. Fuller, that fine, quaint old writer, who abounds in recondite learning, and uses it with no little effect, asserts that scallop-shells were assumed because they were used for cups and dishes by pilgrims in Palestine; and derives the armorial bearings of the Villiers family—a cross charged with scallop-shells—from the crusaders. The term escallopée, used in heraldry, denotes a shield covered with scallop-shells; these being, however, peculiarly and judiciously arranged, for one is not placed immediately over the other, but each overlays a part of two."

"You have in this instance, Wilton, as in many others, added to my small stock of knowledge. Shakespeare describes Ophelia as putting a question and then answering it:—

'How should I your true love know
From another one?
By his cockle-hat and staff,
And his sandal shoon.'

The 'cockles' with which she supposed the hat to be arrayed were, of course, scallops, than which no symbol of pilgrimage was better known. Thus, an old chronicler, describing a masque performed in the presence of Queen Elizabeth, says:—'A pilgrim appeared, clad in a coat of russet velvet, fashioned to his call, his hat being of the same, with scallop-shells of cloth and silver'—doubtless in conformity with the ordinary representations of St. James himself; though, in Spain, he frequently appears an armed cavalier, like our patron saint, St. George of Cappadocia, whose golden image is so often employed to brighten our prospects, and to cure with sovereign efficacy so many human ills.

"Here," said Wilton, "is a member of a small but still important tribe of molluscs. There used to be a conundrum, 'Why have the mussels in the Bay of Dublin no beards?' and the answer was, 'Because there are so many razor fish there.' Such was the solen, the inmate of these long and narrow shells, reminding us of a pod or seed-vessel of a plant. They are longer and narrower than any other shells. Aristotle, describing one species, says, 'It buries itself in the sand at the depth of about two feet; it can sink or raise itself at will, but it does not leave its hole. It is alarmed by noise, and, when frightened, buries itself with great rapidity.' Now, this description of the ancient philosopher accords precisely with the habits of our British species. One, the pod razor-shell, is covered with a light brown or olive green skin, which, when removed, shows the shell beneath to be white, with a few dull purple bands. This, which is the largest of the British species, varies from three or four to eight inches in length. The French call it manche de couteau, and it certainly bears no small resemblance to a knife-handle. The mollusc is good for food; hence women and children look for the holes the solens have made in the sand, and then, putting in a long bent wire, drive them from their hiding-places, and take them captive. More slender than this one is the sabre razor-shell, which inhabits deeper water."

"I have seen," said I, "some shells which look as if they had been rolled up cylindrically; what are they called?"

"Voluta," said Wilton. "Some bear the name of Mitres, from their being like the head-coverings of certain distinguished ecclesiastics. One kind, of a pear shape, about half an inch long, nearly as broad, and of a dusky white colour, is held sacred in China. Shells of this species are valued at considerable sums. They are kept in pagodas by the priests, who sometimes use them in administering medicine to the sick, and in anointing with holy oil kings and other rulers. But here is a riddle for you; What man of modern times derived the greatest advantage from a shell?"

"Some one who discovered in it a pearl of great value."

"No; guess again."

"The man who found out how to engrave such shells as we see exposed for sale, or to sculpture others like cameos; and pressing a large number into the market at once, but in distant places, laid the basis of a considerable fortune?"

"No. I am thinking of what is more precious than gold. Try once more."

"Well, I have tried, with no result; so, I give it up."

"One day, not very long ago, a labouring man was engaged in working a quarry in a lofty wall of cliffs that overhangs the northern shore of the Moray Frith. In the course of the first day's toil, he picked up a nodular mass of blue limestone; and, thinking he should like to know whether anything, or what was within, he laid it open by a stroke of his hammer. The result was astonishing and delighting. His eye fell on a beautifully finished piece of sculpture—one of the volutes, apparently, of an Ionic capital. Now the question arose, 'Is there such another curiosity in the whole world?' He determined on trying the experiment. He broke open a few other nodules of similar appearance—for they lay pretty thickly on the shore—and found that there might be. In one of these were what seemed to be the scales of fishes, and the impressions of a few minute bivalves prettily striated; and in the centre of another there was actually a piece of decayed wood. Of all nature's riddles these seemed to him at once the most interesting and the most difficult to expound. The mind of the quarryman had now received an impulse to which he had before been a stranger; it proceeded from effort to effort until its accumulation of knowledge was large, its power of reasoning singularly acute, and its imaginative faculty of no ordinary vigour. Another station in society is now occupied by the quarryman. Before long we see him, with surprising intelligence and labour, penning a volume; it is issued from the press, bearing on its title-page, 'The Old Red Sandstone.' It is perused by the most scientific geologists of the day, and they speak of it in terms of high but just laudation. And ere this, you have anticipated my mention of the name of Hugh Miller, on some of whose works you have doubtless pondered, whose death awakened sorrow not only in this but in other kingdoms, and to whose genius, industry, and fame, a grateful memorial is now being reared."

"Yes, most deservedly. The issues of that broken nodule, and the discovery of that fossil shell, are deeply interesting; and you will not fail to remember that it was when the crystal fell from Haüy's hand pleasure followed quickly on the heels of regret—for, though he looked only for his broken mineral, he discovered the principle which, duly worked out, became speedily the science of Crystallography."

The nature and properties of the "Rock Murex," and the "Lanthina," represented in our illustration, were explained in the preceding number.

The Matron.

NO. XXXVI.

EXPERTNESS in needlework promotes economy in dress; and economy in dress is a virtue that every wife and mother should try to practice.

Burns, in his "Model Housewife," represents her as capable of making "aid claise look amaisst as gude as new;" and how is this to be done, but by a clever needle-woman, and by one who can not only cut and contrive, but also mend, piece, and turn everything to advantage?

In a family where small means are made the most of, the old clothes of the father and mother are always made up for the little son and daughter, and those of the elder children for the younger ones. In making little coats and dresses out of larger ones, the worn or faded parts can be cut away, and if the remaining part is not quite as strong as new stuff, it may last for one season, and a certain saving may thus be effected.

In the last chapter I gave directions in different branches of needlework; not that I suppose my female readers are ignorant of this important art, but few among us are so perfect in practice but that a little recurrence to theory improves us; besides, written rules may assist mothers in teaching their little daughters, and help elder sisters in directing the younger ones.

Having spoken of hemming, sewing, running, and stitching, I now come to binding. Binding is put on to different kinds of stuffs in preference to hemming them. Flannel should be bound. A thin tape is sometimes used for the purpose, and sometimes a "flannel binding" is placed on the right side of the flannel. On this side it should show but little, and be hemmed down very neatly after having been run on with small stitches on the other side.

Gathering requires even more care than binding. Divide the stuff to be gathered into halves and quarters, and mark the divisions with a stitch or a pin. In a similar manner halve and quarter the piece on which the gathered article is to be sewn. Begin the gathers about twelve threads from the top, taking three threads on the needle, and leaving four, and proceed in this manner until one quarter is gathered. Having fastened the thread by twisting it round a pin, stroke down the gathers with a strong needle. In exactly the same manner proceed with the three remaining quarters. When you have gathered them all, take out the pins and see that the gathers of each quarter answer to those of the piece to which it is to be sewn, and mind, this sewing must be very neat, and it must take a slanting direction, and you must only fasten on one of the gathers at a time.

Puffing is employed for frills, and the effect of it is pleasing. You must proceed according to the rules given for common gathering. Then after the gathers are well stroked down, you must gather again under the first gathering, and just at the depth you intend the puffing to be. When you sew on the first gathering of the frill to the gown or frock you have trimmed, mind you do so at a distance answering to the width of the puffing. The second gathering should be sewn to the edge so as to form a full hem.

There is a mode of joining linen or cotton by means of what is called German hemming. It is done as follows: Turn the two raw edges down (both towards you), say one below the other, and hem or fell it to the piece against which you have laid it. Then turn the sleeve or whatever you may have been working at, and fell down the other edge.

For working linen, fine thread is better than cotton. Both threads and cottons should be kept in boxes, for exposure to the air and light injures them. This remark is also applicable to hooks and eyes, and all metal implements.

Some years ago there was a tendency to undervalue needlework in female education. People are somewhat wiser now; but too much preference is given to ornamental over useful work. This partakes of the evil tendency of modern education—all for show and society, and little or nothing for home and its comforts.

The needle was held in great estimation, even by the ancients. Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, was supposed to patronise it.

If we turn to Scripture, we find David speaking of "a raiment of needlework;" and in modern times how touchingly the amiable poet Cowper alludes to the use of the needle, speaking to his Mary, whom he loved in her feeble old age as much as in all the brilliancy of youth. Alluding to her expertness in needlework, before age had impaired her powers, he says,

"Thy needles, once a shining store,
For my sake restless heretofore,
Now rust, disused, and shine no more,
My Mary."

But let the young ladies who read the poem from which these lines are quoted remember that Cowper adds,

"But all their threads, with magic art,
Have wound themselves around my heart."

Certain it is, there is hardly any qualification in a young woman that pleases a sensible man more than proficiency with the needle. Without undervaluing any pleasing talent, he sees in it a better guarantee for domestic comfort than in all the brilliant accomplishments acquired at fashionable schools.

A KISS.

Hamid seal of soft affection,
Tend'rest pledge of future bliss,
Dearest tie of young connection,
Love's first snow-drop—Virgin Kiss

WHEN Wesley was once reproached for the application of some popular tune to a sacred hymn, he replied, that surely they would not have him leave all the good music to the evil one! In the spirit of this great man it might be recommended that, if there be a giddy vagrant abroad, corrupted in his time by evil communication, with some touch of virtue in his nature, and once the friend and companion of all the gentle deities that strewed the path of matrimony with flowers, it should be attempted to recall him to the circle of his ancient friends. We know not but that, by the force of example and timely admonitions, the conversion of that gay prodigal—the Kiss—may be compassed; and if his immediate recantation be a blessing not to be expected, at least we are not precluded from venturing to put him upon reflection, and awaken him to a useful sense of his danger, by briefly calling to his mind the leading events of his past career.

Kissing was an act of religion in ancient Rome. The nearest friend of a dying person performed the rite of receiving his soul by a kiss, supposing that it escaped through his lips at the moment of expiration. Spenser, in his Pastoral Elegy on the death of Sir Philip Sidney, mentions it as a circumstance which renders the loss of his illustrious friend more to be lamented, that—

"None was nigh his eye-lids up to close,
And kiss his lips."

A little after, he introduces the lady, "the dearest love" of the deceased, weeping over him—

"She with sweet kisses sucked the wasting breath
Out of his lips, like lilies pale and soft."

The sacredness of the kiss was inviolable amongst the Romans for a long time. At length it was degraded into a current form of salutation. Pliny ascribes the introduction of the custom to the degeneracy of the Roman ladies, who, in violation of the hereditary delicacy of the females of Rome, descended to the indulgence of wine. Kissing was resorted to by those gentle, "good easy" husbands (who knew better than to risk the tumbling of the house about their ears), as the most effectual and courteous process to ascertain the quality of their wives' stolen libations; and Cato the Elder recommends the plan to the serious attention of all careful heads of families. The kiss was, in process of time, diffused generally as a form of salutation in Rome, where men testified their regard and the warmth of their welcome for each other, chiefly by the number of their kisses.

It was allowed sometimes, in the case of an inferior to one above him, to kiss the right hand—a custom which is remarkably recognised to this day amongst the Spaniards in their letters. Amongst the early Christians, the kiss of peace was a sacred ceremony, observed upon their most solemn occasions. It was called signaculum orationis—the seal of prayer; and was a symbol of that mutual forgiveness and reconciliation which the Church required, as an essential condition, before any one was admitted to the sacraments. The Roman civilians, at length, took the kiss under their protection. Their code has defined, with exquisite accuracy, the nature, limits, incidents, &c., of the Right of Kissing: although we do not find that this sort of property holds a place amongst the incorporeal hereditaments of our own laws. The kiss had all the virtue of a bond, granted as a seal to the ceremony of betrothing; and if the husband elect broke the engagement, repenting of what he had done, he surrendered a moiety of the presents received in the ceremony of betrothing, in consequence of the violence done to the modesty of the lady by a kiss!

In much later times the kiss was esteemed to be a ceremony of particular obligation, as could be shown in a thousand instances. The gentle Julia, in the "Two Gentlemen of Verona," after exchanging a ring with her lover, completes the contract by a kiss—

"And seal the bargain with a holy kiss."

The same lady seems to entertain a high estimate of the efficacy of a kiss; for in the throes of her remorse, a little before, for having torn into fragments the love-letter of Proteus, she hits upon the following expedient:—

"I'll kiss each several paper for amends."

Not satisfied, however, with this act of compunction, and opining that a kiss is the "sovereignest thing on earth for an inward bruise" she thus apostrophises her absent lover:—

"My bosom, as a oed,
Shall lodge thee till thy wound be thoroughly heal'd,
And thus I search it with a sovereign kiss."

Nor ought we to be surprised at the veneration which has been universally allowed to the ceremony of kissing, when we remember the important functions which devolve upon the lips in the economy of the human face. It is true they have not been thought worthy of a place in coats of armour, like the eyes, or raised to a level with the nose and ears, which have, ere now, been the objects of much costly decoration; but they form that privileged feature which represents, in their turn, the three most ennobling gifts of our nature—prophecy, poetry, and eloquence. The words "his lips were touched with fire," familiarly express the power of prophecy.

It would be a useless piece of industry to collect here the thousand elaborate and ingenious things which poets, old and young, ancient and modern, have wrought into the description of a kiss. The choice of all the sweet-scented flowers, and the most approved juices, whether for their gratefulness to the taste or the smell, have been from time to time defrauded of their exquisite properties in favour of some particular class of kisses, to which the following one, I suppose, belongs:—

"Tis every aromatic breeze
Wafted from Africa's spicy trees,
'Tis honey from the fragrant hive,
Which chemist bees with care derive,
From all the newly open'd flowers."

It is no unfavourable step towards the acquisition of better habits in future, that the kiss has been emancipated from the iron dominion of the law. The gallant, gay creation of France has done this for the world; but, as it will be the case in revolutions of all kinds, the advantage of the change has been hurt by some abuses. The ingenious Montaigne indeed deeply deplores the diffusion of the spirit of kissing in France, because he thinks the prevalence of that custom takes away from the grace and favour of a kiss, and complains of the hard fate to which ladies are exposed, in being obliged to lend their lips to every one with the appearance of a gentleman. "As for our parts," he adds, "we are no gainers by it, for, taking the sex in general, for three pretty girls we must kiss fifty ugly ones, and to a squeamish stomach like mine, a bad kiss will not compensate for a good one." The last instance in which the kiss formed the subject of serious regulation belongs to a barbarous people. The Empress Catherine of Russia instituted assemblies of men and women to promote the cultivation of polite manners. Among the rules for maintaining the decency of those assemblies, she directed that "no gentleman should force a kiss from, or strike a woman in the assembly, under pain of exclusion."

WHICH causes a girl the most pleasure, to hear herself praised, or another girl run down?

It is recorded that an extraordinary surgical operation was lately performed, which killed the patient. The doctor, at the last accounts, was doing well.

In the days when rogues and thieves were branded with the letters R. and T., lettered men were more common than they are now.

THE STRONGEST KIND OF HINT.—A young lady asking a gentleman to see if one of her rings will go on his little finger.

A FELLOW was brought to King James I., and it was said he could eat a whole sheep at a meal. "What else can he do," asked the king, "more than other men?" "Nothing," was the reply. "Hang him, then," said James; "for 'tis a pity a man should live who eats the share of twenty men, and can do no more than one."

A PRINTER'S TOAST.—Woman, the fairest work of creation. The edition being extensive, let no man be without a copy.

We have heard of a desperate fellow, who swore that he would commit suicide, even if he should perish in the attempt.

A GENTLEMAN said at table that he wished he could manage without servants, as they were more plague than profit. "Why not have a dumb waiter?" suggested a friend. "Oh, no, I have tried them—they don't answer."

SOME writer exclaims, "What is beauty without soap?" Sometimes fashionable beauty is nothing with soap. We have seen many a cheek from which the beautiful red-rose hue would vanish before that useful article like a ghost before the sunrise.

A DUTCHMAN was relating his marvellous escape from drowning, when thirteen of his companions were lost by the upsetting of a boat, and he alone saved. "And how did you escape their fate?" asked one of the hearers. "I did not co in te pote!" was the Dutchman's placid answer.

AN ILLUSTRATION.—A distinguished divine, on a certain occasion, while preaching with his usual eloquence and power, said, "Brethren, I sometimes illustrate my subject in this manner;" and suiting the action to the word, put his handkerchief to his nose, and blew a blast loud enough to awake "the seven sleepers." That was not the intended illustration, but some of his hearers thought it was.

BACHELORS are not entirely lost to the refinement of sentiment, for the following toast was given by one of them at a celebration:—"The ladies—sweet briars in the garden of life."

WHEN young, we trust ourselves too much, and we trust others too little when old. Rashness is the error of youth, timid caution of age. Manhood is the isthmus between the two extremes; the ripe, the fertile season of action, when alone we can hope to find the head to contrive, united with the hand to execute.

AN Irishman has just discovered a substitute for potatoes. It consists of pork and cabbage. He says that he has tried various other things, but this is the only "substitute" he'd like to warrant.

DURING the examination of a witness as to the locality of the stairs in a house, the counsel asked him, "Which way did the stairs run?" The witness, a noted wag, replied that, "One way they ran upstairs, but the other way they ran downstairs." The learned counsel winked his eyes, and then took a look at the ceiling.

It is extraordinary how many defects we can discern in a friend after we have quarrelled with him. The same remark applies to a woman after she has rejected us.

T. P.—It was 192 years ago that the great fire of London took place. This calamity happened a year after the city had been visited by the awful and never-to-be-forgotten plague. The fire broke out on the 2nd of September, in 1666. It began in Pudding-lane and ended at Pie-corner. It is said to have originated in a baker's house. Breaking out in the dead of the night, and fanned by a strong wind, it spread devastation far and near, destroying 13,200 dwelling-houses, 430 streets, and many hospitals, libraries, schools, and stately edifices. From the Tower to the Temple Church 436 acres were covered with ruins. It is a remarkable fact that this fire, so merciless to property, was merciful to human life. Charles the Second seemed an altered man during the fearful ravages of this fire; and his humanity, judgment, and integrity were worthy of all praise. At his suggestion houses were blown up to stop the communication of the flames. His genius was everywhere; his presence encouraged and calmed the awe-stricken citizens, and for a brief period Charles the Second was the guardian angel of his people. To commemorate this awful conflagration, the monument was erected on Fish Street Hill. It stands at a distance of two hundred feet from the house in Pudding-lane, where the fire is supposed to have originated. It was erected by Sir Christopher Wren at a cost of £13,700. It was commenced in 1671, and completed in 1677.

R. S.—You wish us to tell you the exact position of Valentia, and also to give you some particulars of the progress of the Atlantic Telegraph, the final triumph of which has been achieved through so many difficulties. In the first place, Valentia is a small island, to the south-west of Ireland, off the coast of Kerry. On Tuesday, the 10th ult., news was received at Valentia that the use and adjustment of special instruments for speaking had commenced at Newfoundland. It seems the first words received were "Repeat, please," and "Please send slower for the present," spelt in full. The signals for repeat were sent frequently, proving that at first the instruments were not adjusted with sufficient accuracy. Articulate messages now pass along the bottom of the Atlantic, by a chord as sensitive as the nerves that communicate with the human brain and the organs of the body. All the dangers and adventures of the Agamemnon, in laying the Atlantic cable, would make an interesting volume. Several times anxiety was experienced on account of the failure of the continuity signals. Twice, vessels bore down upon the enterprising ship, threatening destruction. A whale crossed the line, and actually grazed it. Then came the fear of damages to the cable. It will easily be understood that the intrepid adventurers reached the shore in a state of considerable excitement.

STEPHEN.—You ask if the figure of Britannia on the coin of this realm is a fancy figure, or taken from the antique.

According to the historian Grammont, it is neither one nor the other, but a full length portrait of Frances Theresa Stuart, Duchess of Lennox, painted by Lely, and still extant at Lethington Castle, East Lothian, Scotland. It was Charles the Second who caused this lady to be represented as the emblematical figure of Britannia. The portrait represents a tall woman, with that fulness of feature and person which characterised the beauties of the reign of the "Merry Monarch."

LAURA.—It was at Berlin and in the Berlin Schloss that the Queen was for the first time the guest of her daughter, the Princess Frederick William of Prussia. Berlin, about which you are so curious, is well worthy the inspection of travellers; but its beauties are rather those of art than of nature. Berlin is the capital of Brandenburg and of the Prussian monarchy. This city is built on a regular plan. The Brandenburg Gate (through which our gracious Queen entered the city on the 16th ultimo) is considered the most simple and majestic portal in Europe. This matchless gate forms the entrance into the Linden Strasse, which, as a street, is perhaps without a rival. It is divided by double rows of linden, or lime-trees, into fine alleys, which afford delightful walks, and along which are ranged edifices of the most majestic and classical character. Among these are chiefly to be remarked the palace, situated on the Place de Gendarmes, seen along a line of lofty facade, ornamented with porticoes, statues, and every variety of sculptural decoration. The streets and squares are broad, spacious, and regular. The river Spree, which divides Berlin, has the appearance of a broad ditch, navigated by flat-bottomed boats. On the opposite side is the old town, a scene of traffic, with little pretension to beauty. Berlin carries on extensive manufactures of linen, woollens, and silk. It has also a royal manufactory of porcelain. The trade of Berlin is very great; for the city communicates through the Spree both with the Elbe and the Oder. Berlin's university contains 2,100 students; and its library, cabinets of natural history, and botanic gardens, are celebrated all over Europe.

HENRY GRAY.—It is hardly fair to call upon an author to state all the sources from which he has drawn the characters and incidents in his works; all we can say is that our correspondent has made a very shrewd guess, but we must decline to enter into particulars.

R. JORDAN.—A proper use of fruit greatly contributes to the preservation of health. But you must partake of it in moderation, once or twice a day. Ripe fruit quenches thirst, and cools the system.

ANDREW.—You ask us if it be possible to keep a wife and three children in respectable circumstances on the sum of 30s. per week. Much depends on the meaning you attach to the word "respectable." We know several sober and industrious mechanics and artisans who support their families decently and comfortably upon much less than 30s. per week.

M. S. J.—A marriage under the circumstances you name would be perfectly legal; the language of the law being—Consensus non concubitus facit nuptias.

A CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER (Exeter).—A celebrated sauce for fish, game, steaks, &c., is thus prepared:—Walnut pickle, mushroom ketchup, and soy, each half a pint; chopped cloves of garlic and anchovies, six of each; cayenne pepper and bruised cloves, of each half a dram. Mix, simmer for ten minutes; then strain and bottle. If garlic be disliked, it can be omitted, or shallots may be substituted.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—"The History," &c., by Diodorus Siculus, is but a portion of the original work in forty books, of which only about fifteen remain. He is often erroneous in his chronology, and some of his narrations are fabulous; but the latter part of the work is much prized by the students of history for the valuable information it contains. Several editions of the work have been published.

A MOTHER.—The best application for all kinds of burns and scalds, is an immediate application of dry wheat flour. This at once shuts out air, soothes the irritation, and dries up the fluids thrown out. And in cuts, on the hand or elsewhere, bring the divided parts together, hold them there steadily, and cover them up closely either with adhesive plaster or clean linen rag, tied on firmly, and the healing will go on so long as there is no disturbance. Don't be in a hurry to remove the binding; if you disturb the half-formed new flesh, a sore will be the consequence.

M. W., POLLY, AND MARIA NORTON.—To preserve rose leaves you have only to gather the roses when in full blossom, on a dry day, and when the sun has dissipated the dew; pick the leaves off singly, spread them out on a sheet of white paper in the shade, and when they are sufficiently dried scatter them in your drawers, or put them into small muslin bags. A few lavender flowers, dried as above, and mixed with the rose leaves, will greatly improve the odour.

KATE J.—The price of an ordinary marriage license is £2 12s. 6d.; of a special license, £25.

E. STANTON.—Where gold or silver fish are placed in vessels in rooms, they should be kept in soft water. The water will require to be changed according to the size of the vessel or the number of fish kept therein, but it should not be done too often. A vessel that will hold about a pail of water, may sustain three fish for a fortnight, and so in proportion. A few crumbs of bread may be dropped in the water once or twice a week. Your other questions must stand over.

JACOB FAITHFUL.—Your "few trifles" have appeared in many publications. The process of cleaning ink-stained velvet in desks, &c., would be more troublesome and expensive than re-covering them.

D. U.—In reply to your question about the commencement of the middle ages, we reply that the beginning of this period has been fixed at A.D. 451. They are supposed to end with the revival of classical literature in the fifteenth century, that stage of transition, combining in itself several of the most striking characteristics of the two states of society, between which it forms the interval.

NERO.—White wax is pure bees' wax bleached by exposing it, in thin flakes, to the action of the sun, wind, and rain. You should frequently change the surface thus exposed by remelting it, and reducing it again to thin flakes. The process being somewhat tedious, you had better procure it at once from some oilman or waxchandler.

B. FIELD.—The monster nugget of pure gold recently found at Ballarat, Victoria, weighs 2,217 ounces. It is described as about twenty inches long by six or seven broad. It had a narrow escape of being two nuggets instead of one, for, at a point one third from the end, its continuity is only maintained by a slender neck, which is so slight that the men were afraid to handle their prize much, lest they might break it in two. Hence it has been called "The Siamese Twin." In shape it has a resemblance to a skeleton horse's head and shoulders, the narrow part we have mentioned representing the neck.

A DECEIVED ONE.—In your case there is not any redress. Promises merely verbal, and not in writing, and signed by the party to answer for the debt of another, are of no avail in law, although they are commonly thought binding. Thus, if two persons go to a shop, and one orders goods, and the other says, "If he does not pay I will," he is not bound unless his engagement is reduced to writing, but, with an honourable man, his word is his bond.

GEORGE.—In your anxiety about your sister, every feeling heart will sympathise; but even had she the opportunity of visiting a warmer country, it is by no means certain that she would benefit by the change. Sir Charles Clarke disputes the doctrine of change of climate being of use to persons suffering from consumption. Dr. Burgess, an eminent Scotch physician, is of the same opinion as Sir Charles Clarke. That warmth is not itself beneficial, he proves from the fact that consumption exists in all latitudes. In India and Africa it is as frequent as in Europe and America. At Malta, in the genial Mediterranean, one-third of the deaths among the soldiers are from consumption. At Nice, in the south of France, there are more of the natives who die of consumption than in any English town of equal population. In Florence the disease is marked by a suffocating character, and by a frightfully rapid progress; and in Madeira no local disease is more common than consumption.

CLARA CAREFUL.—Put a few drops of creosote in a saucer or on a piece of spongy paper, and place it in your safe or larder. This will drive away insects and cause the meat to keep sweet several days longer than otherwise. A small quantity added to wine or vinegar, will give a smoky flavour to meat or fish.

A FREEMAN.—Unless you can produce your indentures, you will find it difficult to establish your claim to the freedom of the city and the privileges of a freeman.

T. H. R. AND A SUFFERER.—The following will be found of great use as a collyrium, or wash for inflamed eyes:—Sulphate of zinc, 16 grains; tincture of opium, 2 drams; distilled water, 1 pint. Apply with a soft rag night and morning, or oftener if necessary.

OLD JEALOUS CHUTNEY.—The enigma you kindly sent us has already appeared in several publications.

J. M., JOHN WHITAKER, AND SOME OTHERS.—A good white varnish, suitable for maps, &c., on paper, is prepared thus:—Gum Sandarac, eight ounces; mastic, two ounces; Canada balsam, four ounces; spirits of wine, one quart. Dissolve in a gentle heat, or in a water bath. In a few days decant the clear. The maps, &c., should first have a coat or two of size made from isinglass, or cuttings of parchment. Crystal varnish may be purchased of most varnish makers.

RICHARD THOMAS.—You do not require a license as a draper, unless you hawk your goods.

A PLOUGHMAN (Selkirkshire).—Thirty-two numbers of this Paper may be had, post free, for 3s. 6d., upon application to Messrs. Petter and Galpin.

A BROTHER.—As the portrait was a gift, you cannot compel its return.

BALDY, A GARDENER, CYMRO, CARLETON, CAMERON, ANNIE, MALVINA, SIR C. FOURREAU, LA SAVOIR FAIRE, A. H. ST. CLAIR, DICK TABLETON, ANGELINA, W. MOLYNEUX, LILIAN, RICHARD TYRREL.—Some of these correspondents complain of a redundancy of hair, others that they have not so much as they wish, and others are dissatisfied with the colour of their hair. We have furnished information suited to these cases in former columns, which our correspondents will please to consult.

R. G. N., LILLIE, MARTHA, AN OLD SUBSCRIBER, GABRIELLE, J. TAYLOR, PAUL S. F., ALBIN, SUBSCRIBER TO THE NEW SERIES, J. L. STEVENSON, H. F. S., YOUNG MIDSHIPMAN, W. T., N. HOMO, L. TADFIELD, FLORA.—These correspondents, and several others whose signatures we have tried in vain to decipher, complain of corns, warts, pimples, red noses, freckles, &c.; directions for the cure of which we have several times given.

Civil Service Appointments.—Every post brings us inquiries concerning these; it is impossible, from the very slight information our correspondents furnish respecting themselves, to give very definite replies. But we are preparing a series of articles on the subject of these appointments, which will furnish such general information as may be useful in most of the cases.

C. S.—R.—A child born in France of English parents, would, on arriving at his maturity, be considered an Englishman.

Respectfully declined.—FELIX, A BIRTHDAY WISH, G. FISHER, R. THOMASON, W. HIBERNIA, E. F. G. S. A. CLAYTON, R. X., G. COOK, LUCY JOCELYN, S. L., GULIELMUS, T. W. A., A YOUNG BEGINNER, X. X. X., MY FIRST ATTEMPT, MARY G.

MABELINE, W. GREGSON, A. B. C., CHARLES, CALCUTTA, DICK TURPIN, F. M. J., J. NEEDFUL, DANGEROUS POSITION, SUFFERER, IMPATIENCE, A. BOOTHROYD, S. G., J. BEAL, W. W., and several other correspondents, are suffering from various ailments which require medical treatment.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAP. TER LXXXVIII.

Who steals my purse, steals trash;
But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which naught enriches him,
Yet leaves me poor indeed.—SHAKESPEARE.

NEVER did any man proceed with a lighter heart or more benevolent spirit to complete the work of reconciliation so happily commenced, than Peter Mangles did when he set out from Meldown Park to visit George Markham at the Elms. Although at times fretful and somewhat hasty in his temper, especially when anything went wrong in the City, the old man possessed a kind and forgiving heart, and in his simplicity—for he was exceedingly simple, out of business—judged every human being by the same standard that he did himself, carrying anger as the flint bears fire, a hasty spark and all was over.

"How happy George will be," he thought, as the carriage rolled along the common which extended between the hall and the seat of Mr. Thornton. "Of course he must have a share in the firm and take the name of Bently. Bently and Son!" he repeated several times to himself, with an air of intense satisfaction. "Mary must take care," he added, "that the name does not become extinct."

Peter had been accustomed for so many years to look upon our hero as lost for ever to his family, that the possibility of his return never entered into his speculations.

Next he wondered what Mary could possibly have meant when she spoke of consigning herself, and asking him to sign the invoice. On any other subject the phrase invoice and consignment would have delighted him, for he relished any allusion to business; but when his long-cherished plans were at stake—no, with all his love for the fair girl, Peter could not smile at that.

On reaching the Elms, he was shown into the library, where he found George Markham and his partner. The former had two open letters in his hand, and appeared greatly excited.

"How is my old friend?" inquired Mr. Thornton. "Better," replied the messenger of peace, as he believed himself, "though still weak and suffering. How can a man fail to be better who has just settled a bad account,—brought it to a satisfactory conclusion? His heart is as light as mine is."

Here the speaker looked around him as if exceedingly anxious to shake hands with some one.

CARUS STARTLED BY THE APPEARITION OF SMILES.

"Reconciled with his daughter?" exclaimed the manufacturer, with a benevolent smile. "I am heartily glad to hear it."

The husband of Rachel still remained silent.

"And you, George," said Peter, looking anxiously into his face, "are you not glad?"

"For my wife's sake, yes," replied Mr. Markham.

"And your child's?"

"Mary will be rich enough for happiness," observed her father.

"There is something more than money, or even business, necessary to make us happy in this world," answered the clerk; "and no one ought to know it, George, better than yourself. It is a heart at peace with all mankind. Richard feels it so; and this day will complete the work of reconciliation. Your father-in-law desires to see you."

"Reflect," whispered Mr. Thornton to his partner, who made no other reply than by glancing significantly at the open letters.

Peter Mangles walked up to him, and placed his hand affectionately upon his arm.

"What is the matter, George?" he asked. "Any bad news from the City? Any misfortune that money—"

"The greatest," interrupted the father of our hero. "One gold cannot gild, or success efface: a stain upon my good name—an impeachment upon that which, even in the midst of poverty and shame, the drunkard's degradation, I preserved pure and unsullied—my honesty. Read that—read that, and then judge my feelings."

The speaker, greatly excited, thrust the letters into the hands of his aged friend and benefactor.

The career of George Markham, since his reformation, had been one of unbroken prosperity; success had smiled upon his efforts, and he was now, not only a prosperous, but a wealthy man. The requirements of his rapidly increasing commerce rendered it advisable for him to open an account with the Bank of England, and he had made an application to that effect only two days before quitting London.

The letters were the reply to it.

The first was an official one, declining his account; the second contained a private communication from one of the directors, a personal friend, explaining the reasons of the refusal.

Letters written by Mr. Bently to his nephew, Carus Kearn, had been produced, in which the former accused his son-in-law with having abstracted certain valuable securities whilst in his employ.

Poor Peter groaned with mortification and disappointment as he finished reading them.

"The villain!" he exclaimed; "the heartless, ungrateful villain! I have long suspected this," he added; "and now that Mr. Bently now bitterly regrets his intemperate rashness."

"Intemperate!" repeated Mr. Markham, ironically. "I admire the word intemperate! The man who, in a cowardly and vindictive spirit, could blast the reputation of one as honest as himself, is a villain."

"Yes, yes!" muttered the clerk. "Carus is all that."

"I speak not of the nephew, whose pitiful malice I can despise, but of his uncle."

"Of your father-in-law!" exclaimed the old man, in a tone of astonishment, so naive that it made Mr. Thornton smile.

"Of him."

"George, George! is this just? Is it business-like? when I come with offers of peace and forgiveness. For your wife's sake, for Mary's sake, for all our sakes, recall that which I have said."

"Never!" interrupted the husband of Rachel; "there are injuries no atonement can efface, and this is one of them. I can forgive my father-in-law that he held back when a helping hand might have saved me, preserved a home for his daughter and her children; his wealth was his own, and he alone was answerable for the use he made of it. But when in his malice he assails my good name, brands me with dishonesty, I spurn the tie he only now remembers, and reject his offers with scorn and contempt. He shall not call me hypocrite," he added, bitterly, "as well as thief."

The speaker repeated the word thief several times, then passed his hand athwart his brow to hide the tears wounded pride wrung from him. As for Peter, he had sunk into a chair, where he sat gazing on him, a picture of helpless sorrow; the blow had all but overwhelmed him.

"You regard this affair too seriously," observed Mr. Thornton; "an accusation made at the moment of your marriage, and unsupported by proofs, can never weigh with honourable men. Your father-in-law has long since regretted it."

"He regret it! you do not know him, sir," interrupted his partner—"his heart is granite."

"George! George!" ejaculated the old clerk, "do not say such dreadful things."

"He does regret it," repeated the manufacturer, "and this unhappy circumstance justifies me in divulging a secret which otherwise I should have felt it my duty to have kept."

"A secret!"

"Who do you imagine first induced me to take you into my employ?"

"I know not," muttered the agitated man, who, writhing under the sting of an unmerited accusation, paid but slight attention to his words.

"Mr. Bently."

"Did you hear that, George?" demanded Peter Mangles, starting from his chair; "did you hear that?"

"True," continued Mr. Thornton, "that your own industry and good conduct did the rest, backed by the assistance of your kind friend here."

"I have no merit," exclaimed the clerk; "claim no merit. It was Richard who advanced the money."

In his anxiety to make peace between his employer and his son-in-law, the good old man forbore to explain all the circumstances attending the transaction.

"Mr. Bently!"

"Mr. Bently," repeated Peter; "won't that soften you? Think of your wife, George; recollect all that she has suffered, and don't cast a gloom over her happiness and Mary's. I speak not of your own or their interests, for I know that you are above such considerations."

"Had there been a reason—the shadow of a pretext for such an accusation," observed Markham, his resolution somewhat moved by the appeal.

"There was a reason," said Peter Mangles.

"This was uttered so seriously that it startled both his hearers, who eagerly called on him to explain himself."

"A few weeks previous to the return of Mr. Bently from abroad," continued the clerk, "I placed in the iron safe at his private residence securities belonging to the firm—Indian securities for ten thousand pounds. This took place just before your marriage with Rachel, when you were a frequent visitor at the house, George."

"Pray proceed," said the latter, impatiently.

"The next day they were missing," resumed the old man; "how, I have never been able to divine, for I slept with the keys under my pillow; but so it was; the following morning they were gone."

"And I have been all these years suspected of having taken them!" exclaimed Markham.

"Not by me, George," replied Peter; "not by me. Richard, it is true, suspected you; but I told him he was wrong—how correctly your petty-cash book always balanced when you were only a boy in the office—but he would not believe me. Anger at your marriage with Rachel had blinded his better judgment."

"Save his sense of justice."

"Well, George, perhaps it had," observed the old man, dolefully. "The best of us may detect an error in our accounts. In a moment of irritation, he wrote these letters to Carus which the rascal has made so infamous a use of. I know that he has repeatedly requested him to give them up, declaring his conviction of your innocence; but the hypocrite pretended he had destroyed them."

"How do you intend to act?" inquired Mr. Thornton of his partner, who paced the library several times before he could make up his mind to answer him.

"I shall return to London this very day," he said, at last.

"And not see your wife and Mary?" ejaculated the messenger, who trusted to their intercession to accomplish the rest.

"As a husband and a father," continued the speaker, without noticing the interruption, "my first duty is to preserve my name unblemished; I may one day have a son to inherit it. Should Providence restore him to me, I must be able to meet him without a blush. Heaven!" he added, "is there a pang—can human malice invent a torture so exquisite as to compel a parent to stand dishonoured in the presence of his child?"

Mr. Thornton pressed his hand in token of his sympathy.

"You are right," he said. "Your presence in London must give the lie to this most odious calumny. I will return with Peter to the hall and explain the cause of your absence to your wife. Come, old friend," he added, clapping the last-mentioned personage familiarly upon the shoulder, "the good work you have laboured for years to accomplish is only delayed; as we well know, a tangled account requires being carefully gone over."

This was one of those truths which appealed so directly to the clerk's experience and peculiar view of things, that, if it failed to reconcile him to the disappointment, it prevented his making any further attempt to induce George Markham to forego his resolution.

As the messenger returned to Meldown Park, accompanied by the owner of the Elms, it was arranged between them that the real cause of her husband's absence should be kept a secret not only from Rachel, but from her father.

"Could I have foreseen this happy change," observed Mr. Thornton, after explaining the motive of his visit to the invalid and Mrs. Markham, "I would have gone to London myself, where the presence of George or myself is imperatively necessary."

This, at least, was a truth, although kindly meant to mislead.

"Will he be absent long?" inquired Mr. Bently.

"Some days—a week at least," replied the partner of his son-in-law.

"We won't trouble you with business now, Richard," added Peter.

The merchant regarded both the speakers searchingly. The first one met his gaze without the slightest change of countenance, but the old clerk, who was the worst actor imaginable, grew exceedingly red in the face. Mr. Bently turned upon his pillow with a sigh, and asked no further questions.

By a dispensation of Providence, no less merciful than wise, affliction seldom overtakes us but a corresponding degree of strength is given to enable us to bear up against the blow. It proved so in the present instance; for, although the grandfather of our hero felt that in the loss he had sustained, his heart had received a wound which time might scar over but never heal, he found himself gradually recovering his former strength, and ere a week had elapsed was sufficiently strong, not only to quit his room, but, supported by the arm of Rachel or Mary, to take gentle exercise in the park.

Mother and daughter both wondered at the deep melanchole that weighed his spirits down—the feverish anxiety he expressed to quit a place now hateful to him, since every spot reminded him of his grandson, and he trembled lest some unguarded expression, or outbreak of sorrow, should betray the secret which poisoned the springs of life.

"Very natural!" exclaimed Peter Mangles, to whom they expressed their surprise. "How can you expect that Richard should feel happy in such a horrible place, so far from the City; nothing but trees and flowers to look at; no business, no 'Change, no Times, till it's a day old. I should go mad here—mad! Rely upon it," he added, "there is nothing so conducive to longevity as the bustle and excitement of London, and its much abused wholesome, healthy, smoky streets."

His hearers smiled. They knew what an enthusiast the speaker was upon his favourite topic.

No wonder that, with these feelings, the old clerk watched the progress of his employer towards convalescence with intense satisfaction, or that he began to think it high time that he himself returned to "town." Business—although he had both written and received at least a dozen letters daily, and taken every precaution his experience could suggest—must, he felt assured, have suffered terribly from his absence; and business, as our readers are aware, was always a primary consideration with Peter Mangles.

The thought of what might be said or surmised on 'Change haunted him till he could endure it no longer, and he announced his departure for the following morning to Mr. Bently.

"Wait one day longer," said the latter, "only one, and I will accompany you."

Peter felt delighted at the resolution, but saw, as he gazed upon the still pale features of the speaker, that one day would be too soon.

"No, Richard," he answered, "you must not think of such a thing. The desire is natural, exceedingly natural—just what I should feel in your place; but, although you are better, wonderfully better, you are not strong enough to undertake a journey yet. You had better wait," he added, "the arrival of your son-in-law, and—"

"Pshaw!" interrupted the merchant; "you know as well as I do that George Markham has no intention of coming to Meldown—more, that he rejects my offers of reconciliation."

"I thought you had given up your suspicions," stammered Peter.

"If they are unjust you can at once disabuse me of them," observed Mr. Bently, calmly. "You have only to look me in the face and tell me that they are so—I never doubted your word yet, however I may have quarrelled with your judgment."

The old clerk twice attempted to speak; but his courage failed him—he could not utter a lie.

"I am answered in your silence," added the speaker, with a sigh—"Rachel and her daughter will soon be taken from me; and I shall be left to die alone."

"No, Richard, no; nothing of the kind," exclaimed his friend, deeply moved at the tone of sorrow in which the words were uttered. "Rachel has proved herself too good a wife and mother ever to forget her duty as a child, even should her husband carry his resentment so far as to desire it."

"His resentment!" repeated the invalid.

"You do not know the cause."

On hearing this observation his hearer turned so pale that Peter became alarmed, and would have rung for assistance had not a movement on the part of Mr. Bently prevented him.

"Tell me all," he said; "I can endure it. Do you know the agonies of suspense?"

"I should think I do, Richard," replied the old man. "Haven't I watched every change in the money market for the last fifty years? There, I see what you mean, and I will tell it you. The letters you wrote to Carus, accusing George Markham of abstracting the securities, have brought forth bitter fruit. The heartless scoundrel has made them public; the consequence is that the Bank of England has refused to open an account with your son-in-law, who, in the eyes of the world, is a dishonoured man."

To the astonishment of Peter Maugles, the intelligence which he expected would overwhelm him, appeared to afford his employer relief.

"Does my daughter know this?" demanded the merchant.

"Not yet," answered his informant; "but she soon must hear it. Your nephew has spread the slander—for it is a slander—in every direction. It would fall harmless enough," he added, with a sigh, "but for the authority of your name."

"The heartless villain!" murmured Mr. Bently.

"I always told you that he was a villain," observed Peter, "but you would not believe me; and now you see the consequences—he triumphs over the man he so unjustly persecuted and hated."

"Never!" exclaimed Mr. Bently, with an energy which startled his faithful clerk. "I can crush the reptile—crush him in the face of day—draw his venomous fangs, and compel him to avow himself the author of the crime of which he accuses George. Why—why," he added, "was this concealed from me? You and Thornton, doubtless, both meant it kindly, but it might have led to fatal consequences."

The following morning, despite the remonstrances of Peter and the entreaties of his daughter, the speaker quitted Meldown to proceed by easy stages to London, taking the bill—(doubtless our readers have not forgotten the circumstance)—that Richard cashed for Sanford in Calcutta, with him.

Two days after his departure, the funeral train of Sir Norman Boothroyd arrived at the hall, where it lay in state. Doubtless it would have been a source of great satisfaction to the deceased baronet could he have seen how very properly Messrs. Scutcheon and Pall, the great West-end undertakers, conducted the whole affair; how exactly the family shield, with its sixteen quarterings, was blazoned. But, unfortunately, when once we have shaken off this mortal coil, we are no longer capable of deriving consolation from these things; were it otherwise, the late Sir Norman Boothroyd must have felt delighted at the unexceptionable manner in which his dignified corpse had been treated.

Velvet, painting, and gilding, had done their best, or rather worst, to render death ridiculous. No train of sorrowing friends followed the remains to their last resting-place; no grateful poor blessed them as they passed. In lieu of these, there were the two executors, the Earl of Carlington and Squire Blundell, Viscount Illston, who considered the necessity of his attending a great bore, the physician, and the lawyer, but there was not a single tenant either in the churchyard or the church. The inhabitants of St. Faith's stood aloof from the procession as it passed through the village, and even the poor, in many instances, refused the funeral dole which Andrew Silex, according to custom, distributed.

"Norman must have been a great blockhead," observed the Earl of Carlington to his son, as they returned from the funeral, "to have made himself so terribly unpopular in the county!"

"He was decidedly an ass," lisped the viscount; "had he lived much longer, he would have bored me to death."

"A magnificent property," said his lordship, willing to change the subject.

"Yes, but sadly encumbered."

The peer repeated the word with surprise, and added, that to his certain knowledge, there was not a single mortgage on the estate.

"I am aware of that," replied his son. "Alice is not exactly a mortgage."

"Illston! Illston!" exclaimed his father, angrily, "you really are a most intolerable puppy."

"I suppose so."

With which admission the conversation dropped.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

This conscience doth make cowards of us all.
SHAKESPEARE.

INTO how reckless a state would mankind degenerate but for the presence of that inward monitor which, like a mirror, reflects our actions in their true light, and holds up a faithful image of ourselves, which some doggedly refuse to contemplate, whilst others merely snatch a hasty glance, and in the vortex of the world, its pursuits of avarice and ambition, or yet more ignoble passions, strive to forget the hideous portrait—(hideous from the stern truth of its resemblance)—which has for a moment startled them.

Conscience is the only painter that never flatters; and hence, like genius, it is rarely popular. There is no softening of shadows, no toning down of wrinkles in the likenesses drawn by its iron pencil; on the contrary, they stand boldly out, appealing to the soul with resistless eloquence, a voice in every touch of the great master's hand.

Were it possible to transfer these moral pictures to canvas, how inestimable would they become. Placed side by side with Titian, the gorgeous colouring of the glorious old Venetian would show pale; contrasted with the Dutch and Flemish schools, the wondrous detail and exquisite finish of Miéris, Brughel, Teniers, and Oudry, appear meagre and feeble; the chef-d'œuvre of Michael Angelo, the "Last Judgment" of the Sistine would lose its sublime terror. Neither Cimabue nor Giotto could stand the test.

When Mr. Bently pronounced the word "assassin," the veil which obscured the portrait of Carus was flung an instant drawn aside, and the ruffian beheld his own likeness in all its hideous deformity. Fear pointed her mocking finger at him, and he fled. The word haunted him even in his dreams—waking he muttered it to himself.

There was also a second monosyllable, an interrogative one, which he would have given much to have obtained an answer to—Which?

Something whispered to him that his safety depended upon that.

Long before reaching London he had made up his mind what steps to take; to decide was with him to act; anything appeared preferable to suspense, to a life of doubt, tortured by hourly fears, startled by shadows that might at any moment prove realities.

There is this peculiar fascination in crime, there is no getting rid of its memory; like a recurring dæmon it will return, bringing with it a train of consequences. Murderers have been known to haunt the spot in which they have entombed their victims, the thief to linger round the scene of his depredations. The chain which fetters them may be an invisible one, but its links are not less of iron.

It was some such feeling which induced Carus, although the hour at which he arrived in London was a late one, to wander in the direction of Clerkenwell, instead of proceeding to his own home—for in Clerkenwell dwelt the old dealer in drugs, of whom he was suspected of having purchased poison. We say suspected, for there were no proofs of his crime except moral ones. Neither Mr. Morton's investigations nor the patient perseverance of Styles, had succeeded in obtaining any direct evidence.

The last-mentioned personage had remained faithful to the promise he had made to Mr. Bently in Jersey. The secret of his fidelity was a very simple one: he was well paid, and it answered his purpose for once to act honestly. Gradually he had succeeded in obtaining the confidence of the old Hindoo, who, feeling himself growing every day more feeble, engaged Tom to reside with him by way of protection, for he was reputed to be sick, and lived in continual dread of being robbed and perhaps murdered. Thus the gold he had sinned for became his punishment.

With all his cunning, the artful spy had never succeeded in winning from the drug-vendor the secret he was so anxious to obtain. Either his host had forgotten the circumstance of having sold Carus the poison, or was too suspicious to acknowledge it. The records of his transactions, if he kept any, Mr. Styles shrewdly suspected must be kept in a large iron chest of Indian workmanship, which stood by the bed-side of the old man.

The contents of the aforesaid chest had long excited the curiosity and cupidity of Styles. He had frequently tried to lift it, but found it far too heavy; whilst the locks which secured it defied even his skill and experience to tamper with; but little doubt, however, existed in his own mind that it contained money.

As the Hindoo was childless, and had no relatives, at least in Europe, Tom looked upon himself as his natural heir, and, like most heirs, felt a nervous impatience to ascertain the amount of his inheritance.

It was, therefore, with intense satisfaction that he saw the lingering spark of life gradually wearing itself out, and waited the moments when he should come into possession.

For three days he had watched the dying man with feelings akin to those with which the vulture may be supposed to hover round the expiring wanderer in the desert; true, he had neither the vulture's beak nor claws, but its ravenous instincts were not wanting.

"Why don't he die?" he muttered; "he must have as many lives as a cat, and they have it as the saying goes. I am sure it would be a mercy to help the old heathen out of the world."

He half rose from the stool by the bedside, but the thought of the consequences of helping the old man, as he called it, to shuffle off this mortal coil, restrained him, and he re-seated himself.

A low murmuring sound broke from the lips of the old man, whose eyes were fixed upon the water-bottle on the broken table near him, but beyond his feeble reach.

"I dare say—wouldn't yer like it?" said the ruffian, with a chuckle; "but I ain't a-goin' to give it yer."

The glance of the Hindoo became terrible—a moment's strength and the speaker might have paid a fearful penalty for his brutality.

"I tell yer I am tired of watching yer," continued Mr. Styles, after a pause, "it ain't by no means pleasant; but I'll make a bargain with you, if you like—answer the question I have so often asked you, and you shall have the water."

The sufferer shook his head in sign of refusal.

"Where are the keys of that box, then?"

His host attempted once more to speak, but anger choked him.

"You won't tell me, won't you?" said his self-constituted heir. "I've a great mind to make yer."

The speaker had once more started to his feet, and was approaching the bed, when a low, creaking sound caught his ear, and arrested his purpose. He listened for an instant; the noise was repeated: it came, evidently, from the adjoining passage.

Catching up the light, he opened the door of the room, and found himself face to face with his former employer, who had gained an entrance from the back of the old, dilapidated house, in order to obtain an interview with its owner; with what further intentions our readers can well imagine.

For an instant the two villains stood confounded, each at the presence of the other; but the confusion of Carus was the greatest, for he had long looked upon his agent as numbered with the dead, and he stood speechless with surprise and terror.

Styles was the first to speak.

"Mr. Keam!" he exclaimed.

The sound of his own name broke the spell, and convinced the assassin that it was no vision of his excited imagination, but the man whom he believed he had murdered, who stood before him.

"Alive!" he gasped, in the tone of one who had just recovered his breath after receiving some fearful shock.

"No thanks to you," muttered his former confederate, bitterly. "I wonder you ain't ashamed to look me in the face after yer attempt to—"

"Accident—pure accident," interrupted the intruder; "which I have bitterly regretted."

An inarticulate "humph!" accompanied by an expressive shrug of the shoulders, informed the speaker of the exact amount of credit his old acquaintance gave to the assertion.

"Stand back!" said the latter, as Carus advanced towards him; "I ain't a-going to run the risk of any more such accidents. There are plenty of neighbours within call."

"What do you do here?"

"I live here."

Carus slowly repeated the words, as if weighing what they might portend.

"For what purpose?" he added.

"To take care of the old man," replied Styles. "Your uncle employed me."

This information gave the nephew the key to the mystery he had so long sought.

"Mr. Bently is dead," he said.

His hearer made no reply, doubtful whether to credit the assertion or not.

"And you are his heir, I suppose?" observed the fellow, in order still further to test him.

"No," answered Carus, bitterly; "he has left a most extraordinary will, bequeathing the bulk of his wealth to his grandson, should he ever prove forthcoming to inherit it, which I doubt. I have merely my share in the firm; he could not deprive me of that."

All this sounded so probable and truth-like, that Styles, despite his cunning, was deceived; and began to ask himself whether it might not be advisable to let bygones be bygones, and reconcile himself to his former employer.

"Look you," he answered; "if I thought you would only act fairly by me—"

"It is my interest to do so."

"Well, there is something in that," exclaimed his quondam associate. "I suppose you can guess what I was sent here for Mr. Kearns? But I won't touch upon that subject now the old heathen is either dead or dying, for when I quitted the room he hadn't many minutes to live. All his papers are contained in an iron chest."

"Of which you, doubtless, have the key," observed Carus.

"Not yet."

"I must speak with him."

"You will get nothing from him," said Styles, leading the way to the chamber; "he's past answering you, even if he still lives."

On entering the room they saw that the dying man was at the point of death. Without the slightest pity or respect for the last struggles of humanity, the two ruffians shook him violently, and demanded where he had concealed his keys.

A deep groan was the only answer they obtained; and Carus, more ruthless even than his companion, proposed that they should search him.

With eager hands they dragged the faded, rusty, gabardine from the still breathing body, and eagerly examined the pockets, but without success; the object of their search was not there; and it is impossible to say to what extent the outrage might have been carried, but for Styles, who caught sight of a silken cord round the neck of the drug-vendor. With a cry of joy at the discovery, he snatched at it with such force that it broke, leaving the keys in his hand.

"Mine at last," he muttered.

A sinister chuckle broke from the lips of the dying man. It was interrupted by a rattling in the throat, and all was over.

"Dead!" said Carus, in a tone of satisfaction.

"At last," added his companion, with a broad grin. "He lasted a plaguy long time; but some people are so obstinate. It's extraordinary how the old fool clung to life."

With this observation Mr. Styles dismissed all recollection of his host from his mind, and proceeded at once to use the keys. It was some time, however, before he found the proper manner of applying them, for the locks were of a construction peculiar to the East. After several attempts he succeeded at last in raising the lid, when a slight detonating noise was heard, similar to the explosion of a percussion cap.

As no immediate consequence followed, he stooped over the chest, and began eagerly to examine the contents, unconscious, while doing so, that a thin, grayish vapour was gradually issuing from it, enveloping his head. He had not breathed it long before its deadly effects became apparent. Asphyxia, rapid as the lightning's flash, struck both heart and lungs; and, with a deep groan, he sank a corpse beside the long-coveted treasure of his host.

Carus stood horror-struck. Not that he regretted the loss of his confederate; on the contrary, his death released him from an inconvenient witness of his crimes; but the suddenness of it overwhelmed him with terror. Several times he attempted to approach the spot; but the thin, subtle vapour still continued to issue from the iron receptacle, and warned him back; gradually, it filled the room—the supply seemed inexhaustible.

"There may be papers," muttered the guilty man, working himself up with desperate courage to make a last attempt. As he approached, the painful throbbing of his temples and the increased circulation of the blood became oppressive; it was death to venture near; the grim king of terrors guarded the old poisoner's treasure chest.

In the hope of dispersing the deadly mist, Carus opened the door of the chamber to admit a current of fresh air, but the fresh air only served to increase the volume of the vapour, which, strange to say, was unaccompanied by flame.

Unable any longer to resist its influence, he staggered into the corridor—even there it pursued him, forcing him to retreat step by step to the window through which he had obtained an entrance to the house; and he fled, cursing the cunning skill of the Hindoo, who had contrived to baffle all attempts to plunder him of his idol gold, living or dead.

The next day, the following announcement appeared in most of the principal papers:—

"Many of our city readers will recollect the old Indian, who, in his picturesque dress, was, until very lately, in the habit of vending his drugs in the neighbourhood of the Mansion-house. The police at an early hour this morning were induced to enter his residence in Clerkenwell, in consequence of the neighbours complaining of an exceedingly offensive vapour coming from the back of the house. On entering the upper room, the officers discovered two bodies; the Hindoo dead in his bed, and that of the man, an Englishman it is believed, who resided with him. It would seem that the latter had met his death in plundering his employer, who, by a curious contrivance, had rendered any attempt to open the chest, an iron one, containing his wealth, fatal to those who did not possess the secret. The amount in gold and jewels discovered is stated to be considerable; but as the old man had no heirs, it will revert to the crown."

When Carus Kearns read these lines he bitterly cursed his own want of perseverance. Had he waited a few hours longer, the treasure might have been his. He had, however, one consolation: the only witness who could have proved his attempt upon the life of our hero, and the poisoning of Mrs. Bently, were removed from his path for ever.

The death of the drug-vendor and Tom Styles, although it removed the worst apprehensions from the mind of the murderer, did not relieve them all. To do that, money was necessary; and money was not to be had. His credit, which had hitherto been sustained only by the most questionable means, was exhausted: ruin still stared him in the face. An accident, an inquiry at any moment might blast the reputation of the unprincipled speculator, and consign him to a prison. He had more than one reason to fear this, for Peter Mangles had returned to town, and he felt that the eye of the old clerk was fixed upon his movements.

Had Carus possessed the means of establishing himself in another land, he would at once have fled from England; but reckless, wild, unprincipled speculation—that desperate, fascinating game which, like the mirage of the desert, deludes its victims with unreal visions—had long since exhausted the moderate fortune he once possessed; and his were not the energies to look life and its stern realities in the face—battle with them resolutely, and overcome them by the force of indomitable will. On the contrary, he was one of those heartless wretches whom poverty enervates more hopelessly than crime.

Doubtless our readers have not forgotten that Carus had both a wife and child; the latter a meek-spirited, nervous boy, who trembled at the very sound of his father's voice, and shrank from his presence with ill-disguised terror.

To protect the interests of her son, Mrs. Kearns had hitherto firmly refused to give up that portion of her property settled upon herself at the time of her ill-assorted marriage. Her husband had tried threats and kindness without being able to shake her resolution: to both she opposed the same passive resistance, and met his menaces of separating her from her son with hints of an appeal to the Chancellor for protection. This staggered the ruffian, and the subject had been permitted to drop between them, till present emergencies revived it in his mind.

Before putting his scheme in execution he resolved, however, to make one last attempt to shake her resolution, for which purpose he sought the dressing-room of his unhappy victim, whom he found seated near the window, hearing the boy his lessons.

Mrs. Kearns changed colour at his appearance, for she read in the scowling glance of her persecutor, and his strongly compressed under lip, a repetition of the same angry scenes that had so frequently passed between them.

"Leave the room, Horace," he exclaimed, harshly addressing the youth, who looked anxiously in the pale face of his mother, and hesitated to obey him.

"Does the idiot hear?" added the ruffian, trying to work himself into a rage, in order to give colour to the violence he meditated.

"Obey your father, my love," said the unhappy woman, placing herself, with maternal instinct, between them, to prevent the insulting word from being followed by a blow, "and take your books with you."

The boy obeyed, and reluctantly quitted the dressing-room; for he loved his mother, and dreaded the trial which bitter experience told him was about to follow.

For several minutes Carus kept muttering to himself indistinct observations touching the obstinacy of wives, and the folly of intrusting them with the education of children. Mrs. Kearns heard these observations in silence, fearful lest a word should add to his ill-humour.

Suddenly he paused, and, fixing his eyes upon her, asked why she refused to answer him.

"What can I say," replied the meek-spirited creature, "when every word will be construed into an offence?"

"What can you say!" repeated the tyrant. "What should a wife say when her husband is in difficulties—jarred by demands which she has it in her power to satisfy?"

"Still the same eternal subject!" sighed the victim; "money—money!"

"I must have it!" exclaimed Carus, approaching her, and seizing her rudely by the arm; "I will have it. Your selfish obstinacy has baffled me in my speculations—prevented me from retrieving my shattered fortunes. Mark me," he added; "I will have it, or—"

The rest of the threat remained unspoken.

"Reflect before you decide," he resumed, after a pause. "You may be the mistress of your property, but I am the guardian of my son."

His wife turned pale as death. There was a frightful earnestness in every word he uttered, and a savage determination in his deep-sunken eyes as they flashed terribly upon her.

"You would take him from me!" she faltered.

"You have said it, madam; and, by heavens, I will. He has been too long petted and indulged by your weakness—taught to hate and despise me."

"You wrong me, Carus!" exclaimed Mrs. Kearns, imploringly. "Deeply as I have suffered from your unkindness and neglect, never has a word of complaint passed my lips in presence of my child. It is not my fault," she added, "if he no longer respects his father."

"Indeed!" said the fellow, with a sneer; "doubtless you expect to find me grateful, exceedingly grateful, for your forbearance. Will you assist me in my emergency?" he continued. "I shall not require the money for any lengthened period. I have certain operations in hand which once brought to a successful issue will retrieve all that I have lost."

His hearer regarded him with a look which reminded him how often she had heard and yielded to that plea before.

"I cannot beggar my child," she answered, with an effort to appear calm; "he has been wronged deeply enough already."

"You have seen him, then, for the last time," exclaimed her husband, advancing towards the room into which Horace had retired.

The wretched mother threw herself between him and the door.

"Have mercy, Carus," she shrieked, "upon me and on yourself. Have you not blighted my whole existence—robbed youth of its sunshine—womanhood of its respect? I have but one consolation left; if you have a heart—if you are human, do not seek to deprive me of it."

The loud insulting laugh which followed her appeal showed how callous the nature to which it had been addressed.

"You will not," she added, frantically, as her husband endeavoured to unloose her grasp from the handle of the door; "mercy! mercy!"

With a violent effort, the ruffian succeeded in wrenching it from her hand.

"You dare not," she exclaimed, starting to her feet; "the law will protect him from your violence."

"It must find him first," replied her husband, with a sneer.

"Stay, one moment! Will nothing less than our ruin, our absolute beggary content you?"

At this question, which indicated a yielding, as he imagined, on the part of the speaker, Carus, who was about to quit the room, retraced his steps.

"There is risk," he said, "neither of beggary nor ruin; but a crisis has arrived which renders additional capital absolutely necessary to carry my operations to a successful issue: were you capable of entering into the details, or of comprehending them in all their bearings, I could prove this to you. If you doubt me, consult Bland upon the subject."

"Yes, yes!" sobbed Mrs. Kearns, happy to obtain a respite upon any terms; "he is a friend."

Had she caught the ironical smile which rested for an instant on the saturnine features of her husband, she might have read the value of the reed on which she leant.

"Will you see him?" he exclaimed.

A feeble "Yes" indicated how completely the victim of domestic tyranny was exhausted by the struggle she had undergone.

"And when shall I have your answer, madam?"

"In the morning."

"Be it so," replied her persecutor, after a few moments' reflection; "but remember that it must be final."

With which observation he quitted the room, leaving his heart and spirit crushed wife a prey to agonising doubts and indecision.

No sooner was she alone than the door of the adjoining chamber opened, and her son—his pale cheek suffused with tears—ran towards her, and threw his arms around her neck; he was followed by a female, about thirty years of age, a respectable, intelligent looking woman, who regarded her with the deepest commiseration.

It was her faithful servant Martha.

The presence of her boy, his tears and fond caress, recalled the suffering mother to herself.

"Let father have the money," he whispered, "when I am old enough I will work for both."

"Yes, yes!" sobbed Mrs. Kearn, clasping him to her heart; "anything rather than part with you! but it is hard—very hard—that my hand should be the one to beggar you!"

"You must do nothing of the kind," observed Martha, quietly; "the laws will afford you protection, if you only have the courage to resist."

"The laws," repeated her mistress, bitterly, "with their cold delay, will recognise the mother's rights when her heart is broken, and her child torn from her; had I been the only one to suffer, I could have endured the worst, rather than resign the last remnant of my fortune to his rapacious grasp."

"You will yield, then," observed the woman, in a tone of disappointment.

"I must see Bland," was the reply; "he will advise me."

At the name of the captain, a shade of doubt and contempt crossed the features of the servant; she, at least, had no faith in his friendship or disinterestedness.

And she was right. Captain Bland was one of those convenient personages; and there are many such in the world, who are always ready to perform any amount of dirty work, provided they are well paid. Carus had long found him an exceedingly useful assistant, most of his numerous speculations having been conducted through his agency; for, as our readers are aware, he was prohibited by the deed of partnership between himself and Mr. Bently from trading on his own account.

When his employer first introduced him to his unhappy wife, it was with a design which we cannot pollute our pages by more than a passing allusion to. That design had failed. The unprincipled agent perceiving, before compromising himself too far, that the purity and virtue of Mrs. Kearn were not to be corrupted by his sophistry, affected sympathy with her wrongs, or pretended to interest himself in her boy.

They had, however, produced some effect: the grateful mother believed implicitly in his professions of friendship. Had she known his real character, she would have turned from him with loathing and contempt.

"And you will trust this man," said Martha.

"I must."

"It is more than I would do," observed the clear-sighted woman. "But, heaven help us, we are placed in an evil strait. Why not apply at once to your husband's uncle, Mr. Bently? He is an honourable man."

"Alas! he is ill—dying, I believe," sighed her mistress—"at Meltdown; and I have no friend, no brother to advise me. It is useless to struggle: death has deprived me of every natural protector."

"Except one," replied the servant: "Edgar Mars-ton."

A slight blush suffused the cheek of her mistress. The gentleman alluded to was her cousin—a clergyman living in Norfolk, who had once been a suitor for her hand; but, in an evil hour for herself, she, or rather her fortune, attracted the attention of Carus. The authority of her father, and not her own heart, had decided the choice.

"He is married now," added the speaker, who read all that was passing in her mind; "and there can be nothing wrong in seeking his assistance."

"I will reflect upon it," replied the unhappy woman, passing her hand athwart her brow, as if to collect her thoughts. "Leave me now," she added; "Horace will remain with me. I cannot bear him from my sight for a single moment."

Her friend, for she was a faithful though humble one, quitted the room, her heart filled with sorrow and womanly indignation at the sufferings of her mistress, and the brutal conduct of her master, upon whose proceedings she resolved to keep an eye, as well as those of his plausible friend, who called shortly afterwards and had a long interview with her mistress.

Martha heard every word that passed between them, and took her precautions accordingly.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.—HISTORY.

In our last paper we pointed out some of the advantages of History—some of the benefits which were likely to accrue from the careful study of this important branch of literature. These advantages can scarcely be over-estimated. They are interesting to all conditions of life; and the lessons thus enforced are of the highest value. The results of the vast social and political experiments which mankind have tried upon themselves, may relieve us from the necessity of similar investigations. It is not necessary that we should all be involved in ruin, in order to ascertain the course of policy which produces such a disaster. We may, if we will, learn wisdom from the experience of other people, and reap the benefit of their success or their failure.

It is important to trace the history of the ancient world,—to follow the course of mankind since society first bound itself by reciprocal benefits and corresponding obligations. It is important to observe the elements which entered into these social compacts. And as the architect might examine with interest the foundation and materials of those gigantic structures, which have defied the power of time, and have maintained their pristine character to the present day, so those who are interested in the erection of permanent political structures, investigate with careful study the leading principles of those grand monarchies and republics whose colossal proportions and universal sovereignty once kept the world in awe.

But if the history of the ancient world abounds with interest and instruction; if it is important that we should know something of Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome, it is still more important that we should acquaint ourselves with the progress of our own country, and ascertain the nature of those principles and the character of those events which have bestowed on England so distinguished a place amongst the nations of the earth.

Nineteen hundred years ago our country was in a condition as barbarous as that of any of the islands of the Pacific. A race of tattooed savages, divided into marauding tribes, their occupation warfare, and their sport the chase, held possession of our land, and submitted to the indomitable sway of an idolatrous priesthood. They owed their first step in civilisation—their first progress from darkness to light—to the Romans. As a conquered nation, Britain was admitted to many of the privileges and most of the advantages of the Roman empire. During the Roman occupation it entirely changed its social aspect. The subsequent attacks of Picts and Scots necessitated the Britons—who had wellnigh forgotten the art of war—to solicit help from Germany. The blue-eyed, flaxen-haired children of Saxony came to their assistance. But, as the Chinese proverb has it, they called in lions to drive out dogs. The Saxons changed their character of allies to that of masters; and the nation underwent another transformation. The people were rapidly united in interest, instinct, and faith—they were Anglo-Saxons. Eleven hundred years after the Roman invasion, the Normans made their descent on England, and at Hastings the mild government of the Saxon kings gave way to the imperious sway of the victorious Gauls. England had never thoroughly experienced till then the bitterness of a conquered people. They were in bondage. And as tributaries of the continental princes they might have continued, but for those fortuitous circumstances which divided France against itself, and made England the only safe stronghold of the Norman lords. Then English and Normans made common cause; English character asserted its integrity, its valour, and its strength; the history of England fairly began when the Normans identified themselves with the country and people they had subjugated.

Deeply interesting it is to trace the gradual progress of our country since that period: the acquisition of political and social rights gradually won; the advancement of the people from slavery to freedom, from ignominy to honour, from darkness to light. Full of instruction it is to observe this emancipation—this breaking of the bonds which bound the giant—to find the fetters, ecclesiastical and civil, snapped by the mere growth of the giant's limbs. The history of England, philosophically considered, is something more than the succession of dynasties, the triumphs of armies, and the acquisition of territory; it is the practical assertion of popular power. The architect who examines a building which has endured for ages, finds its foundations strongly laid. And so it is with this social structure; the foundation is excellent. The people are its strength; the secret of its glory is attributable to them. Society works upwards. The best influences rise from the humbler ranks to those in the higher walks of life. The advancement of the masses contributes most effectually to the regeneration of the whole body politic. Our national virtue is our national stability.

In the works of most of our historians this fact is overlooked; the people are altogether omitted. They inform us of a succession of dynasties; they dwell with enthusiasm on a few bright and shining names; they rejoice over our triumphs, and grieve over our reverses; but the prosperity which is felt by the majority of the people, the influence exerted by the people, have no part in their chronicles.

This is not the case with the history now appearing from the pen of William Howitt. He furnishes a faithful picture of the past; not confining our attention to the purple and the palace, to the jewelled and ermined multitude around a throne, but leading us forth amongst the busy herd of men,—men who are spending their lives in a hard battle with circumstances for a bare subsistence; and he shows what these Englishmen have been doing, and what they have accomplished for the happiness and welfare of our race.

Two volumes of this great national work have already been issued, and the third volume is near its completion. The favourable notices universally won from the press, fully justify us in recommending this work to our readers—to all those who wish to possess a faithful and impartial history of their own land.

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XX.

"The exercise of to-day, Robert," said George, "will be the last upon nouns. Rules respecting the adjective will follow, and you will have exercises on the agreement of the adjective and substantive."

"The present subject for consideration is the proper use (according to the sense) of the singular or plural number with nouns preceded by prepositions."

"In such sentences as the following, 'A musician full of enthusiasm,' 'Un musicien rempli d'enthousiasme;' 'An orator full of talent,' 'Un orateur rempli de talent,' the least reflection is sufficient to determine that the singular must be used. But in these sentences, 'A prince full of vices,' 'Un prince plein de défauts;' 'A young lady full of talents,' 'Une jeune personne remplie de talents,' the case is different. We should not say 'A prince full of vices,' if this prince had but one vice; and although 'talent' in the orator's case must be singular, because only one talent of an eminent order is meant, in the other instance, we allude to all the talents that a young lady acquires in a complete education."

"The preposition à is sometimes followed by the noun in the singular, sometimes in the plural. 'A chest with a secret lock,' 'Un coffre à secret;' 'To travel on foot,' 'Voyager à pied,' require the singular, on account of the idea conveyed to the mind. 'Secret,' the secret lock, must be in the singular, because we think only of one lock, which is a secret one; and 'à pied,' 'on foot,' is an expression which implies going on foot, without the mind's being troubled with the idea of the number of feet."

"In the following sentences the words preceded by à assume the plural number—'To walk with the hands clasped,' 'Aller à mains jointes;' 'Horned oxen,' 'Des bœufs à cornes.' In both of these sentences the idea of plurality is naturally entertained."

* Plus de nausées, plus de mal de mer, would, if literally translated, be "more of nausea, more of sea-sickness;" but plus de in the idiom of the French language is used as a diminutive, and therefore the sentence really means, "No more nausea, no more sea-sickness."

† Plus au juste becomes, when literally translated, "all at the just." The free translation is "exactly." And here we may observe that in this phrase, as in many others, the free translation gives the exact meaning, and the literal one nothing but nonsense.

We shall soon arrive. Nous arriverons bientôt.
So much the better; I want rest. Tant mieux; j'ai besoin de repos.

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION—continued.

OF THE SOUND i

The sound i is similar to that of ee, in English, in the word ech.

This sound is nearly similar to that of e, but a little longer, as in the words épître, epistle; gîte, sovert, &c.

This sound is also produced by the two letters ie; as in the words partie, part; folie, folly; jolie, pretty (feminine).

The circumflex accent is put over the i to supply the place of the letter s, which formerly followed the i, as, épître, gîte, fîmes, dîtes, &c., instead of épître, gîte, fîmes, dîtes, &c., used now.

Thus the sound i is produced by the following letters: i, ie.

OF THE SOUND o

This sound is found in English in the word of. There are in French several slight variations in the sound of this vowel, but they cannot be expressed by words; it belongs to the teacher to illustrate them to the pupil.

The general sound of this letter has no difficulty; it is similar to that of the same letter in English, in the example above given, and is found in French in the words mode, fashion; corde, rope; porte, door, &c.

This sound is also produced by the combination of the following letters: au in aurora, aurora; eo in flageolet, flageolet.

Thus the sound o is represented by o, au, and eo.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XIX.

SOUND.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

477. What are STRINGED INSTRUMENTS?—Musical instruments, in which the sounds result from the vibrations of stretched cords or wires. For example, the violin, guitar, piano, and Æolian harp are all stringed instruments.

478. What are the stretched cords employed in these instruments called?—Musical Strings. They are of different lengths and sizes, as in the piano; or of the same length but of different sizes, as in the violin.

479. Which strings give the notes of highest pitch?—The shorter and smaller strings; because they vibrate most rapidly. Every note has its particular length or size of string, and particular number of vibrations.

480. Has the force by which a musical string is stretched anything to do with the pitch of the note that it gives?—If the tension of the string be increased, it will vibrate more rapidly, and give out a note of higher pitch.

481. What are WIND INSTRUMENTS?—Musical instruments in which the notes are produced by the vibrations of columns of air within the instrument; for example, the flute, the trumpet, and the organ.

482. From what do the deep base notes of the organ proceed?—From the long and large pipes; and the high notes from the short pipes.

THE VOICE.

483. How are the sounds of the voice produced?—The organs of voice form a wind instrument; the air contained in the mouth, throat, and upper part of the windpipe is set in vibration.

484. By what?—By a stream of air forced from the lungs through a narrow opening in the upper part of the windpipe.

485. How is this narrow orifice formed?—By the partial closing of a kind of membranous valve in the windpipe.

THE EAR.

486. What is the process of hearing?—The vibrations conveyed from the sounding body are collected by the outer visible ear, pass through the contracted opening into the ear-tube, and strike, at the bottom of the tube, on a stretched membrane, called the Drum, or Tympanum, of the ear.

487. Explain further?—The vibrations imparted to the drum are propagated through another tube to a second membrane, and from this directly to the fluid of the internal ear, and to the delicate fibres of the nerves of hearing, spread out in the fluid. The nerves convey the impressions to the mind.

LIGHT.

NATURE AND TRANSMISSION OF LIGHT.

488. WHAT IS A LUMINOUS BODY?—A body that gives off light; the sun, for example, is said to be luminous.

489. How do we see a luminous body?—The light thrown off from it passes into our eyes and produces the sensation of sight.

490. What did the great English philosopher, Sir Isaac Newton, suppose light to be, in its essential nature?—He conceived that light consists of exceedingly minute particles given off from the sun and other luminous bodies. He supposed that the minute particles of light passing into the eye produce the sensation of sight, as the particles of fragrant matter passing from flowers to the nose, produce the sensation of smell.

491. What is the view now entertained by philosophers of the nature of light?—That it is analogous to sound; that there is a subtle ether filling all space, which is the medium of light, as air is the medium of sound.

492. Of what is light conceived to consist?—Of vibrations of this elastic ether, excited by the luminous body, and propagated in all directions through the ether; as sound consists of vibrations of the air, excited by the sounding body, and propagated through the air.

493. According to this view, how is the sensation of sight produced?—Luminous bodies send off waves of light, as sounding bodies send off waves of sound. These waves, striking upon the nerves of our eyes, produce the sensation of sight.

494. By what names are these two views concerning the nature of light distinguished?—The latter is called the Wave Theory of Light, the other the Newtonian Theory.

495. Does light proceed in straight lines?—It does. We cannot see through a small bent tube.

496. Do all bodies give off light at all times?—They do not; some bodies, like the sun, are, in their nature, self-luminous, and others, like a house or a tree, are non-luminous.

497.—How do non-luminous bodies become temporarily luminous?—By receiving light from the sun, or some other self-luminous body. For example, a candle brought into a dark room renders the walls and furniture temporarily luminous, and therefore visible.

498. What is a ray of light?—It is a single line of light proceeding from a luminous point.

499. Do the particles in a ray of light move swiftly through space?—It was so supposed by Newton, but it is now known that they are stationary particles of ether, along which vibrations or trembling movements are conveyed in rapid succession.

500. Do rays of light proceed from every point of the sun, or other luminous object?—They do; and in every direction.

501. How is this truth generally expressed?—It is said that light radiates in every direction from every point of a luminous body. Such rays are said to diverge, and they are called diverging rays.

502. What consequence follows from the divergence of light?—That light decreases in intensity as it recedes from its source.

503. Illustrate by an example.—We receive less light from a candle the farther we are from it; because the same amount of light is spread over a greater space.

Fig. 35.

504. What does Fig. 35 represent?—A small pencil of diverging rays proceeding from a point in the flame of a candle to the eye. Every point in the flame sends to the eye such a pencil of rays.

505. What is the velocity of light?—About 290,000 miles per second.

506. What is a transparent substance or medium?—One through which light passes freely; glass, for example, is transparent.

507. What is an opaque substance?—One that does not admit light to pass through it, a stone, for example, is opaque.

508. If a book is held before a candle in the evening, it intercepts the light that falls upon it, and its shadow is thrown upon the wall; why is the shadow on the wall larger than the book?—Because the rays of light that pass by its edges diverge from each other.

509. How far does the shadow cast by the book extend?—From the book to the wall, where it is intercepted.

510. What becomes of the light that falls on an opaque substance?—A part is reflected back; the rest enters the substance, and is stopped or absorbed by it.

ABSORPTION OF LIGHT.

511. Do glass, water, and other transparent media absorb any portion of the light that enters them?—Every transparent medium absorbs more or less light, according to its thickness.

512. How far does the light of the sun penetrate into the depths of the sea?—About 700 feet. At the bottom of the deep ocean there is utter darkness.

513. Does the atmosphere extinguish any portion of the light that comes from the sun and stars?—It does; even in its purest state it absorbs a large quantity of light, especially toward the horizon.

514. How do we know that the atmosphere has this effect?—It causes the stars to shine more dimly toward the horizon, and strips the sun of so much of his brightness at sunset that our eyes can bear the full light of his disc.

515. How much farther is it through the atmosphere in the direction of the horizon than perpendicularly upward?—It is thirteen times farther.

516. What appearance have the stars seen through the thin air above the top of a lofty mountain?—They shine with a much brighter lustre than when viewed through the whole depth of the atmosphere.

THE FIRST AND LAST KISS OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

THE church of San Lorenzo was filled to overflowing one evening, just as the soft Italian landscape was lighted up by the radiance of the setting sun. Through the olive groves that led to the church, a bride train was passing, while the tree-tops were blazing with golden light. But just at the moment it entered the dim arches of the church, the last lingering ray disappeared, giving place to the rich and gorgeous clouds which only Italian skies may wear.

As the bridal party paced slowly up the long aisle to the altar, over which hung the most splendid painting of the fifteenth century, fresh from the hand of a youthful but mighty artist, the strong illumination from the myriads of wax candles fell upon the noble brow of the young bridegroom, and the fair and beautiful face beside him, and a suppressed hum of admiration was heard all over the gorgeous church. No wonder indeed that it should be awakened, for, added to the interest excited by the beauty and grace of the youthful pair, there was a charm in their superior rank that the people of Italy appreciated not less highly. The bride was no less a person than the beautiful Vittoria Colonna, who was betrothed when only four years of age to Ferdinand Francis, of Avalos, the future Marquis of Peschiera. She was now seventeen, and he was hardly older.

The brilliant wedding was the subject of conversation for months afterwards, envy seeming on this occasion to lay aside her shafts; for nothing was said that did not bear upon the virtues or beauty of the happy children who had thus united their destinies for ever, for weal or woe. For a brief season these two lives seemed to flow on in serene happiness. Vittoria was the muse of Italy, and her songs breathed forth the beauty of her daily life, tranquil and calm, but never tame nor spiritless. Their home was all that the descendant of the Colonna might be expected to dwell in, noble, surrounded with all graceful and beautiful associations, and rich with the treasures of art and the achievements of intellect.

But woe for the trusting hearts that see no cloud in the distance. When the sparkle is brightest on the cup, then most surely is fate preparing the bitter drop that is to succeed it. Ferdinand joined the army—the noblest, bravest officer, the purest patriot that it boasted, and at the battle of Pavia was desperately wounded. Not aware that his life was thus to be sacrificed to his courage, the Italian States offered him the kingdom of Naples. With a magnanimity which placed her above royalty, Vittoria wrote to him not to accept it—which indeed he did not intend to do—"the virtues of my husband," she added, "are above princes." Alas! his refusal was almost his last act; and the brokenhearted Vittoria watched that glorious life as it receded, with an anguish that to be known must be also endured.

In her deep seclusion at Naples and afterwards at Fichia, the mightiest in Italy sought her hand. She turned from them all, and finally retired to a convent at Viterbo, devoting her life to the sacred memory of the dead, and only waiting the hour when she should set sail on that ocean on whose banks the beloved had left her to weep alone. For years the grave, sad woman lived thus, the music and poetry of life hushed, as she thought, for ever, along with the pale lips that had once responded with their sweetest strains to her own. For years she never left her convent save for a walk in the garden. But although outwardly the world looked dark and repulsive to that sorrowing spirit, there was the same earnest love for the pure, the noble, and the beautiful, that had marked her in her proudest and happiest days at the Colonna palace, when Ferdinand of Avalos, the boy-lover, was lingering by her side.

In her deep solitude, Vittoria caught whispers of the still glorious fame of Italy's now aged artist, of him who, though smitten by years, could never really grow old, the painter, poet, sculptor, and architect, the fourfold life of Michael Angelo. A poet herself, there was one bond between them that was mutual. A lover of art, with an intense passion for the beautiful, that her grief had deadened but not destroyed, she was smitten with an earnest longing to revive her old art-worship in his presence, who could so well appreciate its quality.

They met, he in whom old age had already commenced, and she whose youth was already fading away, and they met, too, to love. Let no one smile sarcastically at this statement; take Angelo's own words—"It is the power of a fine face which spurs me towards heaven. In those eyes I find a luminous ray which guides me to my Creator." Those who cannot conceive of a sentiment like this, born in the innermost soul, and partaking only of the spiritual beauty of the divine passion, must lay aside these prejudices; they bear no interpretation for such minds.

How rich must have been that communion, how full of all glorious and sublime beauty, which could thus have drawn the lonely and sorrowful recluse from her convent to meet Michael Angelo in Rome and spend hours by his side! I think truly that had the record of those hours been faithfully kept, there is nothing in the whole world that would have surpassed it for beauty and interest. The tenderest vows of youthful lovers, despite what is so often talked of as love's young dream, must fade into nothing before the meeting of these two grand and noble natures, now known to each other for the first time, after a lifetime of struggle and sorrow on one part, and of earnest striving to live out the highest life on the other.

Too old to paint, the poet breathed out his highest strains for this new joy that had come to him, and Vittoria answered them in words as sweet and beautiful as his own. The hand that had brought out the divinest conceptions of the pencil and the chisel, and which was yet to create the noble grandeur of Saint Peter's, did not disdain to write gentle and loving words to the sad and sorrowing widow of the brave Peschiera.

One summer day, the loveliest of those that so beautify and bless the clime of which poets love to sing, Michael Angelo sat awaiting Vittoria's coming. Eager to shed light on her darkened lot, he ever garnered up all that was delightful and pleasant in his daily walks to bestow upon her when they met; and this day his treasury was full to overflowing. Sweet and rare flowers, a precious painting, a new song were awaiting her. Long he lingered, and when at length the door opened and a strange figure appeared, he experienced a sensation of disappointment and regret. A nun, in the habit of the Viterbo convent where Vittoria lived, announced herself as the messenger from her who occupied his thought. She was ill, perhaps dying, and wished to see him once more. The next moment saw him on his way to the convent, with a terrible foreboding of the truth. The beauty of that lovely summer day was darkened, and his sick heart whispered only of death. As he entered the convent gate he lifted the covering from that silver hair and prayed earnestly for strength to meet all that was to befall him.

He was indeed too late. That beautiful and noble spirit had passed the boundary line between the two worlds, and was in the presence of God and the beloved. Kneeling by her side in the chapel, which now held within its walls the presence of the holy dead, Michael Angelo took the pale, thin hand and pressed it to his lips, softly and reverentially as a devotee would kiss the relic of his patron saint—and this was his first kiss to Vittoria. Even then he declared that he did not dare to kiss her forehead or cheek, or the pale, cold lips.

THE OLD WIFE'S SONG.

Sixty years old to-morrow, John!
And still we two are here,
While many of the young and gay,
The beautiful and dear,
Are slumbering in the chilly ground,
The sod above them growing;
While, strange to tell, life still with us
Is bright as ever flowing.

We never will grow old, dear John,
For we'll cling together,
As when in sunny, glad some days,
So in stormy weather;
Old Age, his grasp upon us, then,
Shall strive in vain to fasten,
For we will joyously adown
Life's bounding streamlet hasten.

And though we may seem old, dear John,
Within our hearts there will Be joy, and youth, and gladness—all
Lingering with us still.
Though wrinkles, traced upon the brow,
Declare that we are old, love,
We'll let the spring-time in our hearts
Declare the wrinkles bold, love.

ISAMBARD KINGDON BRUNEL, ESQ., F.R.S., ETC. ETC.

ISAMBARD KINGDON BRUNEL is by descent a Frenchman. His father, the celebrated engineer of the Thames Tunnel, was born at a village near Rouen in France. In his early days the elder Brunel, although brought up to agriculture, evinced a decided taste for mechanical pursuits. He was accordingly permitted to enter on a course of instruction suited to his inclination. He made several voyages to the West Indies as a seaman in the French navy; and when he returned, he took up his abode in France. There he joined in some violent political movements, and incurred the displeasure of the ruling powers. A well-disposed member of the government gave him the hint to escape. Brunel wisely profited by it, and made his way to the United States. There he perfected himself in the English language and settled down as an architect, and subsequently as a practical engineer. The Americans intrusted him with many important works, and largely profited by his inventive genius in the construction of their docks, canals, public buildings, military works, &c.

At the commencement of the present century Mr. Brunel came to England, and contracted a matrimonial alliance with an English lady, Miss Sophia Kingdon. His reputation as an inventive engineer soon spread in this country, and before long he was intrusted with the construction of the machinery for the manufacture of "block pulleys" by the government. This machinery is still the wonder of thousands of visitors to the royal dockyard at Portsmouth. It comprises sixteen different machines, all driven by the same steam power. The rough log of wood submitted to the first machine is passed from one to the next, until the last turns it out a complete "pulley," stronger and more accurately fashioned than any hand could make it. The ingenuity of this machinery can scarcely be understood without it is seen in operation; its importance, however, may be inferred when it is remembered that four men with this machinery will complete as many blocks as eighty ordinary hands, and at a much less cost.

It was during the time that Mr. Mark Brunel was engaged at Portsmouth on this important work, that the subject of our memoir, Isambard Kingdon Brunel, first saw the light of day. He was born in 1806, at Portsmouth, in the immediate vicinity of the dockyard. While quite young, he was taken to France for the purpose of being educated at the college of Henri IV., at Caen. At the conclusion of his scholastic studies the young man underwent a course of training to prepare him for the duties of an engineer, and returned to England in time to assist his father in his great work, the Thames Tunnel. The younger Brunel took an active part in the matter, and shared in the many disappointments, the personal dangers, and final triumph of that extraordinary undertaking. From that time forward the young engineer made wonderful progress in his profession.

He joined his father in a course of experiments for the purpose of making a motive power of carbonic acid gas. To a great extent the mechanical difficulties were overcome, but the cost of the machinery prevented its introduction as a substitute for steam. This investigation was an anxious labour of ten years' duration; both father and son almost exclusively devoting their abilities to the subject.

In the meantime, Mr. Brunel, junior, studied railway engineering, the construction of locomotives, and other matters appertaining to steam navigation. In

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

ISAMBAARD KINGDON BRUNEL, ESQ., F.R.S., ETC. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

1833 he was appointed Engineer-in-Chief to the Great Western Railway Company, and has retained this appointment ever since. The whole of the tunnels, bridges, and engineering works on this line and on other lines in continuation were designed and constructed by Mr. Brunel. They were more than usually difficult, on account of the broad gauge system adopted by the company. Many of the bridges on the Great Western Railway are remarkable for their strength and beauty: among others, we may particularise those at Maidenhead, Chepstow, and the new bridge over the Tamer.

Mr. Brunel took a part in the important work of floating and raising the Britannia Tubular Bridge; in fact, he rendered the same friendly co-operation to Mr. Stephenson in that gigantic undertaking as the latter gentleman has recently done in the works necessary for the launch of the Leviathan. Mr. Brunel has been employed in the construction of the principal docks on the English coast; and has conducted the engineering works of several foreign railways. Among other works we may mention the Charing-cross Suspension Bridge, spanning the Thames from Hungerford-market to Lambeth, which has been much admired.

During the last three or four years Mr. Brunel has been engaged by the Great Eastern Navigation Company, an association which aims at making as great a revolution in ocean navigation as the railways have done in land transit. The monster ship which has recently emerged from the yard of Mr. Scott Russell, at Millwall, and which has been visited by thousands, including her Majesty the Queen, has been erected under the sole direction of Mr. Brunel.

In an undertaking of this kind—where hundreds of minor inventions have to be made to complete the original idea—where preparations on an extraordinary scale are required to carry out the merest details of the main object—the very highest quality of engineering skill is demanded; and Mr. Brunel has proved himself equal to the occasion. Although met by many unforeseen difficulties, he has at length succeeded, and the Leviathan as it now floats off Deptford is a monument of the genius and indefatigable perseverance of her engineer.

In personal appearance Mr. Brunel is a little above five feet high, and his features are particularly small. During the launching-days of the Leviathan his presence seemed to be courted by a whole host of visitors. Lords, members of the House of Commons, admirals, and other great men, hurried to and from Mr. Scott Russell's premises, inquiring for "Mr. Brunel?" "Have you seen Mr. Brunel?" "Has Mr. B'n'l passed this way?" &c. &c. It would have puzzled most people to say where he really was; for the great engineer was everywhere by turns and nowhere long. One moment you might have seen him at the water's edge, looking at some detail of the great ship through an eye-glass, and two minutes after he would be at the further end of the yard, giving orders to, and working with, a gang of two or three hundred workmen. Lose sight of him for an instant, and his occupation would be changed: he would be smoking a cigar, standing still in deep thought; climbing over ponderous logs; or making a dirty, untidy appearance before some well-dressed functionary who has sought an audience at the eminent risk of breaking his legs over the great timbers strewn about the yard.

The Great Western, the first steam ship built to cross the Atlantic, and the Great Britain, the first ocean screw steamer, were both designed by Mr.

Brunel. He has also constructed a great number of smaller vessels.

Mr. Brunel has been an F.R.S. since 1830, and a member of the council since 1844. He is Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, Vice President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and Vice President of the Society of Arts; he is besides a Fellow of the Astronomical, the Geological, and the Geographical Societies.

The accompanying portrait of Mr. Brunel is from a photograph executed expressly for our journal by Mr. Mayall of Regent-street. It was taken on the deck of the Leviathan, just before the final application of the hydraulic rams.

THE RHINE BOAT.

THE season is over. Everybody who is anybody has departed for somewhere. Silent are the halls of St. Stephen, and desolate are the palaces of May-fair. Hushed is the music of the opera, and the popular vocalists are all on the wing. Trade is stagnant in the west; its satins and jewels are displayed in vain. All the fashionable quarters are deserted. Town is out of town. London is making holiday. That great army of tourists which annually marches from our metropolis, as surely as the days shorten and the leaves fall, has entered on its campaign. Railway guides and Continental hand-books are in request. Couriers are at a premium. Pilgrimages are making to the holy places of the tourists, and there, or on the road, are to be seen the devoted band of men and women—working very hard for pleasure.

They are in the Highlands, amongst the purple heather, the gray mists, and the blue mountains.

THE RHINE BOAT.

They are in the golden vale of Tipperary, and on the crystal lakes of Killarney. They are yachting it round the Needles, or up the Rhine, or drinking the waters at Baden, or climbing the mountains of Switzerland, or skimming over the canals of Venice, or exploring the wonders of Rome, or sailing on the Lake of Geneva, or journeying over the Pyrenees, or clambering up Vesuvius. But wherever they are, they preserve their national characteristics—they are reserved in their manners, and prodigal of their wealth.

It is said on the German railroads that only princes and Englishmen travel first-class. Why are those splendid hotels erected? why is such elaborate attention paid to comfort and convenience? why do enterprising speculators prepare accommodation in the best style? It is for the use of the English traveller—the milord Croesus, to whom money is no object. For him there must be first-class carriages, first-class hotels, first-class dinners, first-class accommodation, first-class attention. He expects it; he demands it; he is willing to pay for it.

Observe the Englishman in our illustration. He is the only tourist who is provided with a hand-book, and an individual to point out all the places of interest. The Englishman is reserved in manner, and carries with him a frigid atmosphere. There he stands, stiff, formal; an unimpeachable propriety in his attire, and an aspect such as he might assume in another place in replying to "his honourable friend" the member for somewhere. With his fellow passengers he has no communication: they have not been introduced. He opens his "Murray," and, with the help of his attendant, or courier, ticks off the remarkable sites. "Old castle, built in the twelfth century; east angle only remaining; besieged by the Swedes; taken by the Prince of Hesse," &c. &c. He is anxious to know which is the tower—for there are several, crowning hills and looking grimly down at a few scattered cottages on the bank. The guide points out the exact tower. The Englishman writes a note on the margin with a gold pencil-case; turns over to the page, and fits an eye-glass to the orbit of his right eye, to look out for the next site.

The other tourists on board the boat are differently occupied. There, in the peculiar garb of his order, sits an Italian priest, reading his breviary. He is a mild, patient-looking man; such a priest as Sterne describes in his "Sentimental Journey." Here, in a loose, easy dress, admirably adapted for purposes of travel, is an artist. He has improvised a desk, and is rapidly transferring to his sketch-book a charming bit of river scenery, that may one day figure on the walls of the Academy. The English tourist has overlooked this fascinating bit of landscape—it is not named in the hand-book—but he will probably purchase it from next year's exhibition, if an art critic can be found generous enough to give it a good word. Behind the artist are a couple of German students. They are discoursing about certain botanical specimens which one of them has gathered, and are intent on them alone. The historic "sites," the picturesque "bits," are nothing to them. They are gravely discussing the physiology of plants; not that they are students dry as dust, who care not for the living men and women and the smiling world about them; not that they are insensible to the beauties of the noble Rhine; not that they are without sympathy for a merry night and a cheerful song, but because the German is in earnest about all he undertakes.

Behind the German student is a Polish refugee. He is silent and saturnine; plants, pictures, and "sites," are the same to him. He is thinking of his own land, of her prospects, and her misfortunes, and these thoughts seem to isolate him from the other tourists.

There are two ladies. One silent and reserved; the other, with a blooming child, easily induced to be conversable. And next to them there is a free and easy Frenchman—who is perfectly at home anywhere, and who has, to use a common expression, broken the ice already. He has contrived ingeniously to open a conversation with the child; to make her smile and prattle. He who caresses a child, wins the favour of the parent. From gossiping with the child to conversing with the mamma, is an easy transition. They talk gaily enough. There is much to elicit remark in the scenery around them. They may compare notes of former trips. They may criticise the arrangements on board. And by-and-by they are sure to strike some sympathetic chord. The artist joins in with some pleasant anecdote of travel. The Pole, awakened from his abstraction, has something to say of the country, or some incident to tell of his former life; the students fall into the conversation readily enough, and smoke and talk away, like good companions as they are. Perhaps the Italian priest shuts up his breviary, and comes over to make some good-humoured remark; and even the silent lady smiles, and utters a word or two. But nothing can soften the hardness of the English gentleman tourist—he still confines his attention to "Murray" and the "guide," still makes his notes of "sites" just seen, and gravely looks out for "sites" that are still to come.

So we go steaming onward; a very sociable party, with the exception of the reserved gentleman. From his place at the wheel, a bluff sailor looks down upon us, and catches up the refrain in a fine manly voice, as the German students presently begin to sing one of the old songs of Fatherland.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,
SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

How very precious is the smallest gift
Affection loves to offer—a dead flower
Will long be kept, remembrance of looks
That made each leaf a treasure.—L. E. L.

EARLY in the morning, the grand house in Carlton-terrace was in all the bustle of an approaching departure.

Lady Glenlonely was in good spirits, and Hope, who loved the country, and delighted in the wild, magnificent scenery of the Highlands, was all mirth and expectation.

The carriage was at the door betimes, to take our party to the Euston-square station, and cabs for the servants and luggage were in attendance.

After a hasty breakfast, Lady Glenlonely, followed by Hope, entered the landau. Lord Glenlonely was to follow in a few days, as he had to take the chair at a great temperance meeting at ——— Hall, on the third day from that of their departure.

Sultana and Truelove travelled together in a commodious basket which was placed in the landau, for never again would Lady Glenlonely trust Sultana to Tarrant or Townley, and Truelove was as dear as ever to the heart of Hope.

The cat and dog had grown fond of each other, and, for mutual warmth, the two old cronies generally nestled together.

As Hope stepped into the carriage, Captain Greville sprang out of an elegant cabriolet, drawn up on the other side of the road, and, throwing the reins to a tiny little tiger in top boots, buckskins, a cockaded hat, and groom's coat, he approached the carriage with a small basket of exquisite hot-house fruit, and a beautiful bouquet of rare flowers for Hope.

After shaking hands with both, he said—

"As I know you are going by the 10.27 train, I won't detain you (you'll only just do it), but say 'Farewell' till we meet at Glenlonely. Adieu, my lady—adieu, Miss Evermore!"

"Good-bye!" said Lady Glenlonely; "the sooner you come the better."

"Good-bye, Captain Greville," said Hope; "I have written to invite Miss Fitz-Darrell."

Captain Greville coloured to his very temples, smiled, and retired. He drove off in one direction as the landau dashed away in another.

It was a "shave," as the coachman, Mr. Burley, said; but they were in time. The railway bell rang just as they entered the station. There was not a moment to lose; and Hope said to herself, "I shall not see him then; he is not here; he cannot have had my note; he would not have disappointed me!"

No, Hope, you are right. Cherish that confidence, sweet loving girl! believe anything, everything, rather than doubt him; and see! in spite of every difficulty, there he is! pale with emotion! panting with haste!

He sees her, and the colour rushes to his cheeks, the love light sparkles in his eyes. He uncovers (with natural grace and man's reverence for woman), that noble head of clustering jet-black hair, and that broad white massive brow looks like the shrine of virtue and the throne of mind!

The beau idéal of a young Englishman of the working classes—modest though fearless, neat and scrupulously clean, though plain his clothes; gentle without effeminacy, and polite without affectation, Hope felt proud, in spite of her dainty breeding and fine clothes, of the young choice of her heart.

For one moment their eyes met; for one moment their hands were clasped together. He, too, had his offering, a modest bunch of double violets he had reared himself, and which filled the air with fragrance.

Lady Glenlonely, who liked him for Sultana's sake, nodded kindly to him; Hope took from the captain's choice bouquet its choicest sprig of myrtle and geranium, and gave them to Larky Grigg, saying, "Plant them in our little garden, for my sake, dear Larky;" and then, lowly whispering, she added, "One day we will tend them together."

She spoke from the window of the railway carriage, Lady Glenlonely being busy with Sultana.

As Hope handed Larky Grigg the flowers, he pressed his warm young lip to that little hand, so often in childhood and dear old ragged school days linked with his. It was ungloved—perhaps on purpose.

As the shrill whistle of the train announced that it was in motion, he murmured, "Heaven bless you, Hope; I go to labour in your dear cause, and try to rise in the social scale, that I may be more worthy of you!"

As long as the train was in sight, Hope waved her handkerchief to Larky Grigg, who stood responding with his cap in hand; but, at length, the lovers could see each other no more. Hope leant back in the carriage to weep, to think, to pray; and bold Larky folded his strong, muscular young arms over his broad manly chest and went back to his work; firm in faith, fond in love, and strong in resolution to rise!

He had youth, genius, energy, health, strength, ambition, love, great friends in Lord Glenlonely and the Earl and Countess of Arcliffe (once Gerald St. Maur and our Ada), and good, true, wise friends in Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen.

In a country where the highest offices in the state are open to its humblest citizens; where the son of a small retail butcher has sat on the woolsack (Lord High Chancellor of England); where the son of a barber has reached the same eminence, and has long been among our most honoured law lords; where almost all our millionaires have begun as errand boys, sweeping out the banks or offices over which they have ultimately presided; and where our greatest and best have been "Born in an attic—in a kitchen bred,"

Larky Grigg need not despair.

Nor did sweet Hope despair, either. How she esteemed him, might be traced in the kisses she gave the double violets he had presented, and the tears that dropped upon them ere she consigned them to her bosom. While the young captain's choice hot-house bouquet, which had cost half a guinea that very morning in Covent-garden Market (disordered by the withdrawal of the flowers she had given to Larky Grigg), lay unnoticed on an adjoining seat, and never even occurred to her mind till she perceived a beautiful spray of stephanotis half crushed by the fat, hot body of Sultana, who had crept from her berceau-nette on to the seat, and laid herself down on the choice bouquet, which she completely spoiled.

But gifts are dear chiefly for the donor's sake; and while Hope loves every leaf of Larky's bunch of violets, and will treasure them while life lasts, she cares nothing for the captain's flowers, which she looks upon as meant only to enlist her in his cause as Agnes Fitz-Darrell's suitor.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

A matchless pair,
In equal beauty formed and equal grace;
Hers the mild lustre of the rising morn,
And his the radiance of the risen day.

WHILE Hope is performing the often wearisome and fatiguing duties of companion to a fine lady in her lovely Highland home, and proving to all who come within her gentle Christian influence,

"How divine a thing a woman may be made,"

Larky is treading, with patient steps, "little by little," the steep ascent, where Fame's proud temple "gleams afar." Let us hope that he may not "Feel the influence of malignant star, Nor wage with fortune an eternal war."

But the onset of his upward career was not free, poor fellow! from the stings and arrows that "Patient merit of the unworthy takes."

Before he hurried off to take his farewell at the station of his darling Hope, as she had begged he would, in a dear little note, written in all the confidence of her loving girlish heart, he had left a note for his master, Mr. Nailor, saying that business of great importance compelled him to absent himself until the afternoon, when he would endeavour, by extra diligence and working over-hours for three days, to make up for the liberty he was taking; adding that had Mr. Nailor been down, he would have begged leave to go, but could not wait, as he should lose the object he had in view, if he did.

Now, Mr. Nailor was naturally a mean and brutal man, of a cold, sordid heart, and very fiery temper, rendered still more inflammable by habitual intemperance.

He was lazy and self-indulgent himself, and one of his chief sources of profit was the admirable skill, the great strength, and untiring zeal and energy of Larky Grigg, the only one among his workmen on whom he could entirely depend, saving always his foreman, an excellent young man, who, being hump-backed, was often an object of thoughtless ridicule to the other apprentices and workmen, but had always found a champion and ally in bold, brave Larky, who had more than once had a regular stand-up fight in defence of Stedman Stutter, the foreman, in which he had so thoroughly thrashed his opponents, that he was held in great awe and reverence as "cock of the walk;" and the stoutest fellow among them had no wish to entail upon himself that challenge from Larky "to have it out like a man," which was sure to result from a caricature, a sneer, or a cruel joke, aimed at "Steady Stutter," as he was called.

Steady Stutter was, like our Larky Grigg, one of the votaries of temperance.

All the virtues are nearly related, and so, indeed, are all the vices too.

Those who are under the influence of Temperance are generally also attached to their religion, lovers of Order, Probity, Industry, Cleanliness, Chastity, and even Purity; while those addicted to Intemperance are usually profligate, impure in thought and deed, idle, untidy, dirty, slovenly, wasteful! So it was in Mr. Nailor's workshop, so it is in all places, high or low, where men or women, young or old, are associated together in a common occupation.

And thus it was that Larky Grigg and Steady Stutter, the foreman, were close allies and warm friends, for Virtue and Religion formed the link between them; while all the others were boon companions and associates in Profligacy, Folly, and Sin.

Mr. Nailor hated what he profanely called those "righteous over much," but he liked to have his work well done, and plenty of it; and he said once, "that, though he hated abstinence chaps and Methodies, and didn't hold with 'em at all, yet the only honest, trustworthy fellows that wasn't eye-servants, was them church-going, psalm-singing, water-drinking fellows, Stedman Stutter and young Grigg Blossom, commonly called Larky Grigg—but why so called unbeknown, as he was the least larky of any chap on the premises."

Now it so happened that, when Larky Grigg returned to his work, after an early dinner with his dear mother, Apple Blossom, and when his head and heart were full of aspirations and honest wishes to "get on" for Hope's sake, he found Mr. Nailor a little the worse for liquor, and furious at the absence, without leave, of by far his best hand, just when a very large order for shovels had to be executed against time.

Steady Stutter had said all he could to appease Mr. Nailor and defend Larky; but, as usual,

"The man, convinced against his will,
Was of the same opinion still;"

and all he said only added fuel to fire, and extended the flame of Mr. Nailor's fury to himself. When Larky Grigg, then, entered the workshop, and proceeded to his thankless and laborious task of shovel-making, his heart burning and his eyes filling with tears, as he thought of Hope, Mr. Nailor, smelling strongly of beer and smoke, and looking very hot and red, came up and said, "I've a good mind to give you a precious good hiding, my fine feller. What do you mean to go for to presume to slink away from your work, and write to your master about business calling you away a 'ole mornin'? What business has a feller, a workman of mine, but my business? Perhaps you've been a-thinking to better yourself; you'd better just try that on."

"Well, sir," said Larky, stung by his menacing voice and gestures, "I couldn't be worse off: kept down to shovel-making among a low set of—"

But before he had finished the sentence, Nailor, beside himself with passion, had seized a heavy hammer that was lying on the table, and struck Larky violently with it on his head, as he bent it over a shovel he was finishing.

It was a savage blow: the blood positively gushed from the gash it made in Larky's head. The pain was acute; but it was the indignity that struck Larky as, pale as death, and not giving a thought to their relative positions, he with the shovel he was making, with one blow knocked Nailor down.

He then said, "I'll not thrash you as you deserve, master, and as I well could, because you're an elderly man, and, as usual, half seas over, but I'll never do another stroke in your workshop again. You've kept me down year after year to my injury for your own mean objects—and now you've lost a good workman for ever. Mr. Stedman Statler, I thank you for many a kindness, and I wish you well. As for you, master, and you, mates, I wish you all better."

So saying, Larky, stunned, giddy, and bleeding profusely, bound his handkerchief round his head, seized his hat and coat, while Nailor lay cursing on the floor, and the men looked on, awed by Larky's wrath, no one answering but Steady Statler, who said, "Good-bye, Larky; I wish you had kept your temper to the last; but God bless you, lad."

Larky rushed off to the first chemist's shop to get the wound in his head dressed, and then repaired to Stamford-street to consult Jem Goodman.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

A friend in need
Is a friend indeed.—OLD PROVERB.

JEM GOODMAN was no Job's comforter. He said that Larky had done wrong to strike his master, but as he had only done it by way of reprisal, and when he was writhing under the indignity of a blow, he readily excused in one so young an amount of manly spirit with which, all meek as he was, he could not but sympathise in his own heart.

"I will never return to Nailor's," said Larky, as he sat, partaking of the excellent dinner Jem Goodman's hospitality and clever little maid at once set before him.

"You never can return there, of course," said Jem Goodman; "and I should think you never could bear to be a burden on your parents."

"Never, while I've health to earn my own livelihood," said Larky. "But, Mr. Goodman, to tell you the truth, I want to be with some one who'll bring out what I feel and know there is in me. I don't want to be kept down to low drudgery like that of shovel-making, when I often think and feels that if I could but be put in the way of perfecting inventions that crosses my mind, I should be a great man some day; but I feel I want education—knowledge. If I had that, I'd be something great in mechanics or engineering, or something that leads to one's being looked upon as somebody. Look at Brunel—look at George Stephenson, and Faraday, and many, many others. I want to rise, that I may feel fit—"

"To marry Hope Evermore," suggested Mr. Goodman, with a kind smile.

"Lor! however did you guess that 'ere?" said Larky, turning very red.

"I have seen it, and approved of it, too, for a long time," said Jem Goodman; "and the first step towards it will be for me to find you a master who appreciates genius, and will help to develop it. Persevere; what it is hard to learn, is always most easily remembered. I will speak to your parents; they will be guided by me. We shall see you a great man yet, Larky."

"And can I ever become worthy of Hope Evermore?" said Larky Grigg; "can I ever have a home to offer her, where she can be happy?"

"Yes, and that not so very long hence!"

"Heaven reward and bless you, Mr. Goodman!"

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

Ah, who to sober measurement
Time's happy swiftness brings,
When birds of Paradise have lent
Their plumage for his wings;
Or who with nice discernment marks
The ebbing of his glass,
When all the sands are diamond sparks,
That dazzle as they pass?

WILLIAM SPENCER.

WHILE Larky Grigg was hard at work, rising betimes, and late taking rest—one object ever present to his mind, one wish, one hope one prospect ever distinct and vivid before him, namely, that of becoming more worthy of Hope, she was recruiting her strength and spirits in the wild, mountainous seclusion of Burnside.

Lady Glenlonely's health was so much restored that she was no longer confined to her own apartments. A change had come over her spirit; she no longer preferred the company of Hope to that of any other person. Always capricious, she now, though very kind to her young companion, gave her entire liberty in the disposal of her time. Lady Glenlonely's chief pleasure now was to accompany his lordship wherever he went.

In his excursions in the neighbourhood, she would make him drive her in her little park phaeton; she would sit by his side while he fished (he was a great lover of old Isaak Walton's favourite sport, and a great adept in the art), and even when he went grouse shooting she would take him his luncheon at some appointed hour and place.

The air, the exercise, and the new and healthy existence all this entailed, did her ladyship more good than physic or physicians had ever done. She was recovering a good deal of her bloom and embonpoint, and her beauty, which was always remarkable, became almost as brilliant as of yore. Miss Agnes Fitz-Darrell (our old friend little Nessy of the ragged school), having joyfully accepted Lady Glenlonely's invitation, arrived after the family had been at Burnside about a fortnight.

She brought with her large packing-cases of finery, her harp, and her guitar; and, having several very modish bonnets to display, she was much disappointed to find that large, brown hats, or cotton sun-bonnets were the only things worn at Burnside, except on Sunday at church, and by the countess, Lady Arnccliffe (once our Ada, who had arrived, with her baby, a few days after our party), or by Hope Evermore, who never looked lovelier than in her garden hat or cottage bonnet.

Not so Miss Fitz-Darrell,—her small, pale, and rather sharp-featured face required all the softening power of blonde and flowers to look at all pretty; but yet she would not for the world have worn a smart French bonnet, when ladies of real rank and fashion made it, by their example, the fashion to appear in garden hats or cotton bonnets.

Captain Greville had arrived at Burnside, in answer to Lord Glenlonely's invitation. He was a keen sportsman, a capital shot, and a very agreeable companion for his lordship, who grew very partial to him, and he had all the pleasing small talk, winning ways, and what the French call "talens de société," that make a man popular with the ladies. He was an invaluable acquisition in a country house. Rashleigh Greville was not a classical scholar, he was not deeply read, nor much given to investigation or to thought, but he was brilliant in conversation, elegant and refined in manner, highly accomplished, a fine musician, a capital dancer, fine swimmer and skater. He was what in the North is called a "nailing shot." He could adapt himself to any society, and make himself equally agreeable to Lord Glenlonely and the old Scotch shepherd, to her ladyship and to Tibbie, the old nurse, who had had the charge of the bairns at Burnside for "fifty lang year and mair."

To Ada, Countess of Arnccliffe, he appeared to be a gay, gladsome young fellow, who only required a strong guiding influence and a little serious thought to become a co-worker with herself in the good cause. Hope, too, had this impression; so animated did he become when they spoke of ragged schools, of Jem Goodman, Mr. Stephen, and Apple Blossom. His eyes would fill with tears when Hope described scenes she had witnessed, and he would make Ada (Lady Arnccliffe) promise that when they were again together in London, she would let him accompany her to the Green Fields Ragged School, and would introduce him to Jem Goodman and Mr. Stephen, and put him in the way of helping a little in so good and interesting a cause.

Nor was he less delighted when Ada spoke of the "Temperance movement," and described the home of the working man who indulged, and of him who abstained. Whole mornings did Captain Greville sit with Lady Arnccliffe and Hope, reading aloud to them works connected with Ragged Schools and Temperance, taking notes, writing letters, or adding up sums for them, while they plied their needles for The Poor.

On such occasions Miss Fitz-Darrell always contrived to absent herself. She had a sketch to take, or a letter to write, or a new piece to practise, or she would contrive to induce Lady Glenlonely to ask her to accompany her in her park phaeton, to take Lord Glenlonely his luncheon.

On other occasions when Ada was busy with her baby, Captain Greville would pass the morning singing and playing the guitar with Hope and Agnes, or he would accompany them on sketching parties, or row them on the lake. Time, which seldom seems to fly in the country, went smoothly on. Our party were never dull, and that certainly was owing in a great measure to the versatile talents of Rashleigh Greville.

There was a general impression, but no one could tell whence it arose, that the attraction that rendered quiet, secluded Burnside delightful to the gay young captain, was Agnes Fitz-Darrell.

She was not so beautiful, simple, frank, and amiable as Hope Evermore, it is true, but she was piquante, bright, extremely clever, very elegant in dress and manners, and highly accomplished. Then, too, she had a fortune, which no gay young captain would overlook or despise. Hope, who in her sweet humility and extreme kindness and generosity, underrated herself as much as she overrated others, always thought herself quite eclipsed by the fashionable dress and graces of Agnes Fitz-Darrell.

She never for a moment doubted that Captain Greville was in love with Agnes. Agnes, who was naturally very clever, and had had such great advantages! who could talk to him in French, Italian, or German! play any accompaniment at first sight, and not merely sketch off a scene or a likeness, but finish the former in oils, the latter as a miniature on ivory!

What were Hope's small acquisitions to such genius as this? What Hope's simple white dresses and long, natural curls to all the becoming French inventions that set off the tall, very slight form and small head of Agnes Fitz-Darrell?

Every one at Burnside considered with Hope that Captain Greville intended to propose to Agnes, and Agnes herself had not a doubt on the subject. He was not quite as grand, as important, or as wealthy as she, in her worldliness and ambition, had intended her husband should be; but he was a gentleman, he was well received, nay, even fêted in that society in which it was her ambition to move; and more than this, than these, than all, she loved him! He was the first fashionable man, indeed, the first gentleman, she had known intimately, or on terms of equality. He had certainly distinguished her by attentions at once delicate and flattering. If she married him at once, she got rid of the odious name of Darrell, even before she made her début in the world. Before she had known and loved him, she would have preferred an old nobleman, particularly if he had been wealthy and influential. But the heart of Woman in her earliest youth will speak out! And surely it ought to have a voice in the disposal of her hand and her destiny, temporal and eternal; for on her choice of a husband often depends a woman's conduct and character, her fate in this world, and her salvation in the next!

CHAPTER XC.

The nymph must lose her female friend,
If more admired than she.—COWPER.

Then what does Chloe want?—she wants a heart.
POPE.

EVERYTHING went on very calmly and pleasantly in the sweet seclusion of Burnside. Captain Greville divided his attentions so equally between Lord Glenlonely and out-door sports, Lady Glenlonely and Sultana, Lady Arnccliffe and her Christian pursuits, Hope and Agnes and their elegant accomplishments—(even Truelove coming in for a share of his notice, old and toothless as both she and Sultana were by this time)—that no unprejudiced person could have said that any one of the party engrossed his affections or monopolised his attentions; and yet, by a sort of tacit understanding and general consent, he was looked upon as Miss Agnes Fitz-Darrell's lover, and even her intended.

Lord Glenlonely would sometimes crack a sly joke if Greville was absent in mind, while present in person; and Lady Glenlonely would promote his being with Miss Fitz-Darrell in a manner that brought the faintest tinge of colour to the very pale, soft cheek of Agnes herself.

Hope looked upon Captain Greville and Agnes Fitz-Darrell as well suited; and, feeling a warm and lively regard for them both, she lavished on them every possible proof of interest and affection. And Hope had a great deal in her power at Burnside; and, in the absence of the deaf old housekeeper, Mrs. Makepeace, took her place,—kept the keys, ordered the dinner, regulated the establishment, was as busy as a bee from morning till night, flitted about like the daughter of the house, rather than a hireling and companion, and anything that any one wanted they had to ask Hope for; so she was a very important person, indeed, at Burnside!

About this time Burnside was alive with the news that "The Castle," belonging to the Marquis of Doun, a nobleman of immense wealth, who had been abroad for several years, was getting ready to receive his lordship, who was coming with a large party of sporting gentlemen and grand ladies; and as it was his first visit, as Lord of the Castle, to his ancestral home, a succession of fêtes, balls, private theatricals, and parties of all kinds, would be given at the castle, and the surrounding tenantry were devising every means in their power of showing their attachment to his lordship, and making him welcome to his Scottish home.

Lord and Lady Glenlonely, who had been intimate with the noble marquis's parents, and had known himself in his boyhood, were, of course, much interested in the accounts they heard of the meditated festivities at Castle Doun.

Hope blushed and trembled when she heard that Lady Glenlonely intended to take her with her, to share in whatever pleasures the noble marquis and his friends devised for the entertainment of his guests. Agnes Fitz-Darrell, in a state of inward ecstasy, turned to her large cases of ball dresses, dinner, evening, and walking dresses—many of which had been quite useless to her, in the domestic seclusion of her life at Burnside.

"Rashleigh," she said to herself, "will see me in my element—in full dress at a ball or a concert. I often see him gazing at Hope in her large hat, or her cotton bonnet, and her plain white dress. I know in such attire she eclipses me, but when he sees us both in evening dress, and when we are asked to dance, play, or sing, he will not think anything of Hope! And I trust, after the first party at which we appear, he will propose to me!"

(To be continued.)

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. VII.

"I WAS walking not long ago," said I, "on the sands at Bridlington, when, for the first time, catching sight of the lower timbers jutting out about the base of the pier, I was struck by the strangely coloured appearance of the upper parts. My first thought was that they had suffered from some kind of rot; on nearer approach I had the notion that it was attributable to sea-weed; but, when sufficiently close to examine the cause, I was astonished at finding it arose from small mussels, swarming in such multitudes as to defy all calculation."

SHELL WITH BYSSUS.

"The common mussel," said Wilton, "in abundance, as you saw it, on the Yorkshire coast, and which may often be observed covering the surface of the rocks at low water, always chooses the most open situations. As an article of food, Dr. Knapp tells us that there cannot be used fewer than four hundred bushels annually in Edinburgh and Leith. As each bushel, when shelled and freed from all refuse, probably contains from three to four pints of the molluscs, or about nine hundred or a thousand, according to their size, if we take the latter number, there appears to be consumed in Edinburgh and Leith every year, about four hundred thousand mussels. This, however, is a mere trifle compared with the enormous numbers used in bait, for all kinds of fish. At Newhaven alone it is calculated that the annual consumption for this purpose may be reckoned at five millions; and as there are nearly as many used at Musselburgh and various other places in the Frith of Forth, the estimate of the annual use of mussels by the fishermen of that district, for bait only, is thirty or forty millions in each year. The consumption both for food and bait in other places must be enormous. Notwithstanding the immense masses you saw at Bridlington, mussels in multitudes are brought thither for bait from the coast of Lincolnshire."

"Is the mussel stationary as the oyster, or can it move like the cockle?"

"It resembles the latter rather than the former. The valves of the mussel-shell fit very closely together, and are opened or closed by means of a reddish-coloured, fleshy protuberance. This is divided into two lobes, and when the creature chooses to remove from its place, it gradually opens the shell, and pushing forth a kind of fleshy foot, makes a furrow in the sand, and draws its shell in this, in a vertical position. It has, however, a still more important function, for it weaves silken threads which the mollusc affixes to the rock and its neighbour mussel, and thus, mutually combined, and each grasping the rock, the community of mussels live together in amity and security."

"This thread appears to be of considerable strength. Even that of a spider, I remember, is not single, but hundreds of fibres issuing from as many points in the insect's spinneret, are combined in one, that thus it may have all necessary strength, just as a rope is made (though, doubtless, far less perfectly) of many strands."

"The mussel's thread," said Wilton, "is probably constituted in the same manner as the spider's. Of the structure and action of the mollusc's spinneret, however, I have, as yet, met with no description."

OSTRE HYOTIS, SNAIL SHELL, AND CARINAIRE.

There may remain, perhaps, much to be discovered in reference to this organ by some indefatigable microscopist. How I should like to watch his various movements, to sympathise with his oft-recurring failures, to see him brace himself up to more effort and patience, and, at length, to supply the chorus to another shout like that of Archimedes, 'I have found it—I have found it!' Perfect must be the spinneret which yields threads of such strength. It is a singular fact that at a long bridge over the Towridge River, in the county of Devon, the tide flowed so rapidly that mortar failing to keep it in repair, the interstices were filled with mussels, whose strong threads, fixed to the stone-work, prevented the bridge from being driven away; and so important was the aid of these little creatures considered, that to remove them, except in the presence of the corporate authorities, was made a crime, exposing the delinquent to the penalty of transportation."

"A most remarkable fact certainly. Other molluscs, I believe, have this gift of spinning."

"Yes, a considerable number of bivalves are thus endowed; the threads they produce being more or less loosely connected; but all issuing from the base of the foot of the shell-dweller. The largest of these which our British seas reveal to us is the pectinated pinna, which is sometimes twelve inches long. It has a byssus, consisting of numerous silky fibres of a dark purplish colour. The people of Sicily and Calabria prepare it for making a kind of stuff. The threads, when broken away, are sold to women, who, after washing them in soap and water, dry them in the shade, and then, combing them, card the silk. A fabric has been thus manufactured, of a beautiful yellowish brown, which never fades. A manufactory of byssus has long been established at Palermo; and there gloves, stockings, caps, and waistcoats are made of it. So fine was the substance of a pair of stockings woven from the silk of the pinna, for Pope Boniface XV., that they were inclosed in a case no larger than a common snuff-box. Our Cornish fishermen sometimes have their line so entangled by beds of these creatures, that it requires the byssus to be violently torn for its release, or the breaking up of the ground and the removal of many of these molluscs. The pinna obtains its food in a singular manner. The valves of the shell stand upright, with the wide end about an inch above the surface, and the lower part attached by the byssus. As, then, the upper end of the shell is open about two inches, the mollusc within seems to say, 'Eat me who will;' but only let some fish make an entrance, and the shells are instantly closed, not only at the side, but at the top; and the captive soon perishes from the closeness of his confinement, or is actually crushed to death."

"And yet, I suppose, one living creature can reside between the two shells, not only with impunity, but with advantage. What say you to Darwin's story of the 'Pinna and her Cancer friend.'"

"That it is only a story, so far as sympathy and affection between the two creatures are concerned. It was certainly a romantic affair for a minute crab to take up its abode between the shells of the pinna, and to repay its sea-lord for its lodging by keeping a good look-out, and giving warning of any coming ill; and for the services respectively afforded, to engender and sustain a mutual interest. But what, alas! for the poetry, is the plain matter of fact? It was known to the ancients that a minute crab was found in the shell of the pinna, and modern naturalists

THE NAUTILUS, AS IT IS SUPPOSED TO BE.

THE NAUTILUS, AS IT IS

have discovered others which inhabit the shells of other bi-valves, particularly mussels and cockles. Two species of them are found on our own coasts.

One of them, found within the shell of the common mussel, especially when raised from deep water, has a shell from a quarter to nearly half an inch in breadth, rounded and convex, of a thin substance and brownish colour, with one or two yellow spots. The other species, of a more angular form and uniform brown colour, is found within the shell of the pinna. The genus is called, therefore, Pinnotheres. Their shells are very soft and thin, and so they retreat to the shells of the molluscs, and find there, as the soldier crab does in the shell of a whelk, a safe and cozy retreat.

'Well! facts are chiefs that dinna win,
And canna be disputed;'

and there is much poetry of which we cannot say the like. In former times the line was often repeated:

'Learn of the little nautilus to sail.'

for it was supposed to uplift a minute membrane, which, catching the wind, urged on the little craft of the mollusc. Another poet says:—

'Light as a flake of foam upon the wind,
Keel upward, from the deep emerged a shell,
Shaped like the moon ere half her horn is filled;
Fraught with young life, it righted as it rose,
And moved at will along the yielding water.
The native pilot of this little bark
Put out a tier of oars on either side,
Spread to the wafting breeze a twofold sail,
And mounted up and glided down the billow
In happy freedom, pleased to feel the air,
And wander in the luxury of light!'

But not long ago, it was shown, I think, by a lady naturalist, that the nautilus has no sail, and that the appearance of the creature is such that 'the poet's eye, with a 'fine frenzy rolling,' would never dwell upon it with complacency, much less with ecstasy."

"Such is, indeed, the fact. But there is a very curious creature, called the physalia, or Portuguese man-of-war. It is very numerous in the Atlantic

THE PHYSALIA.

Ocean, and more especially in the warmest regions, and at a considerable distance from land; but it is very rarely captured on the British coasts. Occasionally it is met with on the southern shores of England and Ireland. Though somewhat grotesque in form, it is a most lovely animal. It has a floating bladder nearly egg-shaped, with a snout at one end and a pointed tail at the other, and crested with a ridge of fair purple. So glossy is the surface as to reflect all the colours of the rainbow. From the lower side of this remarkable organ depend a great number of tubular filaments of various lengths and shapes. Some of them are cylindrical, others wavy and tapering to a point, and others resembling fine threads of cheride spirally convoluted; the whole, too, is gay with brilliant changeable tints of green, blue, and gold. These are, in fact, the organs of prehension, absorption, and digestion of the physalia, and are suffered to play freely in the nourishing element. Nothing can exceed the beauty of the spectacle presented by a numerous fleet of these creatures quietly sailing in the tropical seas. But whenever the surface is ruffled by the slightest wind, they suddenly absorb the air from their vesicles, become heavier than the water, and immediately sink to the still depths of the ocean."

"Is this creature a mollusc?"

"No; it has no shell, and belongs to a different and distinct class of beings. The velella, which sails on the surface of the sea, and is brought in great numbers to our western and southern shores in the summer and autumn, is another species, having something like a skeleton, surrounded by the soft substance of the body. This membranous, boat-shaped skeleton is furnished with a vertical plate, placed diagonally. It is transparent, and of a horny, membranous texture. The internal skeleton is very light and spongy, filled with air-cells and sufficiently buoyant to keep the animal on a level with the surface of the water; and the vertical plate, rising into the air, acts like a sail, by which the creature is driven rapidly along. Still further (though the animal is without oars or paddles, yet), from the lower surface of the body there hang down numerous dark blue tentacles, disposed in several rows, by means of which the animal can change its direction, or move along when there is not wind enough to catch its tiny sail."

"Another complete and beautiful arrangement, Wilton. We may say then, henceforth, that marine creatures have sails, though the nautilus has none."

I have now a true tale for you of a very ingenious and tasteful artist of the waters—a creature called a lima, which is inclosed in a white shell. This fragile dwelling does not cover the body of the mollusc, for it has a beautiful orange fringe-work, which hangs altogether out of the shell. Think, then, of some prowling haddock in search of a breakfast or a lunch: would he not, at the sight of such a bait, eagerly snap at it, and reckon it quite a bonne bouche? Certainly he would; and hence it is ordered that the instinct of the lima should provide against such perils. Not that it is taught to hide itself among the loose coral, for the first rude wind might then lay it naked and bare; therefore, unseen beneath the waters, it builds a beautiful little coral nest, not to be exceeded for its tranquillity and comfort by the cosy structure of a goldfinch or a weaver-bird. And here it discovers more than one art. First of all, the lima is a mason, collecting carefully the small pieces of coral adapted to its purpose; but as these, if remaining loose, would be insecure and uncomfortable, it is a spinner, making for itself a cordage to bind a handful of these fragments firmly together; and then, while the outside is left rough, and fitted to exclude or ward off some cunning foe, it is not desirable for the inside to be so, and therefore the lima fills up the interstices with fine slime, so that it is a smooth plaster-work; and even lines this with a fine tapestry, that there may be nothing left to injure the delicate fringed appendages of the inclosed animal. We are indebted for a knowledge of this remarkable creature to the late Dr. Landsborough—a most intelligent and zealous naturalist—who says:—"Tapestry, as a covering for walls, was once the proud and costly ornament of regal apartments; but ancient though the art was, I shall answer for it that our little marine artisan took no hint from the Gobelins, or from the workmen of Arras, or from those of Athens, or even from the earnest tapisseries of the East. I doubt not that from the time that Noah's ark rested on the mountain of Ararat, the forefathers of these beautiful little limas have been constructing their coral cottages, and lining them with well-wrought tapestry, in the peaceful bay of Lamlash."

"Why, that I should call poetry in prose, Wilton. Suppose the nautilus had a sail, and was accustomed to work it skilfully; still, the little mariner must 'hide his diminished head' before such a combination of the arts of life as is displayed by this building, spinning, plastering tapisserie of a lima. What can you tell me of the wonder-worker himself?"

"Taken out of its nest and placed in a jar of seawater, it is one of the most beautiful marine creatures you can behold; the shell, too, is elegant, and the orange fringe-work, without, highly ornamental. It is no sluggard in the waters, nor even a creature of little activity, for it swims about with great vigour. Do you ask, 'How can this be done?' The answer is, 'Its mode of swimming is the same as that of the scallop: it opens its valves, and suddenly shutting them, expels the water; so that the creature is urged onwards or upwards; and when the impulse thus given is spent, it repeats the operation, and thus moves forward by a succession of jerks, or jumps, taking long and rapid leaps, and shooting hither and thither in an irregular course. Hence, these molluscs have been called, 'the butterflies of the ocean,' not only from the delicacy and beautiful colouring of the wing-like shell, but also from their agile motions. When thus moving through the water, the reddish fringe-work is like the tail of a fiery comet. The filaments may, for anything we know, be useful in catching their prey; they are very easily broken off, and it is remarkable that they seem alive for many hours after they are detached, twisting themselves about in a vermicular, or worm-like manner."

"A curious instance, indeed, Wilton, of creatures which we should suppose doomed to quietude like the oyster, becoming most vigorous locomotives."

BARNACLE.

"You have often seen, doubtless, creatures known to every one on the shore—for they encrust our piers as with a stony covering, gather especially about the helm of vessels, and are observable on rocks and shells, drift-wood, and stones. One of these, the Barnacle, is lodged within a white shell, flattened at the sides, opening by a slit down one edge, and fixed on a soft, flexible, fleshy stalk. The shell is composed of five pieces, joined together by membranes. Within this coat of mail lies the soft body of the barnacle, with its head towards the lower end of the shell—near the place where it is fixed to the stalk—and its tail at the upper extremity. The tail is not unlike that of one of the crustaceans, or crab-like race, and is bordered on each side by six lobes, each of which supports a pair of long ciliated, or feinged arms, the whole resembling a plume of purple feathers. When the animal is alive, these arms are constantly in motion, projecting outward, and expanding into an oval, concave net, then retracting inwards, and closing upon whatever may have come within their reach. So well are they placed, that any small matter which becomes entangled within them can rarely escape, but finds a ready passage to the mouth of the animal. In China, you know, strange things are eaten. A recent traveller had been regaling himself at a village inn in that country, and wishing to know if a dish he particularly liked were duck, as he supposed it to be, he made the sounds 'Quack, quack, quack?' interrogatively to the attendant, who knew just as much English as the traveller did Chinese. The attendant showed instantly that he understood the meaning of the inquiry, for, gravely shaking his head, he responded in the sounds, 'Bow, wow, wow!' The traveller, however, would have fared differently had he been served, as he might have been, with a dish of barnacles. They turn from red to white in boiling, and are said to resemble the lobster in flavour. Now, accustomed to see these creatures attached to various objects, you would not suppose, perhaps, that they were ever otherwise."

"That is precisely my notion at this moment," said I.

"A very natural one, too," said Wilton. "But it is demonstrated that, in their first period of existence, they were covered only with a thin crust, and had limbs and tails, so that then they were active creatures, swimming vigorously and freely about in the waters. A long and interesting tale might be told of such metamorphoses; but again we must pause."

The Matron.

NO. XXXVII.

THE use of marking-ink has become very general, and for under-clothing or house-linen it has great advantages; but marking with silk or marking-cotton is still required for coloured things, and it is an art that every mother should teach her little daughters. To facilitate instruction on this subject, I will explain the marking-stitch. Let two threads be taken each way of the cloth, and remember that the needle must be passed three ways, in order that the stitch may be complete. The first is aslant from you, and towards the right hand; the second is downwards, towards you; and the third is the reverse of the first. For the shape of the letters it will be well to consult a sampler.

Forethought is as necessary in what relates to clothing as in providing food; and a prudent wife or mother, when buying new clothes for herself or her children, bears in mind that these clothes will grow old, and will require mending. She will therefore recollect to buy an additional quantity for repairs, and keep this extra quantity carefully for the purpose.

Most of my female readers who may not venture on cutting out or making a new dress, feel perfectly capable of mending an old one; and nothing looks worse (except holes) than a gown of one pattern mended with a piece of another. But, if provided with some of the same stuff, most Englishwomen are handy enough (with the old pattern for a guide) to give to a patched dress a very respectable appearance.

In mending stockings, much depends on taking them in time. Examine them as they come from the wash, and darn over the thin-looking parts before they have lapsed into holes. But stockings should not be mended over and over again, nor be made to last for ever, any more than other articles of wear. A sock or stocking rendered uncomfortable by repeated darns is almost as trying to the patience of a husband or a brother, as socks or stockings full of holes. Let stockings and socks be fairly worn and fairly mended, and let them be removed when they have served their turn. Before I take my leave of this subject, I must give you a hint about worsted stockings. It is this: they should never be mended with worsted that is perfectly new; because, it shrinks more than the stockings themselves, and draws them up out of all proper shape. You should unravel the leg of an old worsted stocking, and darn the hole with the worsted thus procured.

Under-petticoats that are beginning to wear out behind, should have the back breadths put in front. With dresses, the hinder breadths are often the best; and a dress-skirt may be made to look almost as good as new by being turned round. If the hem is much worn or discoloured by wet or mud, putting the top (the part gathered round the waist) to the bottom is often found to be a good plan; and the discoloured part may be concealed in the plaits or folds. However, prevention is better than cure; and the longer a dress can be kept in its pristine state the better. Economical dressers always suit their toilet to the weather. The appearance of fancy-stuffs and of silks is generally spoilt by rain. But prints, and stuffs in fast colours, can stand a shower without undergoing any serious injury. For our uncertain climate, a dress of dark twill stuff, with a black woollen petticoat under it, is a style of dress, one can wear all the year round, if we except the very height of summer. Woollen stuffs have this great advantage over silks, that when they have become muddy (if only left to dry), a good clothes brush can make them look as well as ever.

Black silk dresses last very long, if worn only in fine weather. In Switzerland (in parts where French fashions have not driven away old customs) black is worn not only on solemn but also on festive occasions. A black dress is considered particularly well suited for attending church. A bride is married in black, and an infant is christened in a little robe of black velvet. I am speaking of the custom in Zurich, as I recollect it in the early part of the present reign. It was nothing very extraordinary in Zurich for a black silk dress, bought new for a confirmation, to be still presentable ten years after.

On returning from walking out in a silk dress, one should never put it away without shaking it thoroughly. Dust is almost as injurious to the texture of silk as moisture. But a really good printed cotton is almost as lasting as silk. I recollect an interesting old peasant woman in Devonshire, who was perfectly picturesque from her antique appearance. When she was complimented on her cotton gown, she replied she had had it "fifty years." So much for the good effects of care on female attire. Care is equally necessary in everything that relates to house-linen. Sheets require a good deal of consideration. Even when considerably worn, they should not be patched till the upper hems have been joined and the middle cut open and hemmed. When worn for a few years after this operation, the sides may be joined, the sheet again opened in the middle, and the sides nicely hemmed. These processes will diminish the size of the sheets, but they will make them serviceable for a good many years, and effect one great object in economy—"make the best of them."

Small Change.

WE should not, in our attempts to elevate ourselves, lose sight of safety. He who stands upon a tall man's shoulders, can look over the heads of those around him, but his footing is much less secure than theirs.

A CLERGYMAN, who lives on the seashore, says he likes calm Sundays, because he is opposed to Sabbath breakers.

CERTAINLY no beings ever yet lived the life nature intended them to live, or had fair play for heart and mind, who contrived, by hook or by crook—to marry the wrong person!

ON THE GREAT "NOTHING TO WEAR" QUESTION.

A wife, to dress
In the mode, I guess,
Picks a husband's bones quite clean,
And poor Mr. Spratt
Must cry "No fat!"
As his wife will cri-no-ine.

WHEN Lord Townsend was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the then Provost of Dublin lost no opportunity of repeating solicitations for "places." "My dear Hely," said his lordship, "you have a great many things, and I have nothing to give but a captaincy of dragoons." "I accept it then," replied the Provost. "What, you take a captaincy?" answered his lordship. "Zounds! it is impossible; I only meant it as a joke." "And I accept it," replied the Provost, "merely to show you how well I can take a joke."

RUSSELL, the singer, was once singing in a provincial town "The Gambler's Wife," and having uttered the words,

"Hush! he comes not yet!
The clock strikes one,"

he struck the key to imitate the sudden knell of the departed hour, when a respectably-dressed woman ejaculated, to the amazement of everybody, "Wouldn't I have fetched him home!"

MOVING FOR A NEW TRIAL.—Courting a second wife.

LITERATURE has her quacks no less than medicine, and they are divided into two classes—those who have erudition without genius, and those who have volubility without depth. We get second-hand sense from the one, and original nonsense from the other.

THIS epitaph is inscribed on the grave of a smuggler in a country churchyard. He was shot by the excisemen:

Here I lie.
Killed by the XI's.

It is in vain to stick your finger in the water, and, pulling it out, look for the hole; and equally vain to suppose that, however large a space you may occupy, the world will miss you when you die.

THE following "notice" is posted in the news-room of a country tavern: "Gentlemen learning to spell are requested to use yesterday's paper."

A FELLOW in the country is going to have his life insured, so that when he dies he can have something to live on, and not be dependent on the old charities of the world as he once was.

A GREEK poet implies that the height of bliss is the sudden relief of pain; there is a nobler bliss still—the rapture of the conscience at the sudden release from a guilty thought.

WHY does a lady with wealthy lovers around her hear more music than anybody else?—Because she hears several millionaires (million airts) at once.

ALL the ideas of King William III. were military. Being told that Dean Swift was a very clever fellow, and had done great service to his majesty, the king replied:—"Very well, then I'll give him a troop of light dragoons."

TRUTH, like the sun, submits to be obscured, but only for a time.

"WILL you have it rare, or well done?" said a landlord to an Irishman, a few days ago, as he was cutting a piece of roast beef. "I love it well done ever since I am in this country, for it was rare enough we used to ate in Ireland."

T. WASBOROUGH.—We fully appreciate the friendly tone of your remarks, and concur with you in the opinion that "the cause of temperance would be advanced by the dissemination of a knowledge of Chess amongst the poorer classes."

INQUIRENDO.—The Queen in most cases wins against Rook and Pawn, but great care is required.

T. S.—A re-examination of Problem No. 60 will probably convince you that there is not an unnecessary piece on the board.

MONA.—What think you of R to K 5 in reply to your first move in Problem No. 53?

J. RILEY.—Thanks for the Problem, but it is much too simple. In Problem No. 60, you overlook the escape of the Black King at K B 5, if White play as you propose.

NOTICE.

On September 10th was published the first number of the PHOTOGRAPHIC NEWS, price 3d. weekly, or free by post, 4d. This journal must prove of the highest interest to every person wishing to become conversant with the beautiful and advancing art of Photography. Communications to be addressed to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, Belle Sauvage Yard, E.C.

A TARRY-AT-HOME TRAVELLER.—Since you take such an interest in the movements of Louis Napoleon, you ought to be a little better acquainted with the position of the places he visits. Rennes has nothing to do with the south of France; it is the chief town of Ile and Vilaine, one of the western departments. When France was divided into provinces (as it was before the accession to power of Napoleon the First) Rennes was the capital of the province of Bretagne. Rennes is an ancient, large, and populous city. Its streets are as straight as an arrow, but in general they are rather too narrow and dark. In the grand square this city can boast of elegant edifices; viz., the Palace of Justice, and the Hotel de Ville. Rennes is watered by the river Vilaine, which divides it into two parts.

AN EXILE'S WIFE.—We feel for your anxiety respecting your absent husband, and we sincerely hope that a regular and rapid communication with Australia may soon be established. Before the breaking out of the Crimean war, it was believed this would soon be effected by way of the Red Sea and the Pacific Ocean, but when it was decided that an army should be sent out in defence of the Turks, the most eligible vessels for transports were decided to be those on the line between London and Melbourne. They were accordingly impressed, and the communication between England and Australia was interrupted. Peace has long since been restored, and it is much to be lamented that so little has been done to facilitate intercourse with Australia. Referring to the map, there can be little doubt that the line across the Isthmus of Suez by the Red Sea, would not only be the most expeditious, but the least liable to interruption. Taking the average speed of a well-built steamer, it has been calculated that the voyage from London to Melbourne can be accomplished in forty-two days, allowing for casualties and stoppages for coaling.

A STRANGER IN LONDON.—Although the Lord Mayor's day is on the 9th of November, it is on the 29th of September that the new Lord Mayor is chosen. The Lord Mayor, as a magistrate, has a very laborious office; but if titles could reward him, he has enough of them. He possesses, among others, those of Lord Lieutenant of the county of London, Chief Butler at the coronation of the sovereign; Meter of coals and grain, of salt and fruit; Conservator of the Thames; Admiral of the Port, and Justice of gaol delivery for Newgate.

X. Y. Z.—None of the fruits you like so much are indigenous. The peach and walnut came originally from Persia; the grape and apricot from Armenia, a very fertile country in Asia, watered on the north by the ancient river Euphrates. Armenia was formerly governed by its own kings, but the Turks and Persians hold possession of it at present. The cherry, chestnut, fig, olive, and mulberry come from Asia Minor. According to geologists, in times long before the historic period, the climate of Britain was tropical, and then, of course, it produced tropical fruits; but at the time of the first invasion of the Romans (a few years before the birth of Christ) the only indigenous fruits of this country were the sloe, the blackberry, the currant, the strawberry, the cranberry, the elderberry, hips, haws, acorns, hazel nuts, and beech-mast. Our indigenous vegetables consisted of carrots, celery, beet, sea-kale, and mushrooms.

S. E.—Phosphorus is an animal production, and iodine a vegetable one. Phosphorus is the base of an acid found in bones, and the oxygen is detached by charcoal at a red heat. Iodine is procured from sea-weed. It is of a violet colour, and evaporates very easily. It changes vegetable blues to yellow. Iodine is very valuable as a medicine. It is much used by the faculty in the removal of scrofulous complaints.

ALFRED, B.S.G.W., Moss Rose Bud.—While perusing your letter we were tempted to advise you to confess the state of your feelings to your master's daughter, and to trust to that generosity which is woman's most charming attribute; but when we came to that part of your communication in which you tell us that your second love is an engaged lady, we unhesitatingly pronounce your present passion to be an ill-omened one. We advise you to give it no encouragement.—In the case of B. S. G. W., the greatest service he can confer on the woman he loves is to set her the example of sacrificing feeling to duty. As much manliness may be shown in contests with his own inclinations as in leading a forlorn hope. The great poet Campbell mentions sentimental trials among those of a more ostensible nature, and he considers it equally the work of fortitude to conquer the former as the latter. The bard's inspiring lines are as follows:—

"Be hushed, my dark spirit, for wisdom condemns,
When the faint and the feeble deplore;
Be firm as the rock of the ocean that stems
A thousand wild waves on the shore.
Through the perils of chance and the scowls of disdain,
May thy front be unaltered, thy courage elate,
Nay even the name I have worshipped in vain,
Shall awake not the sigh of remembrance again;
For to bear is to conquer our fate."

As to "Moss Rose Bud" we are of opinion that she had better not think of love and matrimony just yet. If the gentleman who has attracted her attention possesses, as she supposes, a "fine intellect," we do not doubt he will be of our opinion.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We receive so many well written letters invariably terminating with a request for our opinion of the handwriting, that if we complied with the wishes of all who desire our opinion on this subject, the Editorial Table would become uninteresting to the general reader on account of the sameness resulting from repeated paragraphs in praise of penmanship. We, therefore, beg all the good writers who desire our commendation, not to attribute our silence to neglect, but to the fear of tiring our readers by repetitions. As to bad or indifferent writers, should any such be found among the readers of this Paper, we strongly recommend them (in order to improve themselves in writing) to procure the Model Copy-Books, published by Messrs. Ward and Lock, Fleet-street.

J. CLIFTON.—It is only the park deer that are called the fallow deer. The large red deer inhabit wild and mountainous districts. They have a leader, and, if necessary, they fight in concert. The females will expose themselves to save their young. The male deer only have horns; these (after their sixth year) they shed annually. It is a remarkable fact that the fallow deer will, for successive days, fight in parties for their pasture.

BODILY COMPLAINTS AND INFIRMITIES.—Anxious; W. J. P. J.; J. Sallott; Lillian; A Fat One; Ellen Vannin; Quintin Matsys; George C.; Narcotic; An Anxious One; A Sufferer; Cabee; E. F.; An Anxious Inquirer; Charlie; W. Eakly; D. H.; A Lover of Cassell's Paper; D. O. M.; Iron; Chrome; H. A.; K. Thomas; Assistant Chemist; Charlotte; and several others. We can do no more than recommend application to skilful medical advisers.

A CONSTANT READER.—Schamyl, against whom the Russians, under General Yewdokimoff, have recently been so successful, is one of the most celebrated warriors of the age; but the Circassian tribes he has so often led on to victory, belong only to a half-civilised country. Circassia is bounded on the north by Russia, and on the south by the Black Sea. Its western shores are opposite those of the Crimea.

MILES.—The idiom of the French language requires that the negation in such sentences as you quote should have a particle instead of an indefinite article. Consequently, "Je n'ai pas de montre," for I have not a watch, is more idiomatic than "Je n'ai pas une montre."

LILY OF THE VALLEY.—It is not necessary to introduce friends you meet to those with whom you may be walking; but it is not a breach of etiquette to introduce parties thus situated to each other, supposing you are convinced that there is not any objection on either side to forming acquaintance. It is quite sufficient for a lady to beg a gentleman to be seated; she is not expected to hand him a chair.

A BRICK, G. H. W., VIOLET.—We think you are very likely to get on in the colony you mention. The recent success of the Atlantic telegraph has more than doubled the importance of British America. As your wife and companion in your emigration, we do not advise you to fix on the "exquisitely beautiful daughter of a proud family," but to seek out some modest, industrious, well-informed maiden, whose domestic virtues promise that she will make your home happy.—Under the circumstances, we think you would be justified in destroying the portrait.—From your letter, we are disposed to think you are not much in love with either of your suitors. If this is the case, we do not hesitate to advise you to accept the tradesman who is doing business for himself, rather than the tradesman's son, who is shopman to a grocer.

M. B. and M. C.—"M. B." complains that among all her lovers she has never met with a true one. From the description "M. B." gives of herself, she has beauty enough to fix the regard of the most decided male flirt in all London. What we suspect is, that "M. B." is not sufficiently frank in affairs of the heart. She tells us of a gentleman who has courted her for four years. She adds that she loved him, but that "he never knew it." Reserve is very becoming in a young lady; but it may be carried too far. If our correspondent has estranged her lover by her coldness, she must be all the more cordial to him should he return to her.—"M. C.'s" case can be more summarily disposed of. She is beloved "by an honourable, upright young man, who has every right to expect to get on in this world." Let him get on, and then "M. C.'s" mother, who requires fortune in her son-in-law, will no longer oppose the match.

KATE SOMERSET.—The habit you mention shows a pleasing degree of sensibility. None but the ignorant will impute your blushes to conscious guilt.

EMMELINE D.—The ladies of the East, whose present fashions are of immemorial date, wear the garment you speak of; consequently, it lays claim to great antiquity.

MERCATOR.—As the exercise of dancing (taken in moderation) is likely to improve your health, and strengthen the limb affected, we advise you to persevere in it.

G. B. J. D., INJURED HUSBAND.—A very important consideration in selecting a present for a lady is to procure for her some article she stands in need of. If your promised bride is well provided with improving books (which are unquestionably the most valued and most lasting of all presents), and is already in possession of a desk and a workbox, of course such things as these are out of the question. Situated as you are, you might offer her "something to wear;" and we think a shawl (suited to the present autumnal season) would form a judicious and acceptable present.—We advise our fair correspondent not to bestow another thought on one so vacillating and indifferent. If the course of true love always did run smooth, this life would be a state of enjoyment instead of a state of probation. You must bear this in mind, and not think that in the opposition of your cousin's father you have any extraordinary trial to encounter. Your duty is plain. You must endeavour to overcome evil with good, and not do evil that good may come. However, no duty can require that your cousin should bestow her hand on the man her father favours while her heart is yours.

SMILES AND TEARS, IN DEEP DISTRESS.—After an intimate acquaintance of three years a man should have made up his mind one way or the other. There is nothing so important in this life as to come to the point. In spite of all the good qualities you ascribe to the man you prefer, if he is deficient in resolution he can never become either good or great. When next you meet him, if he should not declare himself, we advise you to endeavour to banish him from your heart.—There are men who endeavour to gain the affections of young women with no other object than to gratify their own vanity. If this has been the case with the "frequent visitor" at your house, the sooner he marries some one else the better. The shock of hearing of his union will be less injurious to you than such continued suspense; and probably you will soon feel sufficiently indifferent to him to listen with satisfaction to proposals from another quarter. The hair sent by "Smiles and Tears" is decidedly light, and very pretty.

KITTY ROBSON.—Coffee should immediately follow the dessert. Etiquette does not render it necessary for a lady to thank a gentleman for escorting her from the drawing-room to the dining-room. You will find the wished-for poem in the works of William Cowper.

SIR B. F. M. and MARY ANN wish to know if there is any means of preventing the hair from growing on the forehead. There is not any remedy excepting time. This will inevitably prevent the hair from growing on the forehead. Young people who, in order to secure the appearance of a high forehead, shave off part of the hair, or endeavour to remove it by depilatories, never attain their object, but often injure the skin of the head, and make themselves look ridiculous. Where the hair grows low on the forehead, let it be brushed back, and, in most cases, the brow will appear sufficiently high to harmonise with the countenance.

IGNORANT INQUIRER.—By indulging in the superstitious practices you speak of, with a view to find out the trade of your future husband, you are likely to bewilder your senses, and fit yourself for nothing but a lunatic asylum. Thus you would lose the chance of having any husband at all.

R. M. A. (Brighton).—We can hardly give a satisfactory answer without knowing something more of your general capabilities. Send your name and address with full particulars; we might then perhaps help you.

SYNTAX.—The error in the following distich consists in the disagreement of the verb with the nominative case:

"And we near'd the land where in beauty smiles
The sunny shores of the Grecian isles."

Shores smile. It is very incorrect to say, "shores smiles." In correcting these lines it is rather difficult to preserve the sense, but they may thus be turned:—

"And we near'd the land where in beauty smile
The sunny shores of each Grecian isle."

ANNE H. and AMY ELLERSTLEY are both troubled with small black spots on their faces. These disfigurements often proceed from a tendency to biliousness, and then a little cooling medicine is advisable. From the account "Anne H." gives us of the state of her teeth, we think it will be necessary, in the first instance, that she should have them cleaned by a dentist. When this is done, we advise her to keep them clean, by brushing them every morning with prepared chalk. In applying the chalk, she should beware of using too hard a toothbrush. Hard brushes injure the enamel of the teeth.

CRIBBY.—Your suggestion shall meet with attention.
L. M.—When W. made over to Y. the business, to learn which you were apprenticed, you were, of course, included in the transfer. Y., therefore, is bound to instruct you in that business to the end of the term stated in your indentures; and you are not at liberty to claim your indentures till the expiration of that period.

LOTTY.—You can make neither rose-water nor lavender-water in the manner you propose; but if you wish to procure an essence from flowers proceed as follows:—Collect a quantity of the leaves of any flowers that have an agreeable fragrance; card thin layers of cotton, which dip into the finest sweet oil; sprinkle a small quantity of fine salt on the flowers, and lay first a layer of cotton, and then a layer of flowers, until an earthen vessel, or a wide-mouthed glass bottle is full. Tie the top well over with a bladder, then place the vessel in a southern aspect, so that it may have the heat of the sun; and in fifteen days, when uncovered, a fragrant oil may be squeezed away from the whole mass.

A NATURALIST.—Clean and polish your shells thus:—Wash them well in warm water, and then take spirits of salts one part and water eight parts, and give another cleaning. Then polish them with leather and a little tripoli. This applies only to those shells which have no natural polish.

HERBERT H. M.—Sunday was the day of the week on which August 30 fell, in 1840.

DUNCAN.—The Princess Victoria was the title borne by our gracious Queen before her accession to the throne.

A YOUNG PAINTER.—To be a good sign painter you ought to have a competent knowledge of the art, including designing and colouring, as you may be required, by turns, to paint a Queen's head, Windsor Castle, a lion, or a rose and crown.

A NEWS READER.—The word protocol is derived from the Latin protocolum, which Ainsworth thus explains:—"That which is first briefly noted, to be afterwards amended, and further enlarged; a rough draft." The term is usually said to be derived from protocolion, which means the first leaf of a book; but this derivation is erroneous.

M. D., Black Eagle, Karl, Maria B., Thomas, and some other correspondents, complain of having more hair, longer eyebrows, &c., than they wish; Excelsior, F. Wilson, Sir Walter Scott, Walter Lisle, R. G., Keziah, and others, though young in years, fear they shall soon become bald; Beardless Swaddy, Jack Manders, J. B., Alex, and other youths, are anxious to have their cheeks adorned with whiskers. R. G. J., Mary E., Charlie, M. Thomason, dislike the colour of their hair. Mark Raymond would rejoice if his eyelashes were longer. Margaret H. thinks herself "a perfect fright," because she is what is called "beetle-browed." We have given many receipts in previous columns bearing upon these cases, which we request our correspondents to consult.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XC.

Were his eyes open? Yes; and his mouth, too.
Suspense hath this effect, to make one dumb,
Yet leaves the gate, where eloquence steps through,
As wide as if a long speech were to come.—BYRON.

CARUS had been waiting several hours at the chambers of his confederate, eager to learn the result of his scheme of villainy. Never had time dragged on so heavily. Ruin and exposure stared him in the face, for, without money, he felt himself tied, bear-like, to the stake, but without courage to fight it out. At every step he heard upon the stairs, the conscience-stricken culprit started and hastened impatiently to the door. Each disappointment added to the bitterness of his feelings. Tardy-footed time gave him leisure to reflect, and reflection formed no slight part of his punishment.

"At last!" he exclaimed, as his agent made his appearance. "Have you succeeded?"

"Partially," was the reply.
"Explain yourself; anything is better than the torments of suspense; they eat into my very heart, and change my blood to gall."

"I have seen your wife."

"Well, well!"
"Hang it, man," said the captain, "allow me to tell my tale in my own way; this interruption only adds to the torture you complain of."

Carus compressed his lips with dogged resolution, and listened to what followed in sullen silence.

"The confidence of Mrs. Kearns," continued the speaker, "appears to be unabated in me. She still believes me to be her disinterested adviser and sincere friend; but let that pass. Like most women, when greatly agitated, I found her irresolute and vacillating—at one moment ready to resign everything rather than part with her son, the next resolved to defend her rights, and resist the separation by legal means."

"Did you urge that I only required the money for a time?" demanded his hearer.

"It would have been unwise, and destroyed the confidence she still reposes in me," was the reply of the keen-judging man of the world. "She has listened to that argument too frequently before. Not to keep you any longer in suspense," he added, "she finally decided upon one of two alternatives."

"Name them."
"The first was to make the transfer you demand."

CARUS AND THE CAPTAIN OUTWITTED BY MARTHA.

The dark eyes of Carus flashed triumphantly. "I have succeeded, then?" he exclaimed. "Not yet," observed the captain; "I told you one of two alternatives, for your wife will never consent, under any circumstances, to part with her boy."

"Go on."

"The other is to fly with me."

"Fly!" repeated the worthless husband, with such unfeigned astonishment that it provoked a smile from his dear friend; "I thought you had long since abandoned that project."

"She herself proposed it."

"Impossible! you are trifling with me."

"But not in the sense you mean. I am to escort her into Norfolk to the residence of her cousin, Edgar Marston, should she decide on placing herself and Horace under his protection."

"The traitress!" muttered Carus; "but it will answer my purpose—place her completely in my power, and justify my conduct to the world. Instead of conducting her towards her cousin's, you must take the route to Dover. Do you comprehend my plans?"

The captain nodded affirmatively.

"I will overtake you upon the road; as a matter of course, a violent altercation must ensue between us; to escape the brand of shame, for she is as proud of her good name as fond of the idiot who calls her mother, she will consent to any sacrifice."

"That certainly will be the surest way," observed Bland, without the slightest touch of remorse at the unmanly, contemptible part he was about to act.

"And how are we to learn her decision?" inquired the husband.

"Martha is to inform me of it," replied his confederate; "for I pretended that it would be unsafe to write."

At the name of the faithful servant, a shade of doubt and dissatisfaction passed over the countenance of Carus Kearn. He had much rather that it had been by any other messenger.

For some time longer the guilty man was left a prey to doubt. Nearly an hour elapsed before a ring was heard.

"There's Martha," whispered Bland; "you had better not be seen by her."

His visitor took the hint, and, catching up his hat, retired into the inner room; no sooner had he disappeared, than his friend admitted the messenger.

"Oh, captain!" exclaimed the woman, sinking rather than seating herself into a chair, "pray fasten the door; should my master chance to call."

"A most unlikely circumstance," observed the gentleman; "it is days since I have seen him. To speak candidly, there is a coolness between us. His conduct towards so excellent a wife, has materially shaken the friendship I once felt for him."

Martha drew down the corners of her mouth in order to repress a smile. The porter had informed her, in answer to her inquiries, that Mr. Kearn had been with the captain for the last two hours. She doubted not but he was still within hearing.

"It is a sad business," observed the hypocrite, with a sigh; "but some men throw away their happiness, and only repent the loss of it when too late."

"That is very true, sir; and my master is one of them. He is a bad man."

"I fear, it."

"I know it," continued the messenger. "I am sure I cannot imagine what would become of my poor mistress, but for your kindness and friendship. She has every reliance upon you."

Captain Bland tried to throw an expression of sympathy into his face; and, although burning with impatience to learn the result of his iniquitous scheme, he forbore to ask any questions, but waited till Martha should inform him of it.

"Well, sir," said the latter, "Mrs. Kearn has decided upon taking your advice and seeking the protection of her cousin; she has sent me for instructions."

"Is her mind fully made up?"

"Fully," answered his visitor; "and high time it was, with such a wretch for a husband. He has no more heart than a stone, his word is a lie, and he would rob his wife and child with as little pity or remorse as a fox would plunder a hen-roost."

The belief that Carus was still within hearing, and listening to every word she uttered, added to the bitterness with which the honest creature poured forth her invectives.

The captain could scarcely refrain from a smile.

"Then, he is such a sneak," she added. "If he had the courage of a man, or the heart of a father, he would never descend to threaten his wife with the loss of her child."

"It is, indeed, a heartless cruelty."

"Cruelty!" repeated Martha; "I should think it was a cruelty. My poor mistress is spirit-crushed. I had the greatest difficulty in the world to bring her to a decision. Had it been my case," she added, "it would not have cost me a minute's consideration to make up my mind."

"Doubtless not," mentally observed the gentleman.

"I wish I had been his wife, that's all!—he should never have broken my heart. But that is not to the point; my mistress will be ready to accompany you this evening. You must have a chaise at the end of the square."

"Certainly; at what hour?"

"Not later than ten, or before eight," replied the messenger; "her husband will be at his club."

"It shall be arranged as your mistress desires," said the captain, greatly delighted at the information.

"But that is not all."

"What next?"

"Master Horace will accompany her. Poor thing! she cannot part with him for an instant."

"It is not necessary that she should," observed the captain, with difficulty suppressing his satisfaction. "I can understand a mother's feelings, and respect them."

"I am sure you can, sir; I told my mistress so; but, to prevent all suspicion—for she is closely watched, every servant in the house, except myself, being a spy upon her—the poor dear boy will be disguised."

"In what way?"

"As a girl, sir."

"Cleverly arranged," exclaimed the hypocrite. "Ah, Martha, I can discern your presence of mind in this."

"I'll not say but you may, sir," answered the messenger, with an air of satisfaction. "Have you any reply to send back?"

"Only that I shall be at the place of rendezvous punctually," replied the confederate of Carus, "and that everything shall be arranged as she desires."

"Thank you, sir."

"Do you accompany us?"

"At first it was settled that I should," said Martha, "but my mistress thought better of it, and I remain in order to prevent suspicion, and answer her brute of a husband in the event of his return before you are too far upon the road to be overtaken."

"An excellent precaution," observed Bland; "with such an ally there is little doubt of success."

The woman took her leave, and Carus emerged from his concealment, his face flushed with the anticipation of triumphing over the wife he had so cruelly plundered and oppressed.

"Excellent!" he exclaimed. "The idiot will fall into her own snare; this will place her completely at my mercy. By heavens!" he continued, "the sight of her humiliation, when she finds her reputation blasted by her own imprudence, will afford me as much satisfaction as the surrender of her gold. She has frequently stung me by her quiet, calm contempt more bitterly than reproaches could have done."

"Nonsense," observed his friend; "it is money, and not revenge upon a helpless woman, who, after all, has never wronged you, that we require. By-the-bye," he added, "what is to be my share of the profits in the transaction?"

"Oh, we shall not quarrel about that."

"Of course not; but to avoid doing so, had we not better come to some understanding on the point at once?"

"What mean you?"

"You know the old adage."

"What adage?"

"That short reckonings make long friends," replied Captain Bland, carelessly lighting a cigar.

There was little in the words, but a great deal implied in the tone in which they were uttered, and Carus Kearn reflected for a few instants before he could govern his rage sufficiently to reply to them.

"I have no cash by me," he said.

"I know that, old fellow," answered his amiable confederate, "and I am prepared to advance the necessary funds for our joint speculation; but you must give me a memorandum."

"An I O U?"

"A peculiar one."

"As you please; draw it out yourself."

"Your wife must do that," was the reply.

"My wife!" repeated the ruffian.

"Yes, the transfer of the securities must be made in our joint names; you understand me?"

"Villain!" exclaimed Carus.

"Which do you mean?" answered the hitherto obsequious captain, coolly; "there are two of us. Do you imagine, Mr. Kearn, that I am such a fool as to risk my money and reputation on no better security than your word?—you forget how long I have known its exact value."

"You insult me!"

"No, I only reason with you. It is time we understood each other. You will find me more easy to deal with than you expect. Many men in my position would expect half the profits of the adventure now I will be satisfied with a fourth."

"Moderate, indeed! Just two thousand five hundred pounds!" ejaculated Carus, in an ironical tone.

"Calculated to a fraction," was the cool reply. "I give you ten minutes to decide."

Before the time had elapsed, Carus had yielded the point, and the iniquitous compact was concluded.

CHAPTER XCI.

"How is't, Laertes?
Why, as a woodcock in my own springs, Orazio."
SHAKESPEARE.

It was night, and the cold pitiless rain fell with that provoking steady perseverance which renders all chance of its leaving off hopeless, for some time to come. There were but few persons on foot, except the policeman on his weary beat, and the houseless, hungry, and wretched, who hurried along with a sort of restless, make-believe haste, as if they had a home, warm fire, and supper waiting their return.

Occasionally, these solitary pariahs would suddenly pause, cast a wistful eye towards the windows of some respectable-looking house, contemplate the light visible through the closely-drawn curtains, and then hurry on, envious, perhaps, of the comforts of those within, or sighing at the recollection of the time when they too sat in well-lit rooms and saw kind faces smiling round them.

We have often thought that the waking dreams of the night walkers of London would form an interesting volume—memories that have lost their sunshine, jostling against self-reproaches and regrets—always regrets,—it is the history of life, its story and its end.

At the corner of one of those squares, which, like the mediæval princes of Germany, hold an equivocal rank somewhere between fashion and respectability, a chaise and four had been waiting nearly a couple of hours, to the intense disgust of the postboys, two antiquated specimens of an all but extinct race. The rain came splashing down upon their faded jackets and leathern continuations in large, heavy drops, which had already nearly wetted them through, and they looked about as wretched and uncomfortable as the statue of George the Fourth, in his slippers and well-curled wig, at Charing-cross, and only a little less ridiculous.

In the vehicle sat Captain Bland, calm, watchful, as self-possessed as a spider in its web waiting for the prey, which he felt assured must eventually fall into its meshes.

"At last!" he muttered to himself, as a lady, elegantly dressed and deeply veiled, turned the corner of the square; "the boy is with her."

Any ordinary observer would have said the girl, for such, to all appearance, was the sex of the child who accompanied her.

As the fugitives reached the chaise, the gentleman opened the door, but without descending himself, and assisted them in.

"Be firm, my dear Mrs. Kearn," he whispered, "and all will go well."

A stifled sob was the only reply.

This did not surprise the cold, calculating man of the world. To him the agitation, distress, and terror of the persecuted wife appeared very natural; for however pure and correct her motives, the step she had taken was a dangerous one, and might compromise her reputation, especially if, by any unforeseen accident, her worthless husband should overtake her before reaching the residence of the relative to whom she was flying for protection.

The postboys, who had received their orders, started at a rapid pace, mentally calculating, no doubt, the amount of additional gratuity their employer had promised them.

Finding that his dupe did not feel disposed to enter into conversation, but replied either by monosyllables or stifled sighs to his remarks, Captain Bland threw himself back in the vehicle, and began indulging in a train of meditations, in which the past and future were blended.

We ought to begin by premising that he was one of those men who are imbued with a profound contempt for their fellow creatures; virtue he regarded as a myth—honesty merely a question of degree, holding with the poet,

"That the stern virtue which disdains a dukedom—
A sceptre shown, will bow and take the offer."

He had been born poor, and money was his idol—the only deity he ever worshipped.

No wonder, with such feelings and principles, that he had readily become the agent of Carus in his rash and ill-considered speculations—speculations, par parenthèse, by which he alone had profited, seeing that they had left his employer a beggar.

Although Captain Bland knew but little of the antecedents of the man with whom he had thus linked himself, he knew quite enough of the world to feel convinced that they were both dark and dangerous; he had seen him, on more than one occasion, have recourse to means of a most questionable character to maintain his credit in the commercial world; and he naturally began to consider whether it would not be prudent to dissolve the connection—especially as the affair he found himself at present engaged in, if brought to a successful issue, which he no longer doubted, would leave him independent; and, finally, he came to the conclusion that it would.

The question was how to accomplish it with safety to himself; for, like most men of his caste, he had a great respect for his own personal security.

Whilst these reflections were passing through his prolific brain, the chaise continued at a rapid pace to dash along the Dover-road. It was into Norfolk that he ought to have conducted his victims; and more than once the hypocrite congratulated himself on the profound sorrow and agitation which prevented Mrs. Kearn from observing the route they were going.

"She must be blind, indeed," he thought, as the vehicle rolled over Blackheath, "if she does not find it out now."

But the lady did not find it out. She still continued with her arms round the neck of her child, absorbed, to all appearance, in her meditations.

Still the rain continued to fall with a chilliness as pitiless as the heart of the man who, under the specious garb of friendship, was acting so treacherous a part.

At last the panting steeds drew up at the old post-house just beyond Shooter's-hill; the ostler's bell rang, and in the bustle and confusion which followed Mrs. Kearn did not hear the order of "four fresh horses for Dover."

The captain did, and wondered at her stupidity. "You had better alight," he whispered; "only for a few minutes. We are beyond the danger of pursuit now."

Apparently the lady thought so too, for she descended without the slightest objection, and, holding her son by the hand, followed him into a private sitting-room, where a cheerful fire was burning.

"One glass of wine," said her supposed protector; "it will strengthen you for the rest of the journey."

Without waiting for a reply he rang the bell twice.

It was answered—not by the waiter, but by Carus, who, accompanied by his lawyer—one of those needy, unprincipled rascals who are ever ready to lend the aid of their profession to any piece of rascality, provided they are well paid.

At the sight of her husband, Mrs. Kearn uttered a faint shriek, and, with a mother's instinct, clasped her boy to her bosom, as if that feeble shield could protect him.

There was something devilish in the sneer of triumph which appeared upon the flushed countenance of Carus as he contemplated the woman whose existence he had made wretched—whose firmness in clinging to the wreck of fortune for her child's sake had been proof against threats, entreaties, and persuasions.

"Villain!" he exclaimed, addressing his confederate in a tone of well-acted indignation; "is this your friendship?"

"Hear me," said the captain; "you are deceived."

"You are mistaken; I am no longer deceived," replied the former, continuing the character of an injured husband. "I have long suspected your attempts upon the honour of the abandoned woman who has forgot alike her duty as a mother and a wife."

A suppressed cry, which the lawyer thought sounded very like a chuckle, broke from the lady.

"Captain Bland had better retire," he observed; "his continued presence is an outrage, which would justify my deeply-injured client in proceeding to almost any extremity."

A glance of mutual intelligence was rapidly exchanged by the three confederates, for the speaker was perfectly aware of the excellent understanding which existed between Mr. Kearn and the supposed destroyer of his domestic happiness, who, taking the hint, shunk out of the room.

"This is the virtue whose patient suffering was a living reproof to me," observed Carus, with a bitter sneer, as he contemplated the apparently crushed and broken creature, whose convulsive agitation increased. "But I will not reproach you," he added; "guilt like yours is insensible to shame. By your conduct you have deprived yourself, madam, of all right to my consideration; and Horace must return to town with me. You can remain here, if you think proper."

To his great astonishment, the threat of separating his wife from his son failed to elicit any other reply than a repetition of the sobs, which the lawyer considered sounded exceedingly like a giggle.

Mr. Twig, the name of the practitioner, now thought it time to interfere and play his part.

"This is a painful circumstance—a very painful one; for although no actual guilt may have been committed, it places you, madam, in the eyes of the world, and what is of far more consequence, in those of the law, in an equivocal position, and must entitle my deeply injured client to a divorce, unless," he added, "some arrangement can be hit upon."

He paused for an instant, fully expecting that Mrs. Kearn herself would suggest an alternative, which even with his effrontery he hesitated to explain more explicitly.

"It is useless," exclaimed Carus, with an oath. "I appreciate your well-meant interference—but no, the time for mercy is past; infamy, shame, exposure, and disgrace, are the just punishment of a life of deception and hypocrisy."

"Be persuaded," said the lawyer, soothingly. "Madam," he continued, bowing to the lady, "this is one of those peculiar cases in which it is the duty of an honest man to act as a friend to both parties. Sign this paper, leave the rest to me, and I pledge myself that the scandal of a public trial shall be avoided."

Mrs. Kearn took the paper; as she did so, the feeling, respectable Mr. Twig thought her hand appeared exceedingly red for a lady's.

"Here is a pen," he added.

But instead of signing the deed, which, in fact, was nothing less than a power of attorney enabling her husband and Captain Bland to sell out the remaining portion of her fortune, Mrs. Kearn quietly placed it in the pocket of her dress.

"What mean you, woman?" demanded Mr. Kearn, rudely seizing her by the arm. "Give it back or sign it."

"I shall do neither," was the reply.

In the struggle which ensued, the thick black veil of the speaker was torn aside, and disclosed the plain, but honest face of Martha. So overwhelmed did the baffled villain feel by the discovery that he released his hold and staggered back into a chair.

"Defeated!" he muttered.

The lawyer, who had never seen Mrs. Kearn, was for an instant at a loss to comprehend the affair, but stood gazing, first at his respected client, and then at the supposed wife.

"What is the meaning of this sad levity?" he asked, as a hearty laugh from Martha fell upon his ear.

"It means, Mr. Lawyer," replied the honest creature, "that the villains who employed you are disappointed: that, instead of a runaway wife, they have only caught a runaway servant, whose signature is not worth a sixpence; and, even if it were," she added, "neither my master, with his bullying, nor you, with all your cunning, would be clever enough to get it."

Carus, who by this time had recovered something like self-possession, started to his feet, and vented his disappointment in a burst of abuse, which Martha listened to with the most provoking coolness.

"Where is your mistress?" he demanded, menacingly. "Answer me, or I will wring the answer from your treacherous heart."

The female rang the bell violently. It was answered by the innkeeper and several waiters.

"Landlord," she said, "if you would not have a murder committed in your house, you had better remain in the room. I do not feel that my life is safe with these men."

"Certainly," answered the host. "I would not have such an unpleasant occurrence in my house for all the world. Who is this lady, sir?" he added, addressing himself to Carus.

"Lady!" repeated the latter, impatiently; "my wife's waiting-maid."

On hearing this, the landlord at once comprehended the affair, and broke out into a hearty laugh. "Leave the room!" exclaimed the lawyer.

"After what has been stated, I shall do nothing of the kind," replied the hotel-keeper. "I consider myself responsible for this young woman's safety. I can permit no violence in my house; if you attempt it, I shall call for assistance."

By this time several of the female servants, who had heard that an elopement had taken place, and, with a pardonable curiosity, had been listening at the door, set up a loud cry, and, glad of an excuse for making their appearance, rushed into the room, followed by the waiter and the two post-boys.

Martha felt herself perfectly re-assured by their presence.

The lawyer whispered a few words in the ear of his client to recommend patience; adding that any further display of anger, under the circumstances, would simply appear ridiculous.

Carus gnashed his teeth with impotent rage, and again demanded of the woman what had become of her mistress.

"Well," answered the waiting-maid, "as there can be no harm in telling you, I may as well gratify your curiosity. By this time she is more than half way upon her journey into Norfolk, to place herself under the protection of her cousin, the Reverend Edgar Marston, and his wife. You thought yourself exceedingly cunning," she added, "when you directed the spies you had placed round her to wink at her departure. Your scheme was well planned, but mine has been better executed."

"She is gone, then?"

"Of course she is."

"And alone?"

"Alone!" replied Martha. "There are not two Captain Blands in the world."

The last-named personage now made his appearance, pale with rage and mortification. It would have been difficult to decide which he felt the most: the loss of his share in the intended plunder, or the disgrace, as he considered it, of being outwitted.

"Ah, there he is!" continued the speaker, with a satirical smile. "I am sure I ought to feel exceedingly obliged for the expense he has been at on my account, and the care he has taken of me. It is not often that a gentleman gives himself so much trouble for a poor servant."

A titter from all but the lawyer and the two confederates followed the observation.

"You must give up that paper," said the former, anxious to obtain possession of the unsigned procuration.

"I shall do nothing of the kind," replied the honest creature. "It may be useful to my dear mistress, and prove the conspiracy to rob her of all that remains of her once large fortune."

Carus would have forced it from her, but the landlord intervened, and declared that no violence could be permitted in his establishment; he already began to see clearly through the affair—the husband had played a most dishonest game and lost it.

"Your son," observed Captain Bland, "is undoubtedly under the guardianship of his father." His companion in crime took the hint, and declared his intention of carrying him back to town.

"Boy!" repeated the waiters and servants; "why, it is a girl."

"A disguised one," said the lawyer. "And I warn you of the consequences of opposing the lawful authority of his parent."

The youth—for it really was a boy—evinced no disposition to quit the side of Martha.

"We are both certain," observed the captain, "that this gentleman is his father, and will assist him to maintain his right to the possession of the person of his son."

"Let me see who will venture to dispute it," exclaimed Carus, savagely, at the same time placing his heavy grasp upon the shoulders of the youth, and attempting to drag him from the side of the woman, who, strange to say, did not appear in the slightest degree alarmed or uneasy at these threats.

To the astonishment of the unnatural father, the boy, who had always obeyed his slightest word with fear and trembling—so great was the terror he entertained of him—resisted the attempt to remove him from the side of Martha; and when Carus, stung to fury by the obstinacy of the idiot, as he termed him, gave vent to his passion in a blow, returned the compliment by a violent attack upon his shins.

Martha laughed heartily.

"You had better let my nephew alone, Mr. Kearn," she observed; "he is a very good lad when treated kindly."

"Your nephew!" faltered the ruffian, suddenly releasing his hold.

"My nephew!" repeated the woman. "How little do you know the heart of a mother to imagine for an instant that my mistress would leave her son to bear the brunt of your anger. No, no! Master Horace is with her. Take off your curls and bonnet," she added, "and let your master see your face."

The boy did as he was desired, when the baffled villain recognised at a glance the features of a lad who had long been employed in his own stables; and found himself thwarted every way.

The respectable Mr. Twig, seeing that the game was quite up with his client, sneaked out of the room. He had certain unpleasant misgivings as to the possible consequences of the part he had taken; many a lawyer having been struck off the rolls for a less questionable transaction.

Captain Bland and Carus followed him, and all three returned to town, sadder, but most certainly, not better, men than they quitted it. On the road, something like an attempt to hold a consultation upon the position of affairs was made. But it became so interrupted and broken by recriminations and mutual reproaches of stupidity, want of forethought and arrangement, that no conclusion could be arrived at till it was too late for action.

Meanwhile the deeply-injured wife, with her persecuted son, continued their journey, and arrived in safety at the rectory of their relative, who received them both with generous hospitality, and promised them protection. With a man like Edgar Marston this was not a vain word, for, naturally indignant at the cruelties his cousin had endured, he at once instructed his lawyer to take the necessary steps for dissolving her unhappy marriage, and wrote a long detailed statement of everything that had transpired to Mr. Bently.

The day after the arrival of Mrs. Kearn and her son, they were joined at the rectory by the faithful Martha, who brought the unsigned procuration with her. Although but little acquainted with law or its technicalities, something told her that it might ultimately prove of consequence to her mistress.

CHAPTER XCII.

All should unite to punish the ungrateful;
Ingratitude is treason to mankind.—THOMSON.

THREE days of restless anxiety had been passed by Carus in meeting the commercial engagements which he had rendered himself liable for, despite the deed of partnership which positively forbade him from trading on his own account.

By dint of exertion, backed by means he would at one time have hesitated to employ, not from principle, but prudence, he succeeded at last in satisfying the most pressing demands against him, and obtained a short breathing time. It was, however, only like a respite to a condemned criminal, not a pardon.

On the fourth morning, as he was about to start from his chambers, for he had given a bill of sale upon the furniture of his mansion, and no longer resided there, one of his under clerks placed a note in his hand. The blood mounted to the temples of the conscience-stricken man as he perused it.

It was from Peter Mangles, drily informing him that Mr. Bently had arrived in town, and requested his presence precisely at one o'clock at the office of the firm in the city; the postscript startled him still more, for it duly warned him not to fail, as he valued his personal safety.

"What," he repeatedly asked himself, "could the threat imply?"

It is one of the terrors of those who have pursued a career of guilt, never to know the exact point at which detection threatens them; like the spider, they have a hundred threads to their web of guilt, touch but one of them, and the whole fabric vibrates.

"What am I to expect?" he murmured, as the word "assassin!" recurred painfully to his recollection; "was his uncle really aware of the attempt he had made upon the life of our hero? or had he obtained the clue to a yet darker secret? Were the deaths of the old poison-vendor and his former confederate, Styles, to prove useless to him? Had proofs of his dealings been discovered, either before or since the old man's death?" What would he not have then given to have been able to answer these questions satisfactorily!

His first feeling was to disregard the summons, for like most cowards, he wished to postpone the evil hour; but the postscript, alluding to his personal safety, exercised a species of fascination stronger than his will, and at the appointed hour he started for the interview, which he foresaw was to decide his future destiny.

With a feeling very much akin to that of the conscience-condemned wretch, when taking his place at the bar of human justice, Carus Kearn approached the well-known offices of the firm in the City. The old porter, he imagined, frowned as he passed the door, and the clerks in the outward office regarded him superciliously.

The latter was by no means an improbable circumstance, for in his prosperous days, when the confidence of his wealthy relative was yet unabated in him, he had been as haughty and overbearing as he now felt crushed and humiliated.

"Has my uncle arrived?" he inquired.

The cashier silently pointed to the private office of his employer.

It was a great relief to the wretched man to find only Peter Mangles in the room. There was a strong, an exceedingly strong expression of indignation on the countenance of the old clerk as he regarded him.

"In an instant," he said; "wait till I have finished the addition of these figures; they are rather intricate; such calculations are not much in my way."

"What can he mean by calculations of any kind not being much in his way?" mentally asked Carus.

For nearly half an hour he sat in a state of nervous anxiety listening to the scratching of Peter's pen, which produced a most disagreeable impression upon him, causing his blood to run cold. The precise old man finished his task at last, and rang the office bell.

One of the junior clerks answered it.

"Take these papers to Mr. Bently," he said.

"So, my uncle is already here," thought the nephew, growing more and more uneasy at the proceedings.

"Shall I take them?" he asked, rising from his seat.

"Your uncle will not see you yet," replied Peter, drily; "he wishes to be informed exactly how things stand."

"And those papers?"

"Will inform him," was the answer. "I have gone over them twice, and I seldom make an error either in figures or any other kind of calculation, I am happy to say."

The word "happy" merely informed his hearer of a fact he had long suspected—that the speaker knew him.

"Is my uncle better?" he asked, with desperate courage, feeling that he must say something.

"In health, yes—in mind, no. He has been painfully tried."

"Not by business," observed the junior partner, approaching the desk as if with the intention of assisting in the arrangement of his papers.

"Not so near, Mr. Carus!" exclaimed Peter Mangles.

"You forget who I am!"

"No, I do not: you are Mr. Bently's nephew, and were a junior partner in the firm."

"Was!" repeated the former; "I am."

"Ah! yes, true—the deed is not signed yet."

"What deed?"

The sound of Mr. Bently's bell prevented the necessity of the old clerk's making any reply to the question.

"Your uncle will inform you," he said, at the same time pointing to the door of the private office.

With a desperate effort to maintain something like self-possession, the guilty nephew passed through, and stood in the presence of the man he had so deeply injured.

He found, as he expected, his relative much changed. The events of the last few weeks had told fearfully upon him; but, although his face was pale, and the eyes deeply sunk in their sockets, there was a rigid firmness in the muscles, and cold, stony glance of the eye, which indicated strong resolution.

He advanced towards the table, and would have offered his hand, but a look arrested him, and he took the seat to which the merchant silently pointed.

"Carus," he began, after a pause, "I have sent for you, not to listen to any explanation of your conduct, or reproach you with ingratitude. The first, it is impossible for you to offer without additional falsehood; and to the latter I am well aware you have long been insensible—for the man who has so successfully succeeded in stifling the voice of his own conscience, will never be touched by that of his benefactor."

"I do not understand you, sir," replied his nephew.

"I scarcely expected that you would," observed Mr. Bently, mournfully, "for to understand my words would imply that you felt them. I will at once proceed to the purpose for which I sent for you. You have broken the conditions of the deed of partnership which gave you a nominal share in the firm, consequently it is dissolved."

Carus bit his lips to repress the rising passion.

"The proofs are these bills which you have accepted and dishonoured. For the credit of my name," added the merchant, "I have taken them up."

At this intelligence the eyes of the reckless speculator flashed with sudden joy.

"All?" he asked.

"All but two."

At this reply, the satisfaction of the culprit vanished as rapidly as it had appeared.

"To which," continued his uncle, "the signature of the firm has been forged. Do you know the consequences of that word forged!—infamy, a prison, a public trial, and an ignominious sentence."

"You will never, sir," exclaimed the detected villain, after a few moments' reflection, during which he recovered something like confidence, "cover yourself with disgrace by the exposure?"

"Would the disgrace," observed the merchant, "be greater in having a nephew a convicted felon, than a son-in-law a reputed one? for my part, I see but little difference."

"You allude to George Markham," exclaimed Carus, bitterly; "recollect, sir, that I was not his accuser."

"I do recollect it," said the old man, in a tone of self-reproach; "and to that one circumstance you owe the chance—the only one of escaping from the consequences of your crime. The foul slander must be retracted, and his innocence made clear."

"Made clear," repeated his nephew. "By whom?"

"By you."

"You ask more than it is in my power to perform," replied the former; "how can I explain the transaction which has injured his reputation?"

"Simply by acknowledging yourself to be the real thief," replied Mr. Bently, in a calm, passionless tone; "that, even to the most sceptical, must be proof enough."

"What!" exclaimed Carus Kearn, with well-acted indignation; "in order to avoid the consequence of an act of madness—for I was mad, when, driven by my necessities, I wrote the signature of the firm—acknowledge myself guilty of an act I never contemplated! Never, never! Is this your justice, sir, to the son of your dead sister?"

The last appeal was artfully thrown in. The speaker, on more than one occasion, had moved his uncle to relent by alluding to the tie of blood between them; this time, however, the merchant remembered that he had other ties still more sacred, which had hitherto been neglected.

"Perhaps," he said, "you will explain this bill drawn upon you by my former clerk, Sandford, for five hundred pounds; also the nature of the transactions between you which authorised him for so many years to draw for the same amount. You ask for justice," added the merchant; "rest assured that you shall have it. Step by step I am prepared to vindicate my conduct towards you to the world; vindicate by laying bare, if necessary, the long system of hypocrisy and villainy you have pursued,—even," he added, "to your crowning act of crime!"

There was a terrible meaning in the last words, which caused Carus Kearn to reflect. He knew the inflexible resolution of his uncle when once roused; and late events had somewhat lowered the high opinion he had entertained of his own fertility in expedients.

"Think on your position well," exclaimed his relative. "I need not remind you that you are a ruined man—ruined in reputation as well as in fortune; abandoned by your long-suffering wife and your son, whose wrongs have been made known to me. A little infamy more or less," he added, in a tone of bitter irony, "is nothing in addition to such a burthen."

"You say truly, sir. I am a beggar!" groaned Carus; "and, if I thought you would yet stretch out a hand to—"

"I make no conditions," interrupted his uncle.

"Be it so, sir. I am in your hands, and will act as you desire."

Having uttered these humiliating words, the speaker threw himself into a seat with a sullen air, to await the result of his submission. It was not the first of his calculations that had failed; but, in the present instance, the consequences were overwhelming. Ruin, inevitable ruin, stared him in the face, and the crisis found him helpless, without one resource to fall back upon. Like the crushed serpent, Carus could only writhe in impotent fury. True, the venom of his nature still remained, but he lacked the strength to sting; and, like many other clever schemers, he felt himself disarmed by the uncertainty of how much or how little his outraged uncle and benefactor knew of his past crimes.

The death of Tom Styles and the old poison-vendor no longer seemed to guarantee his safety.

On a signal from Mr. Bently, Peter Mangles entered the room, followed by Mr. Morton, the legal adviser of the firm; George Markham; his friend, the Bank of England director, who had communicated the cause of his account being rejected; and his partner, Mr. Thornton.

At the sight of the man whom he had so perseveringly laboured to destroy, the lips of Carus Kearn became bloodless.

"Not yet," said the merchant, as his son-in-law extended his hand to him; "wait till I have done you justice, laid bare the front of hypocrisy, exposed its hideous deformity, that the world may see and shun it; then, but not till then, shall I feel I have in some degree atoned for my past unjust suspicions."

Tears stood in the eyes of Peter as he regarded his employer; never had he felt so proud of and so satisfied with what he considered his straightforward, business-like conduct.

"You will be kind enough to read over the papers you have prepared," added the speaker, addressing the lawyer.

The first was a deed dissolving the partnership which had hitherto existed between the uncle and nephew.

"Sign it," said the former.

Carus hesitated.

"Sign it," repeated Mr. Bently, sternly. "I neither warn nor threaten again."

The humiliation was more than even the broken spirit of the detected forger could endure; and a passionate refusal, accompanied by half-muttered oaths, broke from his quivering lips. Finding the latter of no avail, he descended even to entreaties; but they fell on ears as deaf as his own had ever been to the voice of honour and humanity.

The only reply Mr. Bently condescended to make was a request to Peter Mangles to call in the officers.

"Certainly!" exclaimed the old clerk, advancing with alacrity towards the door. "Any further hesitation would be weakness, not mercy."

"Stay!" gasped Carus, looking wildly round him. "I consent."

"Remember," observed Mr. Morton, "it is your voluntary, deliberate act and deed."

The wretched criminal hastily dashed off his signature at the bottom of the parchment.

One of the senior clerks, who had been summoned into the room for the express purpose, and Peter Mangles witnessed it; the former with indifference—to him it was a mere formal matter of duty—the latter with intense satisfaction: it seemed to remove a weight from his heart; the firm for whose prosperity he had laboured so long and faithfully, whose success was, in a great measure, the work of his life, whose reputation he felt more jealous of than his own, was purified at last by the expulsion of the dishonest partner.

The old man could show his face proudly upon 'Change again, without the fear of any sneering questions touching the whereabouts of Mr. Kearns.

"I presume I may now depart?" said the crest-fallen nephew.

"Not yet," replied his uncle; "there is something more to sign."

Carus repeated the words impatiently.

The merchant handed to the lawyer the confession of the dying Sandford (it had reached him through the house of Curry and Sons). Mr. Morton read it deliberately, word for word. As he proceeded, cold drops of perspiration started on the brow of the wretched Carus. The history of his villainy thus laid bare, recalled for an instant the long absent blush of shame upon his cheek. Whilst, on the contrary, a flush of honest pride suffused the countenance of George Markham, whose character was vindicated beyond the shadow of a doubt; he could walk the world erect again, nor fear to be confronted by the past.

Thornton, who fully comprehended the feelings of his partner, congratulated him by a silent pressure of the hand.

"I knew it all along," observed Peter Mangles, striking his knuckles energetically upon the table; "that is to say, I divined it as I should have done a bad debt or an approaching bankruptcy. Never knew the boy whose petty cash-book would not balance turn out an honest man yet."

"What is it I have to sign?" demanded the detected hypocrite, unable longer to endure the glances of contempt and aversion which encountered his gaze on every side.

The lawyer commenced reading a detailed confession of his crime, but had not proceeded far before Carus interrupted him.

"I acknowledge all—everything!" he exclaimed, in a hoarse, broken voice; "let me sign it at once, before I am driven mad, quite mad."

"Pooh, pooh!" replied Peter; "you must hear it. Such a procedure would not be business-like."

Despite the old clerk's objection—which arose more from a love of regularity than a desire to triumph over a fallen man—the merchant nodded to Mr. Morton to permit his nephew to have his own way; possibly he felt tired of the degrading scene.

Carus rapidly signed the confession, and the record of his infamy was complete.

"George Markham," said Mr. Bently, "having atoned for the injustice I formerly did you, I can now accept your proffered hand."

His son-in-law grasped it cordially, and the reconciliation became perfect.

"I knew he would," muttered Peter, who seemed suddenly to have caught a violent cold in his eyes, for he used his handkerchief frequently. "I always said that his heart was right as his ledger, and I can answer for that. Mr. Kearns," he added, turning to the delinquent, "this cannot be a very pleasant sight for you—at least I should think not; though even that may be a matter of taste. If you will walk this way I have a little commission to execute."

Carus regarded him doubtfully.

"Go," said his relative, "repent if you can, and become an honest man; my word is passed for your safety."

With a look of mingled fury and despair, the unworthy nephew passed from the room into the office of Mr. Mangles, who, having by this time recovered his composure, seated himself at his desk with a business-like, magisterial air, coughed drily once or twice, the preliminary to commencing a discourse, which as usual ran rather parenthetically.

"Although your uncle has removed your name from the firm," he said, "as a man of business I don't see how he could have done otherwise, and entirely discarded you from his affection, which you never were worthy of, he feels that as an honest man, he would not be acting rightly were he to let you loose upon society—I should say decidedly not—without some slight assistance, which, no doubt, will bespent in riot and debauchery, or wasted in some ridiculous speculation. But that is your affair, not his; he has commissioned me to give you a thousand pounds."

"He is very generous," muttered Carus, in a tone of bitterness, at the same time dashing the tears of mingled rage and mortification from his blood-shot eyes.

"There is little doubt of that," replied Peter, sharply. "Not that I believe you either feel or think so. It's no use your trying to look penitent; you can't humbug me. I've never been in Egypt, Mr. Kearns, or saw a crocodile in all my life—unless, by-the-bye, it was a stuffed one in the Museum. Yes," he added, "now I recollect, I certainly did see one; but I have heard of their weeping, and know the value of their tears."

"Give me the cash!" exclaimed the late partner in the firm, stung almost to madness by what he considered the old man's insolence, "and let me depart."

"Certainly, certainly. I was about to advise—"

"The money!" repeated Carus, "the money!"

Mr. Mangles slowly and methodically wrote a cheque for the amount, and handed it over the desk to him.

"And now the bills."

"What bills?"

"The—the—you know the ones I mean."

"The forged ones," said Peter. "Can't part with them, Mr. Kearns. It would be a most unbusiness-like proceeding. The firm has paid them; they now form part of our receipts—though what account I am to place them to, goodness only knows. The bad debts," he added, musingly; "yes, I think they had better go to the bad debt account."

"I must have them."

"Indeed!"

"I will have them!"

"Ah!"

"Where are they?"

"Deposited under seal with your uncle's private papers at the bank," answered the old clerk. "If you think you can obtain them personally, I have not the slightest objection to your making the attempt. I have merely one observation to make—There is no second set of keys to their safe. And I wish there had never been to ours," he added. "The firm of Bently and Son—for it will be Bently and Son—would have been ten thousand pounds the richer."

Carus could endure no more; with a bitter scowl he quitted the counting-house, looking neither to the right or left, as he passed through the offices, for fear of encountering the supercilious smiles of the clerks.

His first visit was to the bankers' to cash the cheque. The money in his possession, he began to recover something of his former confidence.

"I am defeated," he muttered to himself, "but not subdued. The fools forget that with time the serpent's fangs will grow again; the enterprise which has failed the sixth may succeed the seventh time."

As Peter Mangles would have said, could he have heard him—a most unbusiness-like calculation.

Hopes and Helps for the Young.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.—HANDWRITING.

A good handwriting is one of the most valuable accomplishments a youth can possess, and we see no reason why every youth with the use of his hands should not write well. It is a mechanical operation that requires no peculiar ability, and which depends on careful attention and persevering application. Care and practice will change our black, rough pot-hooks into an elegant specimen of penmanship. As so much depends on our ability in this respect, with regard to our business success; as so many excellent situations have been lost by a bad hand-writing, and so many procured by a clear calligraphy; as fortunes are thus made or marred by that which all may acquire if they have the will to do so—it is a startling fact that good writers should be so few, and bad writers so many.

No doubt this arises, to a great extent, from defective school education. Sufficient attention is not paid to this subject. The stiff formality acquired in schools is either retained through life, or sinks into an almost illegible scrawl. But as we are addressing these remarks to self-educators, to those who have resolved on their own instruction, it is unnecessary to dwell at any length on this common defect in our scholastic system. To those who are resolved on helping themselves, or uniting in their own persons both pupil and teachers, we suggest the necessity for improvement in this respect. Try to write well. Never hesitate, on account of the trouble or the time; the result will amply reward your toil. How to begin is the question. The first step is of the utmost importance. By what means is it possible to acquire a good, fluent, rapid handwriting? To this our answer is, System and Practice.

In early numbers of this journal (see Vol. I., pp. 21, 181) we directed our young readers to the consideration of the subject of handwriting. We furnished some practical instructions as to the position of the body and the mode of holding the pen. We also called attention to a series of Model Copy Books, the first of which had just been issued, and which promised to be a valuable aid to self-instruction.* The series is now complete, and fully answers our expectations. The plan is excellent and thoroughly practicable, as the directions which are given are plain and easy, and the copies at once simple and graceful.

There are two important characteristics in all good writers: they write well and quickly. There is a wide distinction between these qualifications. There are those who can write well when they have time; but who fail in writing rapidly enough to meet the demands of business. There are those, again, who write rapidly, but who never write well. It is possible to unite these qualifications, and to make of the able and expert penman a good ready writer.

This, however, is seldom attained by the old system. The copying and re-copying of models is evidently a failure. This has suggested to some teachers the idea of placing before the pupil ovals of an enlarged size, and other forms to be traced over, with the view of imparting freedom to the hand and arm. This is an obvious improvement on the old plan; but it does not lead to the acquisition of a good habitual style. The models given in the above-named copy-books offer a decided advantage over this improved plan. They are neither the old-fashioned copies, nor the new-fashioned unmeaning forms; but they join the utility of the first with the freedom of the second. They consist of the elementary principles of which the alphabetic characters are composed. All the forms which we can by any possibility be called upon to write, we are taught to make easily and plainly—not by mere arbitrary copying, but by becoming gradually familiarised, in the act of repeated tracings, with the various lines and curves of which they consist. The idea of tracing over the model copies, instead of imitating them, has been tested and fully sustained by extensive experience. The object is not to fill so many sheets of paper with unsightly lines, but to give freedom to the hand in the production of alphabetic forms—it is to produce an effect on the hand rather than on the paper. By this means, any variation from the model is apparent at once. All writing is executed by the movements, more or less combined, of the hand and arm across the page, and of the fingers up and down to form the letters. In the old English round hand these two movements were in a great degree separated by the parallelism of the up and down strokes. This rendered rapid writing impossible. The sharp angular writing of the present day depends more on the movement of the NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XX.

REFLECTION OF LIGHT.

517. How are surrounding objects made visible to us by day?—Light falls upon them from the sun and sky, and is reflected to our eyes.

518. Is this light reflected in any particular direction?—It is reflected in all directions; it radiates from every point of the surface, as if that point were shining with its own light.

519.—Suppose a ray of light falls upon the polished surface of a mirror, in what direction is it reflected?—It glances off, just as an India-rubber ball does when thrown against a wall.

520. How is this described?—By the lines of incidence and reflection. The course taken by the ray of light towards the mirror is the line of incidence; the course taken by those rays in rebounding from the mirror is the line of reflection. In this diagram, if the line of incidence be A B, the line of reflection is B C.

Fig. 36.

521. If the light falls perpendicularly on the surface of the mirror, in what direction does it leave it?—It returns in the same line, as a ball bounds back when thrown directly against a wall.

522. How is it that in looking into a common mirror or looking-glass, we see the images of objects that are in front of the mirror?—An object always appears to be in the direction in which the rays from it enter the eye, and the rays from the object which, after reflection, enter the eye, come from the mirror.

523. Where does the reflection take place in the case of the common looking-glass?—Chiefly at the smooth surface of the quicksilver that is spread over the back part of the glass.

524. Does not the front surface of the glass reflect light also?—It does; in the evening the windows in our houses become so many mirrors, in which the objects within the room are reflected.

525. Why is this reflection not perceptible by day?—Because the impression of the reflected light on the eye is effaced by that of the strong light that comes from without.

Fig. 37.

526. What does Fig. 37 represent?—The reflection, from a Concave Mirror, of a beam of rays, supposed to come from a point of the sun's disc.

527. What is the course of the reflected rays?—They all converge to the focus, F.

528. What is such a collection of rays converging to a focus called?—A pencil of Converging Rays.

529. Suppose a white screen of paper or cloth were placed there to receive them, what would be seen at F?—A bright point. This point can be seen also without a screen, by placing the eye in the position shown in the figure.

530. Suppose light were to fall on the concave mirror from all points of the sun's disc, what would be seen at F?—A small, bright circle, which would be an image of the sun.

531. Explain Fig. 38.—The concave mirror, M, forms in the air, at I, an inverted image of the arrow,

A. The course of the rays proceeding from a single point of the arrow, before and after reflection, is shown in the figure.

Fig. 38.

532. If the object were at I, near the mirror, where would its image be?—At A, and it would be larger than the object.

533. Is the image of an object that is in front of a concave mirror ever seen behind the mirror, as in a common looking-glass?—It has that position when the object is quite near the mirror, and it appears to be much larger than the object.

534. Of what material are concave mirrors usually made?—Of a metallic alloy of tin and copper, called Speculum Metal, that admits of a high polish, and does not tarnish readily. They are sometimes made of copper, steel, or silver, or of glass quicksilver on the back.

535. When formed of speculum metal, what are they ordinarily called?—Specula.

536. Concave reflectors are used with great effect in lighthouses; in what manner are they set up?—A number of mirrors are fastened on the outside of an iron circular rim, and a lamp is placed in the focus of each mirror.

REFRACTION OF LIGHT.

537. What occurs when a ray of light passes from the air into a denser medium, as air or water?—It is bent, or refracted, so as to pursue a direction more nearly perpendicular to the surface.

538. How is this effect represented to the eye?—By a ray of light entering and passing through a thick piece of glass.

539. Is it refracted again in passing out of the glass into the air?—It is, but in the opposite direction, as the figure shows.

540. Does it recover its original direction on leaving the glass?—It does, if the thickness of the glass is everywhere the same, as in the case of common window glass.

541. What is the reason that, in looking through a pane of window glass, we sometimes see objects displaced from their true position?—Because the outer and inner surfaces of the glass, in such instances, are not even and truly parallel.

542. What is the result?—The object appears to be in the direction in which the light enters the eye, and is thus displaced towards the right.

543. What illusion is produced by the refraction of light in passing from water into air?—It causes objects immersed in water to appear to be higher than they really are.

544. How is this seen?—A stick partially immersed in water appears, from this cause, to be bent or broken at the surface.

545. Every one knows that a shallow stream never appears to be as deep as it really is—what is the reason?—The bottom is elevated by refraction.

The Matron.

NO. XXXVIII.

I HAVE recently been treating of economy in dress, but I must beg my readers not to go to the opposite extreme and allow too little for clothing. Money is very well spent in procuring a sufficiency of warm covering for winter. In our climate, one may as well be short of food as insufficiently clad. And one must beware of trusting too much to the lingering warmth of the autumnal sun. It is far better that a genial bright day should find us in warm attire than that snow and frost should surprise us in flimsy summer garments.

I can fancy I hear some of my young readers consulting me about their intended purchases. "What kind of bonnet is best for winter?" In reply I must own that, now that beaver bonnets are quite out of date, it is difficult to name any material particularly well suited for a winter bonnet. Velvets and dark satins are very pretty, but I do not recommend them; not only because they are expensive in the first instance, but because there is not much wear in them. Horsehair makes a bonnet that lasts for years, and a good straw dyed black or brown has a very pretty and even stylish effect, if trimmed with dark ribbons, and a full blond cap inside, according to the prevalent fashion. Neither horsehair nor straw are materially injured by rain.

For cloaks, shawls, and dresses, let the colour be dark, and to secure durability, the material should be woollen. Daughters should consult their mothers in the choice of new things, in order that her experience may direct them in the purchase of durable materials. But one little hint may not be amiss here; viz., that the shepherd's plaid is one of the most lasting things that can be procured, and that either in a dress or as a scarf shawl it looks very well, and can be worn with any colour.

Cloaks and shawls, being little affected by fashion, do the wearer credit longer than jackets or polkas. In fact, a shawl can hardly ever be out of fashion, and in this respect it is always a judicious purchase.

When selecting an umbrella, I advise my readers to choose a brown rather than a green one. Green is not a fast colour, and when wetted through in pelting rain, a green umbrella may stain a shawl or bonnet from the blue drops that fall from it.

It is curious how tastes vary in what relates to umbrellas. Abroad I have seen red umbrellas. Red is a very fast colour; and I can assure you in an old fashioned continental town the effect of the red umbrellas is very picturesque; and the substantial petticoats worn by the good people who carry these umbrellas, show they are prepared for cold. I have travelled a good deal, and I can tell my readers, that in no country have I heard such lamentations about cold as in England, yet I have been in severe climates. I am quite convinced that the female part of our population do not make sufficient preparation for winter.

It is lamentable to reflect on the sums young girls lavish on disfiguring finery—on finery that soon becomes mere trumpery, even in their own eyes. In the meantime, when their money is spent, winter comes on them unawares.

If my readers ever listened to the opinions of scientific men on the subject of change of temperature, they would consider the sudden exposure of the skin to cold, as a much more serious thing than they do now. Cold shuts up all the perspiring pores at once, and empties its supply-pipes of their streaming blood inwards, flowing into the several internal parts, and choking up and overloading their channels.

Cold bathing, taken at a proper season, has none of these injurious effects, because the immersion is, of course, but short, and friction afterwards applied produces reaction, but exposure to cold from being too thinly clad is a fruitful source of illness.

Inflammation and disorders of various natures are produced in this way. What are commonly known as colds are internal obstructions. Cold in the head is an affection in which the lining of the nostrils is overcharged with stagnating blood. Sore throat is caused by a similar condition in the lining of the throat. And cough by the same state in the lining of the vessels and cavities of the chest.

I trust I have said enough to induce my readers not to expose themselves to colds during the approaching winter by neglecting winter clothing. But warm dresses and wrappers will be of little avail, if the feet are neglected. We very seldom regret the money we spend with the shoemaker.

Wet feet should be avoided by all who value life and health; but I am well aware that in families where the income is small and the children numerous, it is very difficult to keep them all well shod. In meeting the difficulty, the following hint may be useful: However worn and full of holes the soles of shoes may be, if the upper leathers are whole or well mended, the soles may be covered with gutta percha; and, at a very small expense, the shoes rendered nearly as good as new. I shall give directions for fixing the gutta percha soles, for the benefit of those who are unacquainted with the method.

Let the sole of the boot or shoe be quite clean and dry; then scratch it with an awl or fork until it becomes rough; warm it before the fire, and spread over it, with a hot knife, some of the "solution," an article sold for the purpose. When you have covered over the sole two or three times, heat the gutta percha sole, and the sole of the boot or shoe, at the same time, until both are sticky. Then place the gutta percha sole on the boot or shoe, and press it down with care. Mind you begin at the toe, so as to press out the air and make it adhere closely. Then pare off the edges with a sharp knife. Do not throw away the parings or old pieces. If you collect any considerable quantity the manufacturer can make it up again for sale.

But if you use gutta percha, this caution is quite necessary. Beware of bringing it in contact with fire. Gutta percha is very inflammable, and you must see that your children (when they have on shoes with gutta percha soles) never hold them up to the fire. Heat would soften the soles, and contact with the fire set them in a blaze.

LIVING CELEBRITIES.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SIR JOHN INGLIS, K.C.B. FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SIR JOHN INGLIS,
K.C.B.

THE defence of Lucknow is one of the most remarkable events in the Indian mutiny. Beleaguered in the Residency of the town by an immense multitude of the rebels, a few dauntless Britons, with their wives and daughters, endured, with a fortitude almost unexampled in history, the horrors of a protracted siege. They were short of provisions, and short of ammunition, and there seemed to be no prospect of relief arriving in time to save them from the ravenous wild beasts howling at their gates. Nana Sahib, the Lord of Bithoor, was in command of the rebels. It was by his inhuman order that the women and babes had been butchered at Cawnpore. At his hands they could expect no mercy, except the mercy of being blown into the air by the explosion of those mines which his men were so busily preparing.

It is scarcely possible to conceive any position more terrible than that of the beleaguered little force at Lucknow, before the arrival of the gallant Havelock. The sterling qualities of the British character were called forth. Seldom have those qualities been so strikingly exhibited. There was no wavering, no diversity of counsel. The band of heroes stood firmly by each other; and, as their prospect of delivery grew less, they determined to die rather than surrender. The patient endurance of the women, and the valuable assistance rendered by them in time of extreme peril, are indelible proofs of the heroism of our countrywomen. They shared every privation without a murmur; they faced death with the courage of the hero and the tranquillity of the martyr; they cheered the men with their presence, and set an example of energy and fortitude in the hour of peril and privation.

Command, in the terrible position in which the garrison was placed in Lucknow, involved great responsibility, and called for an extraordinary amount of ability and courage. This duty devolved on the gallant officer whose portrait we present, and who, by the discharge of that duty, nobly earned the honours which have been bestowed upon him. He held possession of Lucknow under the most difficult and trying circumstances—starvation within, and a murderous enemy without. It was a defence without precedent in modern warfare.

But Inglis was a tried soldier and equal to any emergency. He had joined the 32nd regiment in 1833, and, entering as an ensign, had worked his way to the colonelcy. In 1837 he was engaged in the war in Canada; he figured also in the operations in the Punjab; he was present at the storming of Mooltan, and the battle of Goojerat. He was, therefore, no stranger to Indian warfare. But his name will ever be connected with the defence of Lucknow, whatever the lustre of his former achievements, it is eclipsed by the glories of that defence. While all honour is done to the memory of Havelock, while befitting rewards are bestowed on Campbell, Inglis deserves especial honour. Havelock fought his way through an apparently overwhelming force, and brought relief to Lucknow; weeks afterwards Sir Colin Campbell accomplished the same feat; but it was Inglis who defended Lucknow till help came, and who maintained an undaunted front when the last rations were almost spent, and destruction seemed inevitable.

Sir John Inglis is united in marriage to a daughter of Lord Chelmsford, who, with her husband and her two children, shared all the dangers and privations of the siege of Lucknow.

LUCKNOW.

A VERY important, and at the same time a very eccentric place is the old city of Lucknow. The siege, with all its attendant horrors, has changed the aspect of the city; and in the incidents of that siege our interest is chiefly centred. But it is well to know something of what Lucknow was before it became so fearfully associated with the affairs of the Indian rebellion, before there was any manifestation of sepoy treachery, and while the kingdom of Oude—of which Lucknow is the capital—was an independent state.

It is difficult to define the limits of Lucknow. The city begins so gradually; the country so unobtrusively grows into the town, that it is hard to tell where the one begins and the other ends. A group of minarets, a cluster of domes, seem to intimate to the traveller that Lucknow has begun, but he soon ascertains that what he supposed to be the city is only the suburb; and when at length he arrives at the city, he may, perhaps, be doubtful whether that also is not an extensive suburb. When viewed from the top of a lofty building, the city presents a confusion of gilded cupolas, minarets, pinnacles, turrets, and arches, interspersed with rich tropical foliage, and bounded by the river Goomty. Under this aspect, Lucknow seems to realise the most fantastic vision of oriental splendour. But a nearer inspection destroys the illusion. It is a city full of anomalies. The customs of the eastern and the western worlds are strangely blended; and the odd mixture produces an absurd effect. All the traditional magnificence of India is displayed in juxtaposition with articles from London, Paris, or New York.

THE PALACE OF SHUJA UD DOWLAH, LUCKNOW.

Lucknow is divided into three parts. The first is the city properly so called. This contains the shops and private houses of the inhabitants connected with the Court and Residency. The streets are narrow, the houses mean, and the bazaars anything but attractive.

The second part is far more European. It is of recent construction, and consists of one very handsome street, about a mile in length, having a lofty gate at either extremity, a market-place in the centre, and handsome bazaars striking out at right angles.

The third part is separated by a wretched bazaar from the second, and consists of palaces and religious houses in purely oriental style. This is by far the most interesting division of the town to a stranger. The most striking features, as in all other Eastern cities, are the royal tombs and mosques. Of these the Imaum-barah, or mausoleum of Asophad Dowlah, is the chief. It is described by Lord Valentia as the most beautiful building he had seen in India. The approach to the edifice is through a very large quadrangle to a garden, on one side of which is a mosque, and on the other the palace. The Imaum-barah is built on an elevated terrace, and consists of three long and finely-proportioned apartments, running parallel to each other. In the middle is the tomb, level with the ground. The central room is a hundred and sixty-seven feet in length, and fifty-two in breadth, with an octagon room at either end; and beyond the central room are several open arches, with fountains and basins of water under each arch.

There are many other palaces, and mosques, and pagodas scattered over this quarter of the city, among which the palatial residence of the Nabob Shuja ud Dowlah takes precedence. A representation of this building is given in the accompanying illustration. It was this Shuja ud Dowlah who treacherously added the flourishing districts of Rohilcund to his dominions; and who, after the battle of Buxor, removed his court from Lucknow to Fyzabad. On his death, in 1775, his successor again constituted this city the capital of Oude.

Two bridges have been thrown over the Goomty at Lucknow. One is merely a bridge of boats, the other of stone. An iron bridge was projected, but never completed.

Lucknow has seen strange changes, but recent events have produced the greatest change of all. English soldiers have penetrated into its secret places, have discovered its immense treasures and the almost fabulous magnificence of its palaces. But its Oriental glory has come to an end. The proud capital of Oude has lost its ancient prestige, and, together with the vast empire of which it formed a part, has been brought under the immediate authority of the British crown—the government of Queen Victoria.

FAULT FINDING.

WHAT are another's faults to me?
I've not a vulture's bill,
To peck at every flaw I see,
And make it wider still.
It is enough for me to know
I've follies of my own;
And on my heart my care bestow,
And let my friends alone.

SOMETHING TO DO.

CHAPTER XCI.

I seed a king at Bartlemy fair,
More like a king nor that chap there.—OLD SONG.
What joy at the ball, what delight have I found,
By all the gay beauties encompassed around;
In short, there is something in very fine women,
When they meet all together, that's quite overcoming.
ANSTET'S "BATH GUIDE."

LORD and Lady Glenlonely, accompanied by the Countess of Arncliffe (our Ada), and attended by Hope Evermore, Miss Fitz-Darrell, and Captain Greville, on horseback, called at the castle as soon as they were certain the Marquis of Doun had arrived there. He was out shooting with a party of gentlemen, and his sister, Lady Stella de Hauteville, was also from home.

The very next day the visit was returned. Hope was reading in the trellised porch, literally draped as it was with clematis, monthly roses, and honeysuckle, when a modest-looking pair on ponies, and unattended, stopped at the gate; at the sound of horses' hoofs she looked up from her book, and supposing that some quiet neighbours had thought fit to call, she rose, opened the gate, and stood smiling in the sun, while the marquis fastened his own pony and Lady Stella's to the paling.

"Are Lord and Lady Glenlonely at home?" asked the marquis, gazing with surprise and delight (for he was a great connoisseur in female beauty) on the modest Psyche-like face and form of Hope Evermore. "Yes," said Hope; "Lord Glenlonely is reading to my lady."

"Will they be at home to us?" asked Lady Stella. "Oh, yes; they are never denied at Burnside. All odious London fashions are laid aside here!" she said, smiling.

"Will you announce us, young lady?" said the marquise.

"With pleasure," said Hope. "What name shall I say?"

"Lady Stella De Hauteville and Lord Doun," said the marquise, offering two cards.

Hope started and blushed.

She had heard so much of the grandeur of the marquise, the exclusiveness, the fashion, the pride of Lady Stella, that she could scarcely believe these people, dressed so simply—the marquise all in shepherd's plaid, and his sister in a straw hat, white jean jacket, and riding-skirt of dark green merino—could be the people to whose rank and style even Lady Glenlonely looked up with reverence.

However, Hope, after the first "orient blush of quick surprise," was too well bred to be awkward, and had too much dignity and self-respect to be ashamed in the presence of mere earthly rank and grandeur. Astonishment was her principal feeling; for she, though she had seen little of people of fashion, had generally found the few she had seen rather stilted in manner and elaborate in dress. Perhaps the new peeress, Lady Glenlonely, was not intimate with the best of our nobility.

The best are singularly simple in their dress and habits, and very unassuming and amiable in their manners.

"I will let Lord and Lady Glenlonely know that you are here," said Hope, with a graceful bend and another blush, and not at all sorry to escape.

She had no sooner informed Lord and Lady Glenlonely of their arrival, than they both rose and hurried out to greet their old friends.

Hope meanwhile hastened to the bower, where Ada sat dictating a Ragged School appeal to Captain Greville, while Agnes Fitz-Darrell was (to please the young Countess, and to look amiable in the eyes of Captain Greville) working very diligently at some frocks for the children of the Green Fields Ragged School.

"I suppose we must all go in and welcome them to Burnside," said Lady Arncliffe. "It's a very great pity, just as we were getting on so well—but they are old friends, and it will not do to sacrifice one duty to another."

So saying she rose, closed her desk, and in her simple dress of chintz muslin, calmly walked to the French window of the room in which the visitors were, and welcomed them with as quiet a grace as if they had been the clergyman and his sister from the Manse.

Lady Stella de Hauteville was not more thoroughbred, more unaffected, or more simply elegant than our Ada, Lady Arncliffe.

How differently Agnes Fitz-Darrell felt, thought, and acted. She was in a fever, a tumult! A real live marquise, and his superb sister! and she herself in a pink gingham morning dress!

"We are not fit to be seen, Hope!" she said. "You in that plain white, that black apron and garden hat, and I in this gingham! We must change our dresses."

"I shall not do so," said Hope, "for they have already seen me. But unless I am sent for, I shall not go in again."

"Well, in case I am sent for I shall make myself fit to be seen," said Agnes Fitz-Darrell, hurrying into the house the back way, and standing perplexed before her choice assortment of elegant morning dresses.

Captain Greville did not rise, and Hope said—"Do not you want to know these very great people?"

"I would rather have a little quiet talk with you," he replied; and just as he spoke the French doors of the morning-room opened, and out came the whole party, led on by Lord Glenlonely, who said he must insist on showing his visitors all the beauties of Burnside.

"The greatest we saw on our arrival," said the marquise, bowing playfully to Hope, who blushed deeply (she always did so at any compliment to her person).

The marquise took up Hope's guitar and played a march and a Spanish retraite, imitating every other instrument to perfection. He then struck a few chords by way of accompaniment, and sang with a rich, well-cultivated voice, the touching French air of "La Folle."

"I hope," he said, "I may sometimes form one of the happy party assembled here?"

"I shall not spare him," said Lady Stella, "unless in return you all promise to come to the Castle as often as you can, and when I say all, I include this young lady and any guests you may have staying with you. We have a ball in honour of Doun's return this day week; I hope you will all honour it with your presence. And now we must hasten away, for we have a quantity of preparations to make, and orders to give. After the ball, we meditate some soirées, devoted to private theatricals, concerts, and other amusements, and we shall depend on Burnside to help and to encourage us."

They then took their leave, having charmed every one; and just as they cantered off, Miss Fitz-Darrell came down, her hair elaborately dressed, and in a light silk, flounced to a waist like a wasp's, every possible Frenchification carried into effect, and all in vain. By the time she had given to her toilet, she had lost her chance of being seen, and had to await the ball a week hence.

CHAPTER XXII.

Auspicious Hope! in thy sweet garden grow
Wreaths for each toll, a balm for every woe.

CAMPBELL.

THE presence at the castle of its lord, the marquise, his lady sister (who, while he remained single, acted as its mistress), and of all the gay company assembled to enjoy themselves, and kill grouse and time at once, made a great difference in the life and habits of our party at Burnside. Every day (between that of the first visit and the ball) came either invitations, presents of fruit, game, and flowers, or what was more welcome still, the marquise himself!

Lord Glenlonely liked the society of an elegant-minded, travelled man, fond of field sports, and who, though generally considered rather haughty and inaccessible, was, for some reason or other, known only to himself, the very reverse of this at Burnside.

The Marquis of Doun was a very elegant, young-looking man of about thirty-eight.

At twenty-five he had left the London world of fashion, thoroughly disgusted with the husband-hunting of which he, as the great catch-match of the day, was constantly the object, with mothers and daughters.

At that time he had no wish to marry; and he easily persuaded his sister, Lady Stella, who was very proud of him and devotedly attached to him, to settle with him alternately in all the most delightful cities of Italy.

Here he had many flirtations, but no real attachment, for he was exacting and fastidious; he required great personal beauty, elegance, amiability, a noble and generous nature, a highly-cultivated mind, and, above all, a heart that had never loved before.

Among the English beauties abroad, he found many who at first seemed to be all he required; but who, on a more intimate acquaintance, when weighed in the balance, were found wanting.

Time crept on, and one day it struck Doun that he was on the confines of forty and had no heir!

"I must marry," he said, to Lady Stella; "and I shall never find a wife to my mind abroad. Let us go back to Doun, and fill the castle with all the charming women and girls we can muster. I must and will marry before I am forty!"

"Oh! you, Doun, will never find your beau idéal," laughingly said Lady Stella, who in her inmost heart did not like the idea of resigning her honourable post, but yet could not bear to think that if Doun had no heir, the marquise would become extinct, and the earldom go to a detested cousin. "You will never meet in one woman all the scattered excellencies of the female world; and till you do, and that paragon adores you, you will be a bachelor."

"No, Stella," he would reply, "I am less, far less, exacting than of yore! A London husband-hunter I still detest and despise; and were she beautiful as the Queen of Love, wise as Minerva, and accomplished as all the Muses put together, I would not wed any girl who is in, what is so coarsely called, 'the matrimonial market.' But I do not despair; what is not found in the highways often meets us in the by-ways of life, and as I require no fortune, and should now be content with moderate attractions and a mere gentleman's birth, breeding, and education, I think I may find all I seek. I only insist upon a candid, generous nature, and a heart capable of love. Wisely, my Stella! did the poets of old make the Queen of Love and Beauty one and the same person; and as for me, much as I worship loveliness, I would rather have love without beauty than beauty without love! But I am resolved to marry before I am a year older. I hear that sordid cousin of ours, Macallum, is reckoning on my dying without an heir; and has already planned cutting down the avenue of lime-trees. I'll steal a march on him yet, Stella! he has taken heavy odds against my ever marrying!"

It was while the Marquis of Doun was in this mood of mind, that he saw, for the first time in his life, when he called at Burnside, in Hope Evermore all he had ever dreamed of or coveted, in his most fastidious and exacting days!

He did not know who or what she was. He never thought of asking. He saw her treated at Burnside as a daughter of the house; and it never occurred to him to imagine that she was a hireling or a dependent of any kind.

Lady Glenlonely, her head full of old romances, saw with pleasure, in the constant attentions of the marquise, what she believed to be symptoms of his being smitten with one of the girls; but she did not appear to know which, for she considered Agnes Fitz-Darrell very attractive to gentlemen, and the marquise took care so to divide his attentions that no one could detect a preference.

Agnes Fitz-Darrell began to feel her heart flutter with joy and ambition; but Hope Evermore never for a moment connected his lordship's constant visits and devotion to Burnside with herself.

Agnes, so elegant, so exquisitely dressed, so very agreeable, too, and with so much to say and to do to amuse, the marquise might admire her. But in the presence of a choice exotic, who notices the wild flower?

Who? Why, any man of taste and sentiment; and the Marquis of Doun was that man.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A violet by a mossy stone,
Half hidden from the eye,
Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.—WORDSWORTH.

THE Marquis of Doun was in his thirty-ninth year, and desperately in love, for the first time in his luxurious and sybaritic life.

In love with little Hope Evermore, just seventeen! Hope Evermore, born in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital, reared by the charity of poor Bob and Apple Blossom, and educated, during the first ten years of her life, in the Green Fields Ragged School! thence taken by Lady Arncliffe to be fitted to be a companion to herself and her mother, Lady Glenlonely; readily taking the finest polish, as all gems of the first water do; and now, at the time when she so unconsciously captivated the great catch-match of the day—the idol of mothers and daughters, the bachelor-marquis—as elegant, accomplished, and refined in mind and manners as if she had been born a Lady Hope, but with a candour, a simplicity, a self-dependence, and a strong principle of action, the result of her early training in the Green Fields Ragged School, and which rendered her as useful and as good as she was graceful and endearing.

Early privation, too, had taught her to feel for others; and there was a depth of thought and sentiment beyond her years in her large and ever-upturned eyes of celestial blue.

A clever French writer says that love is like the small-pox, inasmuch as, the later you take the infection, the more dangerous and incurable is the disease.

Lady Stella wished her brother to marry, and yet she wished it not. She could not bear the idea of the marquise becoming extinct, and of the earldom going to the hated Macallum; but she did not like to resign her post as her brother's friend and adviser, and the mistress of his elegant and princely homes in London and in the country.

With a woman's quick instinct in such matters, she soon discovered that he was in love, and readily guessed with whom. Nor did she object; she had no doubt that Hope was a lady, and as she saw innocence and goodness in every line of her sweet face, and liked her much better than any other young lady her brother had ever distinguished, she, with a sigh, owned to herself that Hope would do.

The marquise had already come to this conclusion, and it was the fault of their caste, not of themselves, if it never occurred to them for a moment as possible that Hope should not accept, with gratitude and delight, the brilliant destiny that would await her as Marchioness of Doun.

From day to day Lord Doun, with a certain timidity which is, in all ranks, inseparable from true love, postponed the conversation he was resolved to have with Lady Glenlonely relative to her most interesting and lovely young friend; but he was quite resolved to enter on the subject after the ball, as of course he could not take an irrevocable step, and offer his hand and title, without some knowledge of the parentage and antecedents of his enchanting Hope.

Such was his resolve, when the evening appointed for the ball arrived; and, though all the fashion and beauty of the county were assembled at Castle Doun, and the house was filled with London belles, and all Paris could do to set them off had been done—yet Hope Evermore, at her first ball, in a white tarlatan dress of many skirts, looped up with wild roses, and a wreath of the same, in her rich golden hair, was, beyond all comparison, the belle of the room. Lady Arnelife had had her taught to dance—less for the sake of an accomplishment which she never expected her to find much occasion for, than on account of the ease and grace which a thorough knowledge of dancing imparts to the carriage.

Light as a sylph, and agile as a fawn, Hope Evermore was an exquisite dancer; and this fact was very soon discovered at the castle ball. Agnes Fitz-Darrell was a first-rate artificial dancer, but Hope was all nature. She was in immense request, and as Lady Arnelife declined to dance at all, the marquis opened the ball with her Hope.

This made her the object of the envy of all the women, and of the admiration of all the men, who generally followed where Doun, an acknowledged connoisseur in such matters, led.

The marquis himself was surprised at the thousand new charms and graces revealed by her evening dress. If he had thought her lovely before, he considered her exquisite now, and his attentions were on this occasion pointed and marked.

Agnes Fitz-Darrell, whose dress had cost as many pounds as Hope's had shillings, was pale with envy and sick with disappointment. Captain Greville forsook her to form one of a bevy of young men who followed Hope everywhere.

By dint of great perseverance Captain Greville got one dance with Hope, and after it was over, he led her out into the conservatory. It was softly illuminated, and was fragrant with exquisite exotics. They were alone.

"What a delightful thing a ball is!" said Hope, her fair cheek flushed, her eyes beaming with excitement and pleasure.

"I never found a ball anything but a bore before," said Greville. "It is the presence of Hope that gives all the charm to Reality."

"Have you a hope, then, so decided and so potent?" asked the young girl, thinking that Agnes Fitz-Darrell had probably accepted his hand.

"Mine is a potent Hope," he said, "and, I trust, a decided one."

"I am so glad," said our heroine, smiling with sweetest sympathy; "I always thought she loved you, and would accept you, and I have wondered you never proposed before; but of course, true love is very timid, and though Agnes Fitz-Darrell is, I am certain, much attached to you, the dignity and reserve of her character and manner has perhaps checked the confession, her affection must at last have welcomed."

"What do you mean—what can you mean?" said Captain Greville, turning very pale, and an angry flash contending with the loving expression of his dark eyes.

"Mean!" said Hope; "that you have proposed to Agnes, and that she has accepted you."

"You cannot mean it, you do not mean it," said Greville, seizing her wrist. "You must know that I love you, Hope, you only, and for ever. Why do you turn pale? why shrink away? You are no coquette, Hope; you are frank, honest, true, modest, I know, and with a sweet humility beauty can seldom boast; but you are not blind—you cannot suppose that pale, false, designing doll, could be caught but a foil to your fresh and enchanting loveliness of form, face, and expression. Speak! you must have known that I loved you, and you only."

"I never for one moment imagined such a thing," said Hope, very pale, clasping her hands, and tears in her eyes; "I believed you loved Miss Fitz-Darrell."

"And now that you know that I idolise, that I adore you?"

"Now it is my duty, and a very painful one, too, to tell you, generous man, who would have raised to your own level the poor companion, that I have no heart to give you in return, that my affections are bestowed on one I have loved from my infancy, that my faith is pledged, my hand pledged, and that friendship and esteem are all I can bestow on you, or any other man."

"Keep the cold and odious counterfeits for those who can value such lukewarm sentiments!" said Greville, beside himself with rage, jealousy, and disappointment, as, hastily opening the conservatory door that led on to the lawn, he rushed past Hope and darted into the shrubbery.

Hope stood for some time rapt in painful thought. She would have followed him, for pity dictated that she should do so, but the thought that Larky would not approve of her following any man, even on such an errand of mercy, kept her where she was, leaning against a pillar, pale and cold as marble, and large tears trembling in her up-turned eyes.

"Oh, I have found you at last, lovely truant!" said the marquis, starting up behind her. "This is my Varsoviana. I have sought you everywhere, and I am come to claim you; but what is the matter?" he added, anxiously, as she turned slowly round: "are you not well?"

"No, not very well," replied Hope, sinking into a seat he drew towards her.

He fixed his eyes upon her. Her colour came and went. She trembled.

Man is naturally vain. The marquis had been spoilt by women—he was their idol.

"She loves me!" he thought. "Poor child, she is no well-trained coquette of fashion, she cannot disguise her sweet emotions. And I; why should I delay a proposal I have resolved to make?"

"Hope," he said, very gently; "Miss Evermore, I think you will not be surprised to hear me say I love you, and that all my hopes are centred in the enchanting prospect of your becoming my wife!"

"Oh, no! no! no!" almost shrieked poor Hope; "not you, too! pray, pray, do not ask me—do not love me!"

"Why not, sweet Hope?"

"Oh! you, my lord, should love some rich, great, noble lady, very beautiful, and stately, and accomplished, and —"

"But if I cannot love such an one, if I can only love you, if I have never loved but you, never can love another, never did, never will?"

"O, my lord," said Hope, "do not say so; it is too dreadful, too distressing."

"Why so, sweetest Hope?" and he would have taken her hand.

"Because," she replied, "there is one far away—one whom I love, and have long loved. And I, too, never did, and never can, and never will love another!"

The marquis was silent for a few moments. He was very pale, and trembled a little—then suddenly he said, in a low, mournful tone, "This is a great surprise, a great shock, and a great disappointment, Miss Evermore; but I honour you for your candour, and revere you for your generous and disinterested constancy; and if I can in any way, by my wealth, power, or influence, promote the advancement of one who must be worthy, since he is so dear to you, you may command my best services. Let us be friends," he said, with a sweet, sad smile; "and if I cannot make you my partner for life, I have a right to you for one more dance. So come, let me lead you back to the ball-room."

How little many a malicious dowager and envious damsel, who accused poor Hope of trying to captivate the marquis, suspected that she had refused a hand that would have conferred upon her the ancient title, coronet, and estates of Doun.

And when Captain Greville re-appeared no more that evening, how little Agnes, or any one else, guessed the cause.

And Hope was not of a nature to boast of her offers. To her they had been a source of deep pain.

Then, too, she had promised Larky Grigg to let him know whenever any other man professed affection for her.

What if the revelation made Larky uneasy, jealous, unhappy? and even if it did, she had promised, and she must keep her word.

To all the other guests, the ball ended as brilliantly as it had begun. It was kept up with spirit till five in the morning.

The supper-tables groaned with every delicacy in and out of season; and the gold plate and the Sevres china made the feast look regal in its magnificence.

While our party were driving home through a soft autumnal morning, and while a dewy haze veiled the mountains and the hollows, and the many-coloured leaves dropped noiselessly around them, Captain Greville, who had been invited to sleep at the castle, after pacing up and down his room by the hour, had at last opened his desk, and seizing a pen, ink, and paper, had written these words:—

"It is all vain; the game is up. The girl loves another; she has refused me. However, she is in every way too rich a prize to be lightly resigned. The report of Eaglescliffe's death is confirmed, but the news has not yet reached Burnside; it will almost kill the old countess."

"What an unlucky dog I am! The idea of her being engaged already—to whom? some low fellow, it must be; and yet, in spite of her folly and bad taste, I love her to distraction. I must and will make her my wife. Your first plan must be carried out now. Come to England as soon as you can. Go to these low Blossoms—those people that had the charge of her before Lady Gleclonely (then Lady Pemberton) adopted her—armed with the marriage certificate of her mother, Constance Morris, with Gaspar Evermore. Claim her; a parent's right over the person of a minor is indisputable—indeefeasible. They must resign her to you, and she is too dutiful to disobey her father."

"When she is living with you in the dreary seclusion of Darkside House, and when you have told her as her father that you will never sanction any engagement she has formed unknown to you, I will appear on the scene. In the character of a friend, a peacemaker, I hope to win her consent; but, failing that, we must force on a marriage, and she, as a sensible girl, will make the best of it."

"Ever, dear uncle, your affectionate nephew,
"RASHLEIGH GREVILLE."
"Gaspar Evermore, Esq."

CHAPTER XCIV.

Heaven first sent letters for some wretch's aid,
Some weeping lover, or some captive maid.—POPE.

To listen to the tale her lips shall tell,
In the full confidence he loves so well.

BRIDE OF SIENA.

WHILE Larky Grigg was devoting all the powers of his active mind, and all the energies of his hale, young body, to that great system of SELF-EDUCATION, which has made so many of our working men the shining lights of the age; and while he was showing, by his perseverance, his self-denial, and untiring industry, how truly and how deeply he loved her, for whom he toiled so unremittingly, so uncomplainingly, Hope (as we know) was, in her own way, proving a love as entire, and a devotion as constant and as exclusive.

For Larky's sake, she has refused, without one sigh of regret, or one instant of demur, the hand that would have placed the ancient coronet of Doun on her fair young brow, and which would thus have made her the envy of all the loveliest and loftiest ladies in the land.

For Larky's sake, too, she had felt rather depressed than elated at the avowal of Rashleigh Greville's passion,—that confession, which would have been such rapture to Agnes Fitz-Darrell, was pain and disappointment to her. She knew, or, rather (in spite of the cold and haughty reserve of Miss Fitz-Darrell's disposition) she suspected, that Rashleigh Greville was very dear to that strange being of few affections and no sympathies, and Hope felt it to be a sort of pity that the love so coveted by another, should be wasted on her.

She was afraid of the fierce anguish, and jealous disappointment, which she felt certain Agnes would feel when she found that one who had appeared to distinguish and admire her, and who was so generally looked upon as her suitor, had preferred Hope's simple, natural graces to all her accomplishments; had loved Hope's Scotch, Irish, and English ballads better than her Italian cantatas and bravuras; had admired Hope's white muslin dress and straw hat more than all the modish elegance of her tiny bonnets (all pearls and feathers, and blonde and flowers), or the fashionable amplitude, and Parisian circumference of her gay, glossy silks of bright colours, and many flounces, in which she looked like the incarnation of some mincing, doll-like belle, in Le Follet des Dames.

In spite of the exquisite simplicity of her own nature, and her sweet unworldliness, Hope had great quickness of perception, and a keen insight into character, and she knew that the conquest so valueless to her would have realised all the fondest hopes of Agnes Fitz-Darrell's small, narrow, but passionate and unhappy heart.

Agnes Darrell—or, as her fine lady governess had advised her to call herself, Fitz-Darrell—was aware that, when she and her brother came of age, they were, with her uncle's fortune, to take his name (id est, Stone), but Nessy so dreaded the remarks that this change might challenge, and the revelations it might call forth, that all her hope was that she might marry before she came into her share of her uncle's property, and that all recollection of her miserable story, her mother's doom, and her father's crime would be lost sight of under the shelter of the aristocratic name of Greville.

"She will know too soon that he does not love her," said Hope to herself, "but she need never know that he so loved me. As for the marquis, his offer, which, if it wounded her heart less, would, perhaps, excite her envy more, she will never know of that. The marquis will surely never mention a circumstance so painful and so mortifying to himself, as the rejection of an offer so generous, so noble, so condescending, and so munificent, by a poor companion, born in a hospital, and whose infancy was passed in a ragged school.

"There is only one person in the world to whom I am bound by a promise which I must in honour keep, however painful it may be to me to do so, to reveal the grand offers made to one so humble, and that one is my own dearly-loved, affianced Larky Grigg. Him I must acquaint with circumstances, which I know will make him think that he is injuring me and my prospects by making me look upon him as my future husband.

"Dear Larky! he overrates the delights of that sort of life which he has only seen from that 'distance' which 'lends enchantment to the view.' He will think, when he hears that I might have been a marchioness (lady of Castle Doun, and many other palace-homes)—that I might have glittered in grand parties, in the Doun diamonds—have lolled in blazoned carriages, and ordered about powdered footmen in gay liveries and silk stockings—in short, have had wealth at will, and every wish gratified,—he will think that I fancy I have made a great sacrifice. He has never seen the marquis who was to confer all this; and who, in return, must have been my lord, my master, my love, my husband! Not that he is repulsive or unkind. He is elegant and most amiable; but what is he by the side of my brave, kind, fond Larky? The person, of course, is nothing, but as the tenement of the mind, the heart, the soul; but yet it is the only palpable, tangible thing we have to love; and it is on the dear face of him we love best that we read the aspirations of his soul, the thoughts of his mind, the feelings of his heart.

"Larky would not think that I fancy I am making a sacrifice if he could see himself and Lord Doun, side by side, as I see them, with my mind's eye. There they stand, Larky more than a head taller than his lordship; Larky in his clean holland blouse—Lord Doun newly equipped by his London tailor, in all the newest fashions. Now, to begin with their heads. How thin, and weak, and pale, is the light brown hair, that cannot quite conceal that my lord is growing bald! and see how closely cluster Larky's glossy black locks, over and round his fine head! The marquis's brow is not a bad brow, but, though high, it is rather narrow, and retreats a little while Larky's, though the hair grows somewhat low, is massive and projecting—a brow of thought and power—a brow where virtue, will, and genius sit, as on a throne.

"And then their eyes! Lord Doun's are of a pale blue, and are kind and rather heavy; but Larky's are all love and soul, all softness and fire, dark and light at once. The marquis has a kind smile, but it does not cheer the spirit or warm the heart. Larky's smile is sunshine, it makes one glow. No, no, as I think of Larky and Lord Doun, I feel that were the latter a monarch, instead of a marquis, could he confer a crown instead of a coronet, and make me a queen instead of a peeress, yet to resign the first and only love of my heart, my own dear, true, fond, good, clever, trusting Larky, and live an everyday life in a castle with Lord Doun, would be a sacrifice too frightful to contemplate. I would rather, ten thousand times, live with Larky in two little rooms in town, or a hut in the country, and work hard for him from morning till night, than be empress of the universe with any other man for my husband, my guide, my lover, my companion, my friend.

"As for Captain Greville, I like him even less than Lord Doun. I cannot but feel, though I scarce know why, that there is something sinister in his character and mysterious in his history. But Larky thinks it so fine a thing to be a gentleman and a captain. He will not believe that I do not regret even him. However, I must do at once what I have promised to do; the longer I delay it, the more difficult it will be, and so at once I shall confess the whole to Larky Grigg."

BARCELONA.—III.

THE picturesque attire of the people of Barcelona has a wonderful attraction for the visitor. There is the charm of novelty, and an air of romance about it which gratify the eye and excite the imagination. How different are the common folk from ordinary people of other towns, with their brown jackets and red caps, and light blue sashes, or embroidered vests: they look like so many coloured illustrations from Gil Blas or Don Quixote. Here and there you meet a brave Spanish gentleman, if he really be such, swaggering in the public way in all the fulness of Catalonian pride. That man should be well known at the entertainments of Barcelona. Foremost he sits in the front circle at the bull-fight; familiar is he with the matadors or the picadors, who take his money and defer to his judgment; and great is he also—in his own estimation, at all events—with the beauties of Barcelona.

Barcelona beauties! why that very expression is enough to set a combustible heart in a blaze. Those dark eyes, those luxuriant locks, those graceful forms, those fascinating draperies—if a man falls not in love with such, what must his heart be made of? They have a battery of charms, see them where you may, the most formidable that can be imagined. Notice those fans. They are the principal instruments of Spanish coquetry. In the hands of a southern senora they are as wonder-working instruments as a rod in the hand of a wizard, as the sceptre in the hand of a king. It signifies everything, or it signifies nothing, just as it is used. All depends on the way in which it is flitted. And there are a thousand ways: but only a simpleton can fail to understand their meaning.

But better than any words of ours is the artist's sketch. Here we have a Catalonian group reproduced with exceeding accuracy. But what pencil can depict, what words describe, the true beauty of that scene—the colours, the motion, the white houses, the blue sky, and the sunshine, like sunshine in no other part of Europe?

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. VIII.

"WHEN we were talking of barnacles the other day, Wilton," said I, "an indistinct recollection arose in my mind of some curious story in reference to them: if there be one, I should be obliged by your removing this haziness of memory."

"Cheerfully," replied Wilton. "In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Gerard, the herbalist, told the one to which you most probably refer. He states that there is a small island in Lancashire, called the Pile of Fouldirs; and, with memorable minuteness, that it is on the west side of the entrance to Morecombe bay, and about fifteen miles from Ulverston, thus preparing us to suppose that he is precision itself. He then goes on to say that there are some broken pieces of 'old and bruised ships,' and also the trunks, bodies, and branches of old and rotten trees, whereon is found a certain spume or froth, which, in time, hardens into certain shells, like those of the mussel, but sharper pointed and of a whitish colour; and that they contain a thing in form like a lace of silk, finely woven as it were together. One end of this, he asserts, is fastened to the inside of the shell, like oysters and mussels, while the other end is attached to a rude mass which gradually attains the shape of a bird. On its perfect formation the shell gapes, and the first thing that he describes as appearing is this silken lace; then come the legs of the bird; and as it increases in size, it opens the shell by degrees, till at length the entire bird emerges, hanging only by the bill. In a short space after it comes to full maturity, and falls into the sea, where it gathers feathers, and grows to a fowl larger than a duck, and smaller than a goose, 'which the people in Lancashire,' he says, 'call by no other name than a tree goose; which place aforesaid, and all those parts adjoining, do so much abound therewith, that one of the best is bought for threepence.'

"Accept my thanks," said I; "that is the tale. How strange is it that the old botanist should begin it with so much care, and then plunge into so great a fallacy! He must have been no ordinary man in his day. Lord Burleigh was a lover of plants, and had the best collection of any nobleman in the kingdom, and of this Gerard had the superintendence. His London residence was in Holborn, where he had a large physic-garden of his own, which was probably the first of its kind in England, for the number and variety of its productions. Was the idea of a barnacle being changed into a goose entertained by any one else?"

"Oh, yes! by many. The notion has lasted for ages, and still prevails among the uneducated on the shores of all the European seas. One reason for the continuance of the error in several Roman Catholic countries is, the permission granted by the priest to eat the barnacle goose on fish-days, from its being considered to partake more of the character of a fish than a fowl. Even in the 'Transactions of the Royal Society' there is a paper from Sir Robert Moray, in which he says the pedicle, or stem of the barnacle, seems to draw and convey the matter which serves for the growth and vegetation of the shell and the little bird within it. He affirms that in every shell he opened he found a perfect sea-fowl: the little bill like that of a goose; the eyes marked; the head, breast, wings, tail, and feet formed; the feathers everywhere perfectly shaped, and blackish coloured; and the feet like those of other water-fowl, to his best remembrance. 'Nor did I,' he adds, 'ever see any of the little birds alive, nor meet with anybody that did; only some credible persons have assured me that they have seen some as big as their fist.'

"Gerard describes himself as more fortunate. He declares that he found near Dover a shell with similar contents to those he had previously described from report, but slightly differing from them. On breaking several, he says, he observed in some living

That men whose natural eyes were out
May by some powerful art be brought
To see with th' empty holes as plain
As if their eyes were in again;
And if they failed to see with those,
To make an optic of a nose."

"Bishop Pontoppidan, the author of the 'History of Norway,' remarked Wilton, "speaks of a shell, smaller than a mussel shell, which contains a little creature supposed to be a wild goose. He says, almost its whole substance represents some little, crooked, dark feathers squeezed together, their ends terminating in a cluster; and hence it is supposed to be of the bird kind: and, having thus indulged in suppositions, he adds, as his candour increases, 'At the extremity of the neck also, there is something that looks like an extremely small bird's head; but one must take the force of imagination to help to make it look so;' and, assuredly,

—'as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing

A local habitation, and a name;'

so there must have been no ordinary force of this power when the many-jointed arms of the barnacle—which, fringed as they are, are designed to act the part of a sweeping-net, so that the moment some minute tenant of the water touches it, it becomes entangled in their folds, that it may be carried to the mouth and transferred to the stomach—are metamorphosed into a goose."

"I should suppose," said I, "returning to plain fact from the region of imagination, that a very curious history might be formed of shell manufacture, when such a marvellous variety comes under the view even of a common observer."

"It might," said Wilton. "Every kind of shell has its history, to say the least; it may be, indeed that the history of no two shells is alike. Some shells, called porcellaneous, have a more uniform and compact texture than those which are membranaceous. The animal matter which unites the carbonate of lime, is, in such cases, more equally blended with the earthy particles, to which it appears to act as a cement, binding them very strongly together. In shells of this kind, the carbonate of lime assumes more or less of a crystalline arrangement. In some instances the minute crystals are composed of three distinct layers, each of which is formed of very thin plates, marked by oblique lines which show the direction of the crystalline fibres. These are arranged so as to give things without shape; but in others which were nearer come to perfection, living things that were naked, in shape like a bird; in others the birds were covered with a soft down, the shell half open, and the bird ready to fall out, which, no doubt, he winds up by saying, were the fowls called barnacles."

"So much," said I, "for some people's powers of vision, under certain circumstances. Butler tells of—

'A philosopher who undertook
To prove and publish in a book, strength to the shell; and, what is more remarkable, on a principle which has been latterly applied to the building of ships. When the form of the crystals is prismatic, the fibres are short, and the prisms are hexagonal. In one shell, brought from Sumatra, the crystalline appearance was so perfect, that some fragments of it were taken for a mineral production."

"The coincidence is curious. Some shells I have picked up are exceedingly fragile, and may be easily crushed; whilst others are manifestly of great strength."

"Just according to the circumstances of the creature," replied Wilton. "It sometimes happens that, at different periods, a sudden development takes place in particular parts of the mantle, which, in consequence, become rapidly enlarged, striking out into long processes of various sizes. Every part of their surface has the power of forming shell, so that the portion of it which they construct, being consolidated around each fleshy process, must necessarily have, at first, the shape of the tube closed at the end. As fresh deposits are made by the secreting surface, which are in the interior of the tube, the internal space is gradually filled up by these deposits—the particular process of the mantle retiring to make way for their advance towards the axis of the tube. In the course of time, every part of the cavity is obliterated, the process or spine of the shell becoming entirely solid. Thus originate the many curious projecting parts which several shells exhibit, which have arisen periodically during the growth from this outer surface; some of which are very strong."

"Is not the same end gained frequently by the form of the shell?"

"It is. This is apparent, for example, in the large family of the ammonites, an extinct genus, the name of which is derivable from their resemblance to the horns on the statue of Jupiter Ammon. Fossils of this kind are very extensive and remarkable. They vary greatly in size, from the twelfth part of an inch to more than four feet in diameter. As their shells were to act as floats, they were thin, or else they would have been too heavy to rise to the surface of the water; and as they were also to afford protection to their inmates, they had, at the same time, all requisite strength. Hence the entire shell of an ammonite is one continuous arch—the strength of which is proverbial—an arch, moreover, coiled spirally round itself, so that the base of the outer whorls rests on the crown of the inner whorls; and thus the back is peculiarly adapted to resist pressure. Still further, a scientific workman knows how to give strength to an arch; and the shell of the ammonite acquires it from the arrangement of the ribs by which it is adorned. Indeed the artisan who makes around the margins, or on the convex surfaces of tin and copper moulds for domestic use, folds or flutings, or gives them to a pencil-case, or to the iron intended to form a self-supporting roof, pursues the same course that is adopted to give strength to the shells of ammonites. A further mode of answering the same end is by introducing at the different parts of these ribs bosses, which, by the way, are far more efficient for the purpose than those which architects have added to their Gothic roofs."

"I presume, then, that the pressure must be great in the depths of the ocean."

"It appears so from the following experiment. A cork was forced into the neck of a bottle, so thick as to fit it very tightly, and in such a manner that half the cork remained above the edge of the neck; a cord was then tied round the cork, and fastened to the cork of the bottle, and the whole was covered with pitch. When the bottle was sunk to the depth of about fifty fathoms, it was suddenly felt to have increased in weight, and on being drawn up, the cork was found inside, and the bottle filled with water. In another instance, a bottle was similarly corked, but a sail needle was passed through the cork across the edge of the neck, so as to resist the passing of the cork into the bottle. It was now immersed to the depth of fifty fathoms, when the same sudden increase of weight was felt, and on drawing up the bottle, it was found to be filled with water, but the cork was not displaced. You have often seen, I presume, a chambered nautilus?"

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS.

"I have. It is a shell of peculiar beauty."

"One evening, when Mr. George Bennett was in the island of Erromanga, New Hebrides, a pearly nautilus was seen in Marekini Bay, on the south-west side of the island, floating on the surface of the water, not far distant from the ship, and resembling, as the sailors expressed it, a dead tortoise-shell cast on the waves. It was captured, but not before the upper part of the shell had been broken by the boat-hook, in the eagerness to take it, as the animal was sinking when caught. On being brought on board, Mr. Bennett's attention was directed to possessing the inhabitant, which he succeeded in procuring. He immediately detached it from the fractured portions of the shell—to which it was united by two oval bands on each side—and placed it in spirits, after making a pen-and-ink sketch of its external form."

"That is just what you would have done, Wilton, had you been in his circumstances."

"Most likely, my friend. But I should also have given the shell my special attention. Instead of being simply hollow, it is chambered or chambered; and when a section is made, it is found to be divided internally, by numerous regular partitions, into distinct compartments, the last or largest of which contains the body of the creature; and that a tube traverses these compartments from a cavity on the body of the nautilus to the last of the series. Here is an arrangement to secure the needed levity and gravity. These chambers contain air, generated by the nautilus; and when thus filled with a fluid more buoyant than water, the creature is able to ascend and float, notwithstanding the density of its shell. But when the nautilus wishes to sink, it forces water through the tube, thereby expelling or compressing the air; and thus attains its object, as at once it becomes heavier than the surrounding medium. Though capable of this ascent and descent, the nautilus is said to be often found reversed, and, like the tortoise and other creatures, bearing its house on its back."

THE MOON, AND HOW WE SEE IT.

In olden time the moon was a goddess. Whatever the ignorant mind of the time was incapable of grasping was supernatural. Thus arose the pale, chaste Deity of the Night, robed in virgin white, roaming dreamily under the partial shade of trees, loving to see her fair image reflected in streams, and shedding a complacent light on tender meetings. A goddess, indeed! What less could have smiled so benevolently on young lovers? Even scurvy Johnson was forced to confess that

"The Queen of Night
Round us pours a lambent light;
Light that seems but just to show
Breasts that beat and hearts that glow."

We are not heathens—far from it: we all go to church, and pay for pews, and the rest; but who among us has not at some time or other paid homage to the Queen of Night, and thanked her for the gentle light which has shown the way to some fair hand, or even, perhaps, a pair of red lips? Ah! let us not hasten to deride the poor old heathens!

In this matter-of-fact age, when everything is regulated by degrees and inches—when philosophers have stethoscopes to test the amount of excitement which was developed in Fanny's breast at the aspect of Arthur arm-in-arm with Louisa—we don't fancy the moon as a goddess. We say, in blunt scientific terms, that she—or it—is a satellite of the earth, suspended in her—or its—present position by the contrasted attraction of the sun and the earth. This is the unromantic version of the naked fact.

There was a time—ah! that we had lived to see it—when the earth was an uncomfortable, semi-incandescent mass, in the act of cooling off for practical purposes. The atmosphere was tropical throughout the globe. All things were intensely impregnated—or, as the philosophers say, super-saturated—with carbon. Between the dry land and the waters there was no division. There was no ocean, and consequently there were no continents. All was hot mud, with here and there a lake or a short river, and here and there a dry, parched, torrid eminence. In those days there were animals and plants, but no human beings. Both animals and plants were like the age in which they flourished—to our notions monstrous. Monsters were the rule, both in the vegetable and the animated world. Creatures were born, and grew to sizes which dwarf the elephant. Plants thrust their heads above the mud, and, in that carboniferous atmosphere, attained heights which would have towered above the tallest trees of our forests. But in proportion to the rapidity of their growth was the brevity of their life; for these were the days of earthquakes and terrestrial convulsions. Probably no day elapsed without some earthquake or volcanic eruption.

The light of day was dull and obscured. Masses of opaque matter floated through the atmosphere as thickly as dust specks float through a ray of sunlight in a darkened room. The hot air, thick and dull, hung a listless mist over the face of the earth, which was even then almost without form and void. When the sun went down, dense darkness covered the earth. There was no lesser light to rule the night; dim twinklings in the far distance, hardly piercing the pall which wrapped our planet, were the only contrasts to the Egyptian blackness of the dark hours.

But the internal fires which sprang from the vitals of the earth almost supplied the want of a nocturnal luminary. It is probable that there were but few spots on the globe which were out of view of some flaming volcano. We count the active volcanoes by integers. When we have enumerated Etna, Vesuvius, Hecla, Jorullo, Colima, and one or two others, we have reached the end of our list. In the days of Homer the volcanoes were counted by scores; in the carboniferous age they may have, must have, flourished by hundreds and thousands. That vast incandescent mass, of which the crust only had cooled, kept boiling at short intervals, and furiously pouring out the vials of its wrath upon an earth inhabited by transitory creatures. Go where the traveller may, he will still find traces of this terrible age. That tell-tale rock—"the trap"—is peculiar to no meridian; and from the Hudson's Bay territories nearly to Cape Magellan, from Spitzbergen to Borneo, either this, or some mountain range of volcanic origin, here with scoriae disseminated through the more regular formations, there with copper or gold held in a native state in half-decayed quartz, tell a very legible story of the time when all the component parts of the earth were in a fluid state, and were thrown off by the boiling mass beneath as a kettle throws off froth and scum.

There came a day when the under crust could no longer bear the weight of the mass which, after being thrown off daily, returned, by the force of gravitation, to the surface of its parent. A time came when the incandescent and inchoate planet—if so daring a figure may be ventured—felt the necessity of unusually strenuous measures. It gathered all its fiery energies, and mustered all its fearful strength. The effect was universal, not local. With such bodies distances of 25,000 miles must be trifling, and the earth's meridian—a paltry 8,000 miles—not worth mentioning. One can imagine the purpose and effort being common to the entire molten and raging mass.

It came at last. After throes of inconceivable agony, with a roar and a convulsion which must have destroyed every living thing then existent upon the face of the planet, in the midst of general chaos, confusion, and desolation, the earth relieved itself. It tore from its half-cooled surface immense masses, and projected them with monstrous force into space; not on one side alone, but on all. Lumps of earth four and five miles in thickness, and thousands of miles long and wide, were in an instant forced upward with such force as to pass beyond the circle of the earth's attraction. These various masses, thus launched into space, soon felt the attraction for each other, and assembled together. They met, and, agreeably to the sublime law of celestial bodies, remained suspended in space at the point where the attraction of the earth meets that of the sun. That other celestial law which forbids the torpidity of any atom of matter compelled the aggregated mass to revolve, and the revolution forced the mass into a spherical shape.

Thus the moon came into being. An offshoot from the earth, it pays homage to its parent by revolving round it, and reflecting back to it a part of the sun's light during the period when that luminary is obscured to us. Had the force with which its substance was expelled from the body of the earth been less, it would have returned to our surface, just as those fragments of matter called aerolites do at regular intervals; had that force been greater, it would have entered upon the vast area which is the domain of the sun, and would have been attracted to that great cosmical body, and been fused by its intense heat. It was sent abroad with precisely the force necessary to sustain it in equilibrium between the earth and the sun, and hence it is "the lesser light which rules the night."

This is not the only service which it renders us. By its creation it caused great hollows in the surface of the earth. Into these hollows the waters which lay on the face of the deep naturally gathered, and became oceans, lakes, seas, and rivers. The cavities drained the earth of the moisture which had rendered it unfit for the habitation of the higher order of vertebrate creatures. Thus by degrees were formed the great Atlantic and Pacific, the Northern and the Southern oceans, leaving here and there tracts of cool, dry land for man to inhabit at the word of his Creator. Nor did the office of the moon stop here. While it was upheld in space by the attraction of the earth, it returned the compliment by exercising a reciprocal attraction upon the waters for which it had created beds. With the beautiful regularity which is the characteristic of heavenly bodies, it affected them at uniform intervals, causing the tides to flow and to ebb, and to vibrate between the spring and the neap flow. Lastly, it relieved the earth of a vast quantity of superincumbent matter, equal, in fact, to over one-fifth of the whole bulk of the planet.

In departing from us, and setting up for herself, the moon forgot some articles of baggage which were essential to her future comfort and prosperity. Among these were air and water. How we came by these two useful commodities it were hard to say—about as hard as to account for the fact that you, my dear reader, have two eyes and a nose. It is enough for you and the earth to feel satisfied that you have what you need—that is to say, your two eyes and a nose; the earth, air and water. And we must, in the like stupid way, remain content with the naked assertion that the moon is devoid of what she sadly needs, air and water.

This is made quite certain by the discoveries of astronomers. Rains, dews, oceans, lakes, hail, snow, clouds, are all unknown to the moon. History records that the cruel Carthaginians used to cut off the eyelids of their prisoners and tie them on their backs, exposed to the burning sun of Africa. The moon is in the same unhappy condition. Nothing shields its surface from the burning rays of the sun. Wherever the light of that fierce luminary penetrates the moon's surface is incessantly hot.

Of volcanic origin, the moon is true to its descent. It is full of volcanoes, most of which, however, perhaps from a conviction of the uselessness of further action—there being nothing to destroy, and no one even to see their explosions—are now silent and torpid. But they wrought out their destiny so long and so faithfully, that the surface of the moon is frightfully disfigured and uneven. Switzerland is a prairie compared to the smoothest part of the moon's surface. It is nothing but incessant mountain and hollow. Lunar Alps and Rocky Mountains intersect every few miles of the surface. The Himalayas would be unnoticed among the gigantic ranges which ornament the lunar superficies. And the projections, mighty as they are, are but trifling in comparison with the hollows. It would seem as though the moon, with apish weakness, had tried to imitate the earth in throwing off space for rivers and oceans—forgetting that it contained no water to fill the cavities. Astronomers have made the most extraordinary discoveries in reference to these lunar hollows. Some of them appear to be about fifty miles deep, and a hundred miles or so wide, with precipitous sides. Our great astronomer Mitchell has vividly described these terrible places. Those who have looked over a precipice a few hundred feet in depth may, perhaps, form some rude idea of what it must be to gaze down into a hole fifty miles deep—so deep that the bottom would almost escape the eye were there an intervening atmosphere—a great, monstrous cave, with no vegetation either on the borders, or on the top, or on the sides, or on the bottom; no life of any kind, not even the least sound, to break the endless monotony of silence; everywhere dull, warm scoria, lava, and stones of volcanic origin. But even these are the smallest of the lunar cavities. Latterly, acute astronomers, with improved instruments, have gazed into holes in the moon's surface, and estimated them to be no less than two hundred and fifty and three hundred miles deep, with fissures in them through which the sunlight penetrated.

Fancy the scene! Well may it have been termed the abomination of desolation! Surely this fair earth, with all its gloomy places and all its dreary scenes, contains nothing so overwhelming in its terrible despair as the moon. And who, gazing at its mild, white face as it emerges from the cover of a cloud, would deem it so sad and desolate a sphere?

There are no "men in the moon." There cannot be, for they could not exist without air and water. 'Tis a pity; for the sight of this planet of ours, thirteen times the size which the moon appears to us, as fair, and bright, and shining as our nightly luminary, would be a sight worth seeing.

Small Change.

"I HAVE good reason," exclaimed an enraged author, who had been lampooned in a review, "to believe that M—— has given me this stab in the dark." "Make your mind perfectly easy," said his friend, "for M—— is the last man to give you a stab in the dark; first, because he always held you in tight estimation, and secondly, because he is a fellow that wouldn't stick at anything."

BAD COMPANY IS BETTER THAN NONE.—A lawyer driving through a town stopped at a cottage to inquire his way. The lady of the house told him he must keep straight on for some time, then turn to the right; but said that she herself was going to pass the road he must take, and if he would wait a few moments she would show him the way. "Well," he said, "bad company is better than none. Make haste." After jogging on five or six miles, the gentleman asked if he had not come to the road he must take. "O, yes!" said she, "we have passed it two or three miles back; but I thought that bad company was better than none, so I kept you along with me."

As a general rule, self-interest is the mainspring of our actions, and utility the test of their value.

"CAN'T we make your lover jealous, miss?" "Oh, yes, sir, I think we can, if we put our heads together!"

THE ART OF CONVERSATION.—Not only to say the right thing in the right place, but, far more difficult still, to leave unsaid the wrong thing at the tempting moment.

ADVICE TO LADIES.
If you your lips would save from slips,
Five things observe with care;
Of whom you speak, to whom you speak,
And how, and when, and where.

THE fourth finger was originally chosen for wearing the wedding ring, for the reason that it is not only used less than either of the rest, but is more capable of preserving a ring from bruises—having this one quality peculiar to itself, that it cannot be extended but in company with some other finger, whereas the others may be singly stretched out to their full length and straightness.

A DECIDED HIT.—During the very warm weather in June last, a party of ladies and gentlemen from the Isle of Skye made an excursion to Fingal's Cave; and finding the day so delightfully cool and pleasant on the sea, one of the ladies remarked to the captain that, while the weather continued so hot, she would like to be captain herself very well. He replied, in a most gentlemanly manner, that he would not object to her becoming captain's mate if the business increased as fast as it had done the previous week.

"How do my customers like the milk I sell them?" "Oh, they all think it of 'the first water.'"

If a young lady is not able to sport a riding habit, she should adopt a walking habit.

SELF-DEFENCE is the clearest of all laws, and for the reason that lawyers didn't make it.

WE are ruined not by what we really want but by what we think we do; therefore, never go abroad in search of your wants;—if they are real ones, they will come home in search of you. He that buys what he does not want will soon want what he cannot buy.

ALEXIS.—So you want to know something about Canton in particular, and China in general. Particulars about Canton can easily be furnished you, now England and France have procured for themselves and for other nations of Europe, the advantages of a treaty of peace, by which Chinese ports are to be thrown open, consuls established, and toleration of the Christian religion insured. Canton itself is wealthy and populous. It consists of three towns, divided by high walls. It has temples and numerous magnificent palaces. The houses are remarkably neat, but consist only of one storey, and they have no windows opening on the street. Of its almost countless inhabitants, many reside in barks touching one another, and forming a kind of floating city. At break of day all the people who inhabit these barks, depart to fish or to cultivate their rice. China itself is a vast empire, consisting chiefly of a flat open country, but it has some mountains, which are generally well cultivated, and covered with trees. China has mines of iron, copper, gold, silver, and quicksilver. Many of its vegetable productions are peculiar to itself, but it is most interesting to us, as being the vast nursery-ground of the tea plant. The Chinese are of tawny complexions. They countenance polygamy and idolatry. Strange to say, they are remarkable for politeness and industry, but on the other hand they are cruel, deceitful, and treacherous.

PHOEBE MORTIMER.—We rejoice in peace, but we own we do not consider that a treaty concluded with the Mormons can lead to permanent peace. Your question about the motives that can induce English people to join themselves to such a sect as the Mormons is not so easily answered. True, the missionaries of Joe Smith go about making most tempting promises, and advancing very false statements. And here we will not let slip the opportunity of giving some of these statements a flat denial. The "Valley of Mountains," as it is called, only rewards the labour of the husbandman by the most expensive style of artificial irrigation. And the dangers of the journey to "The Land of Promise" are such, that out of a caravan of 3,500 persons, 2,000 are said to have perished by the way. And of the female converts, happier are those who thus perished, than the sisters who reached the Salt Lake, and commenced a state of slavery. The vain longings after unattainable good, and the ardent desire for change that haunt the breasts of idle, silly people, may account for the numerous converts to Mormonism.

S. T.—We can quite understand the interest you take in all that relates to the telegraphic communication with America. It is now completed, and it has proved a great subject of rejoicing in the United States. One of the earliest uses made of it was to convey a message of friendly congratulation from our Queen to the President, and the President's reply cannot fail to excite the most hopeful anticipations in the minds of the true friends of both countries, as supplying a link calculated to unite two great nations in the closest bonds of friendship and good will.

Z. X.—The word toxophilite, that has puzzled you so much, is of Greek origin. It means "loving archery;" and toxophilite meetings are merely archery meetings.

AN OLD MAN.—If Europe's prospects are worse in some respects, in others they are better than they were. But a few years ago Russia was the terror of all the Continent. From Paris to Palermo alarms were rife about Russian power. Every statesman calculated the vast resources of Moscow; its impregnable fortresses; its territory, equal to a third of the globe; its army of a million of men, and its double fleet of fifty sail. But fortresses, army, and navy, were robbed of all their terrors by the Crimean campaign. Yet is Russia of the present time in a more prosperous state than before it received a check from the allied armies. Alexander is achieving more for the Russians than was ever done by Nicholas. He is stretching railroads and telegraphs over his immense dominions. He is colonising wastes, emancipating serfs, and turning slaves into subjects. He is speculating on Eastern commerce, and building factories on the Chinese frontier.

VINDEX.—If Alsop re-appeared among us, we believe he would be in no danger. He was virtually acquitted when Bernard was found not guilty. The laws relating to conspiring against foreign princes were not altered, because it was thought they were already sufficiently stringent; even libels against foreign sovereigns are punishable. Of this we had a proof in 1787, when Lord George Gordon was tried in the Court of King's Bench for a libellous publication against the Queen of France. Lord George was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of £5,000 and to be imprisoned for two years.

R. POTTS.—You are mistaken in supposing that the body of a debtor can be taken in execution after death. Such was, however, the practice in Prussia, till it was abolished by the Code Frédéric.

ST. MAUR.—It was on the 1st of September, 1858, that Queen Victoria became the sovereign of India. The East India Company has ceased to exist, but let due honour be given to its memory. In a little more than a century and a half it won and attached to its rule a greater space and several times the number of people that ever before fell to any family of conquerors. India offers subjects of congratulation that outshine all the older achievements of our race. Whatever we have gained elsewhere, falls far short of that great dominion won by prodigies of valour and consummate policy. You wish to know how the East India Company resigned its power? As departing greatness should do, with dignity and grace, and with a prayer in which all our readers will join, that peace may soon be restored, and that India may enter on a course of improvement comparable, in some degree, with that of Europe.

DUBIOUS.—The paper duty is by no means the trifle you seem to imagine. Are you aware that the net amount of duty received on paper in the quarter ended March 31, 1858, was—England and Wales, £814,560. 17s. 8d.; Scotland, £252,959 18s. 1d.; and Ireland, £51,912 12s. 1d., being in all, £1,119,433 7s. 10d? Were this heavy impost removed, it would give an impetus to the operations of publishers, in the beneficial results of which their readers would be the largest sharers.

DICK TARLETON, SPES, 123 Z.—The young lady who deceived you once, may do so again. We cannot recommend you to marry her.—"Spes" must remember that all depends on disposition. A long engagement between an affectionate and constant pair only strengthens love, and embellishes life. With commonplace people a long engagement is a great evil.—Let "123 Z" make the lady acquainted with the secret of his heart, in the same manner in which he has told it to us.

A BUCHAN LASSIE.—In reply to "a Buchan Lassie's" amiable communication, we do not hesitate to recommend her to accept the suitor of thirty-five years of age, who can marry her immediately, rather than wait for the other suitor, who is younger than herself. The best assorted unions are those in which the husband has the decided seniority.

L. BEAMISH.—If you can give evidence of the identity of the child, your having neglected to register his birth will not affect his right to the money in question.

EMMA O.—Do not refuse the offer of a respectable man in good circumstances for the sake of one who is not in a condition to marry you, and who, you yourself own, has slighted you. If you miss the present chance, you may never have another.

LEVY.—Unless a jury is unanimous, no verdict can be given.

QUID PRO QUO.—We decline giving our opinion of the present state of the game laws. But we are convinced society must be in a very different state before they are entirely abolished. In reply to your second question, we can inform you that though hares are game, persons being the occupiers of inclosed lands may kill them, or authorise another person so to do (which authority must be registered with the clerk of the peace of the county), without being liable to the tax for a game certificate. Moor hens are not game, but grouse, bustards, pheasants, and partridges are game.

A PUPIL.—Vesuvius and Etna are far from being the highest volcanic mountains in the world. Cotopaxi, in South America, is 18,863 feet high, and in 1738 its flames rose 3,000 feet above the mountain. Vesuvius is about 3,000 feet high, and Etna about 10,000 feet.

A. B.—Punch and Judy is the relic of an ancient mystery, in Latin called "Pontius cum Judæis;" in English, "Pontius Pilate with the Jews."

A LOYAL SUBJECT.—Our National Anthem is originally a German air. With regard to "A Loyal Subject's" second question, before replying to it we must ask her if she is a young woman. Should she reply in the affirmative, we should be tempted to think that the admiration professed for the children is in reality felt for her. Prudent young women should discourage the advances of strangers. Therefore, we caution "A Loyal Subject" against accepting the tickets or any other favour proffered. The French addressing the fair sex, say—

"Des faveurs des hommes méfiez vous bien, Dans ce monde on ne donne rien pour rien."

In English, and in plain prose: "Mistrust the favours of men; in this world nothing is given for nothing."

LEONIA.—Your anxiety about your brother does credit to your heart. It is highly desirable that he should be checked in a course of dissipation that, if continued, must ruin him; but while he keeps the peace no legal restraint can be put upon him. In the meantime, you can only hope and pray for his reformation, and you would do wrong to destroy your health by fretting about what you cannot prevent.

C. E. S.—You wish us to tell you how to gain the affections of a certain young lady? Prove to us that you are worthy of those affections, and we will direct you how to proceed.

LILLIAN BOOTHROYD.—The title you mention is sanctioned by custom, and intended to give the honour ascribed to primogeniture.

KATE AND AUGUSTUS.—Were it not universally acknowledged that Cupid is blind, the cases of "Kate and Augustus" would suffice to prove the fact. Kate is eighteen years of age, she is about the middle height, has dark eyes and dark hair, and a clear complexion. She is considered lively and amiable, she plays on the piano, and excels in drawing, yet, with a charming naïveté, she tells us she has not had "the poorest approach to a beau." Did any of our readers ever hear of such a case? "Augustus" (taking him at his own valuation) is, in height, five feet seven inches. He has auburn hair, blue eyes, a pleasant, merry countenance, and is decidedly fond of fun, yet he can make no impression on the ladies. Even if he attracts notice for a week or two, "the same implacable coldness, the same rigidity of features meet his anxious gaze." Our correspondents appeal to us in their sorrows. We would gladly help them and teach them how to make themselves appreciated. Although the data on which we form our opinion is not very ample, it has enabled us to come to this conclusion, "Kate" is too shy; let her conquer a "mauvaise honte," that lessens the charms of her society. "Augustus" makes too much of himself. Let him lessen his conceit, and no longer contest the palm of beauty with the fair sex.

ALICE MAUD MARY.—You are right. A dignified reserve is the best plan. Rely on it, your excessive fondness has wearied your suitor. When your conduct changes, very likely his will change too.

CROACH PHADRIG.—It will require considerable interest to obtain the situation you seek, even supposing you pass well through your examination.

SIR CHARLES.—Cultivate cheerful society, and read amusing and improving books. By this means, and by persevering in your steady mode of living, the nervousness you complain of will probably leave you. We recommend your brother, Fred Warton, to try to procure employment in the service of a country gentleman, or on some large farm. As he has education he could keep the farm accounts. Let him seek employment in every direction before he makes up his mind to enlist.

CONSTANT SUBSCRIBER.—Mix black pepper and brown sugar, in the proportion of two tea-spoonfuls of sugar to one of pepper, in some new milk, so as to form a kind of syrup; place portions of this in small saucers near the spots where the flies most resort, and they will rapidly disappear. Moisten the mixture with milk as often as it dries.

FRANK D.—Find out the nests of the ants, put in some quicklime powdered, and throw water upon it.

JANE CLIFTON.—Admirable lessons on etiquette, conduct, and carriage will be found in the numbers of the "Ladies' Treasury," published monthly by Ward and Lock, Fleet-street.

PAUL S. F.—Madrid is the capital of Spain; Lisbon is the capital of Portugal. For the removal of warts see No. 191, page 271.

DELTA.—The only advice we can give you is to submit your case to a skillful surgeon.

J. JOHNSON. and several other correspondents, have requested information respecting phonography, or shorthand; we have it in contemplation to furnish some easy and familiar lessons on this most useful art.

NEMO.—Apply to the Herald's College, Bennet's-hill, St. Paul's.

UNLICENSED.—A license is necessary to enable you legally to hawk goods for sale in any town or village, notwithstanding the article hawked is of your own manufacture.

ELIOTIC AND D. H. H. W.—If for seven years you receive no letters from your husbands who have deserted you, and can obtain no information whatever respecting them, after making diligent inquiry, you will be at liberty to marry again.

EMILY ANNE.—By all means put it out of the power of your cousin to repeat his very improper behaviour.

AN APPRENTICE.—We have referred your inquiry as to what you could substitute for an acromatic lens to the editor of the "Photographic News," who will, doubtless, give the matter attention in an early number of that publication.

RESPECTFULLY DECLINED.—Samuel E.; Evangeline; British Workman; D. Young; A Forfar Laddie; R. C.; Hunter; Lines on Autumn (Belfast); W. W.; Mountain Daisy; School-boy Life; Valerius North; E. O. C.; Henricus; White Rosebud; J. H. S.; A Subscriber (Wisbeach); Starlight; J. Jiles; Arbell Anxious; C. A. P.; Perseverance; E. Derry; T. W. A.; Mary; C. Rickman; F.; Ellen Nelle; Omicron; Lines on Poor Puss; Tag; G. Mercer; H. B. R.; Marcus; Stella; W. X.; and several without signatures.

WARBECK.—We can readily believe that you often think of your lady love when you are alone. The question is, Does she deserve to be the subject of your thoughts? You say she is "a card-player." If by this you mean that she is addicted to gambling, we advise you to have nothing more to say to her:—

"The love of gambling is the worst of ills—

With constant storms the blackened soul it fills;

Inveighs at Heaven, impairs the ties of blood;

Destroys the will and power of doing good.

Kills health, pawns honour, plunges in disgrace,

And turns an angel's to a demon's face."

SUSAN.—You will not find the lowest-priced sugar the cheapest in the end. It is heavy, dirty, and of an inferior degree of sweetness.

BIG JIM, JOHN REA AND RACHEL, DAVID.—The peasants of Lancashire are among the handsomest men in the world. Neither "John Rea" nor "Rachel" should comply with the request for their likenesses, unless they mean to encourage the hopes of the persons wishing for the likenesses.—Let "David" only persevere, and he is sure to succeed. His clever and judicious letter shows him to be a youth of energy. As such, he must not allow any fond feeling to get the mastery of him. Let him avoid the young lady, and her image will gradually vanish from his mind.

CUNCTATOR.—There can be but one interpretation of "Ask papa," and that interpretation crows your hopes.

1 2 3.—Both soap and candles are improved by keeping, so buy your store for winter in September.

CHURCH ST. PERCH.—In our opinion you can only change for the better. The faults which you attribute to the young lady are more likely to increase than to diminish with age.

DERMOT.—Since you keep pigeons, do not forget that they are very fond of salt, and that it keeps them in health. Lay a heap of clay near their house, and pour salt brine on it.

PRIMOSE OF BIRMINGHAM, ELLA, CONSTANT AND TRUE.—Do not answer the letters unless you mean to encourage the gentleman's suit.—If your parents, "Ella," do not object to the correspondence, you may continue it; but etiquette forbids the familiarity you speak of.—We cannot, under any circumstances, countenance young people in defying their parents; but we sincerely pity the case of the young ladies in whom "Constant and True" takes an interest, and we think they would be happier in earning a livelihood among strangers, than in remaining in a home rendered wretched by cruelty and abuse.

T. MONK.—Your father is right: you should avoid laughing at your own jokes.

A. M. D. S.—If one hen lays an egg, and another hatches it, the former is the mother; the latter the foster-mother.

SPOONEY.—The lady does not forfeit a pair of gloves by your kissing her while she sleeps. It is you who, by such an act, forfeit your claim to propriety of deportment.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARTLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XCIII.

His act did not o'ertake his bad intent;
And must be buried but as an intent,
That perish'd by the way; thoughts are no subjects,
Intent but merely thoughts.—SHAKESPEARE.

THERE is something so magnificently terrible in war, that few minds are capable of grasping it as a whole and perfect picture. The movement of armies, the marching and counter-marching of troops, the strategic manœuvres of the opposing commanders merely serve to confuse the non-military reader; and it is only from its episodes, such as the attack upon some isolated fort, the turning of an enemy's position at an important point, or the struggle of a handful of gallant fellows surrounded by superior numbers, that he can form any distinct idea of what war really is.

These episodes become doubly impressed upon the memory when some dear friend or relative has taken a share in them. As we doubt not but by this time more than one of the personages of our tale have secured an interest in the sympathy and kind feelings of our readers, we shall not apologise for drawing their attention once more, and for the last time, to India.

Some may, perchance, expect that we are about to follow, step by step, the progress of the contest, now, happily, nearly terminated. Nothing of the kind; that task belongs to the historical painter, and not the mere sketcher in pen and ink, whose labours are confined to bits of detail; although, as we have just observed, such bits of detail give, perhaps, the clearest idea of the entire picture.

When the fanatic sepoy sprang with Fred Wharton from the walls of the temple, all who beheld the desperate act imagined that both alike had perished. The English uttered a cry of horror—the Hindoos their triumphant exclamations of "deen! deen!" To the defenders the gallant soldier seemed a martyr—to the assailants, a sacrifice offered to their goddess Mariatele.

Christians and heathen were alike deceived. The ferocious rebel was the only one who met his death. The young officer, though sorely bruised and wounded, lay senseless for awhile upon the pile of slain which his own hand had assisted to rear. When he recovered his senses he found himself in a rude hut, formed of boughs and grass, in the depths of the adjoining jungle. An old soubahdar, who had formerly been in the Company's artillery, had drawn him from his blood-stained resting-place—at first, no doubt, with a view of plundering his body; but, finding that he still breathed, had conveyed him to a distance with the intention of preserving him.

Like many of his class, the ex-sepoy had been forced to join the insurgents, whose ultimate success he doubted. It was not humanity that prompted him, but interest and calculation. If his countrymen succeeded, he could at any time deliver the hated Christian into their hands; if, on the contrary, the British triumphed, his pension, he considered, would be preserved.

For some time after recovering his consciousness, Wharton continued to look around him with a bewildered air, at a loss to comprehend how the desperate struggle in which he had so lately been engaged had been exchanged for his present shelter; and more than once he asked himself whether the aged Hindoo, seated on his heels at the door of the hut, was his gaoler or preserver.

Probably the man would have been equally puzzled to answer the question satisfactorily had it been put to him, seeing that it depended on the turn events might take.

The faint echo of the cannon informed the young Englishman not only that he had been removed to a considerable distance from the scene of slaughter, but that the contest was still going on; and he made a faint effort to raise himself in order to rejoin his comrades.

"Useless, sahib," said the soubahdar. "The newborn babe is scarcely more helpless. It will be weeks before you are able to stand."

"And then?"

The Hindoo regarded him with a singular expression, but made no direct reply. Probably he was weighing the price set by his countrymen upon the head of every British officer against the chance of recovering his pension.

The question was repeated.

"Who knows!" answered the old man. "It is given but to few to read the leaves of destiny. What is writ is writ, and there's an end. Be content with the present good that has befallen you, and leave the future to itself."

To encourage the speaker in what, for the present, at least, appeared a friendly disposition, Wharton felt for his purse and watch, with the intention of giving them to him: they were both gone. Fortunately, he recollected that he had a diamond of considerable value in the bosom of his shirt.

"Unfasten my uniform," he said.

His preserver, who had watched his actions whilst searching for the money, guessed the reason of his request, and eagerly complied with it.

"There," continued the wounded man, drawing forth the gem, which the Hindoo greedily snatched at; "if I recover, I will redeem it back again at ten times its value."

"It is a diamond!" exclaimed the former, in a tone of satisfaction, after holding it up to the light, and carefully examining it. "The sahib is rich?"

"I can pay a rajah's ransom," replied the Englishman, perfectly satisfied that whatever else was the inquirer's motive in preserving his life, humanity had very little to do with it.

"And yet you are young," observed the old man, suspiciously, "to have gleaned much wealth, even with the Company for a paymaster."

"I am not in the service of the Company," said Wharton, "but of the Queen; you ought to know the difference."

"How so?"

"Because you have been a soldier. It is useless to deny it; I can recognise at a glance a man who has served."

The soubahdar drew himself up with an air of gratified pride; for, like most of the natives, he felt vain of having borne arms.

"The sahib is right," he answered, at the same time executing the military salute; "I have served under Napier, the conqueror of Scinde. He was the lion of the Feringhees, but the Company never understood him."

"And yet you have joined your rebel countrymen," observed the officer.

"Destiny," said the old man, calmly.

The Hindoo muttered something about faith and being compelled to obey the decrees of the Brahmins.

"Faith!" repeated the soldier, indignantly. "What faith can justify the massacre of helpless infants and women?"

"The rule of England is broken."

"Do you believe it?" demanded Wharton, in a tone of contempt so undisguised, that it bore impress of the sincerity of his convictions. "Little do your countrymen dream of the energy of the mighty nation whose wrath they have madly braved. Even now," he continued, with increasing energy, "thousands are on the seas to re-assert her rule and punish this rebellion."

"Meanwhile the Mogul reigns in Delhi," observed the soubahdar, calmly.

"The sultan of an hour," exclaimed the wounded man. "His present elevation will only make his fall more ignominious. He is the last of the race of Timour."

"You forget that he has many sons."

"There are ropes enough in Hindostan for all," was the reply.

At this retort the gray eyes of the old man, hitherto so cold and snake-like, sparkled with fury, and his hand involuntarily sought his tulwar, a long knife-like looking weapon in his girdle; a moment's reflection, however, and the calm, haughty glance of the speaker restrained him, and he repeated the old formula which is alike the keystone to the faith and philosophy of the followers of Brahma—

"What is writ is writ."

Poor Wharton was too much exhausted by loss of blood and the severe contusions he had received, to continue the conversation any further. Absal Mursa, the name of his preserver, set himself at once to dress his wounds, which task he performed with no inconsiderable skill; that concluded, he quitted the hut for an hour, at the end of which time he returned laden with herbs gathered in the jungle.

With these he prepared a species of embrocation, and bathed the bruised limbs of the young officer, who shortly afterwards fell into a refreshing sleep. When he awoke, he found himself alone. His first impulse was to fly, and regain the temple; but every effort to quit his pallet of leaves proved vain. As the Hindoo had said, he was as helpless as a child.

It was past midnight when the soubahdar returned, bringing with him a bag of rice, and a bottle of arrack. The first was for his prisoner; the latter for himself.

Wharton knew, as well as the fellow himself, the chance upon which his life depended. Although his residence in India had been a brief one, he had seen quite enough of the native character to know that calculation and self-interest form the basis of every action. A reverse on the part of the English forces, and his preserver might make a merit of delivering him to a death too terrible even for his calm courage to contemplate without shuddering; a victory, on the contrary, for awhile, at least, would secure his safety.

Having cooked a dish of rice, as the natives of the East alone know how to prepare it, the old man advanced to the side of his pallet, and, in a tone of respect, requested him to eat.

The officer faintly smiled; he knew that the attack upon the temple had once more failed.

"The forces of the rebel rajah," he said, fixing his eyes upon the countenance of Absal, "have been beaten."

"How tell you that?"

Wharton silently pointed to the food the speaker had prepared and brought him.

"They have," answered the Hindoo, struck by his powers of observation, a quality nowhere so much respected, perhaps, as in the East.

"Success has arrived?"

The Hindoo made no answer.

"Hear me!" exclaimed the wounded officer, greatly excited. "I make no appeal to your feelings of humanity: wise men—as the Vedas express it—are governed by the brain; children and women only by the heart."

"The sahib hath spoken truly," muttered his hearer.

"What good can you possibly expect from keeping me here a prisoner? Should your countrymen discover me, they would sacrifice me in their fury, and you would not even have the merit of delivering a victim into their hands: possibly might share my fate!"

The old man nodded, at if to say "go on."

"By conveying to the commander of the garrison intelligence of my safety, you may at once secure a considerable recompense."

Absal shook his head. The success of the English was not sufficiently decided to induce him to consent to such a step.

"I have a son," he answered, "in the troops of the rajah, whose life would pay the penalty of his father's treason to his faith."

"His safety may be provided for," urged the officer.

"I should risk my own," added the Hindoo, "were I discovered endeavouring to approach the place. The light cavalry of Acbar are scouring the jungle."

"They may find us here," observed the wounded man.

"Not one would venture near."

"Why not?"

The old man, with a mysterious look, repeated the word "deen," by which the Englishman knew that the spot the speaker had chosen for his retreat was supposed by the superstitious natives to be invested with a sacred character.

There are many such places in India. Travellers will frequently meet with them by the road-side, and sometimes in the jungle. They are either the cell or tomb of some fakir, santan, or saint, who lived and died in the odour of dirt and sanctity.

The approach to these retreats may generally be known by rags tied to the bushes round them, and sometimes by yet more costly offerings.

Finding his entreaties useless, Wharton once more tried to sleep, and soon fell into profound repose, which the Hindoo carefully watched. Having been more than once an inmate of the regimental hospital, he was quite prepared for the fever which set in on the following morning, and not altogether without skill to treat it.

For several days the state of the wounded soldier hung evenly balanced betwixt life and death, but happily he was unconscious of his sufferings; his brain wandered, and he was no longer in India but in England; imagination had annihilated both time and distance, and transferred him from the lonely hut in the wild jungle to the home of his boyhood, and surrounded his rude bed of suffering with the faces of those who loved him—whom he loved.

More than once, too, the word "mother!" escaped his lips, as a ministering form appeared to hover round him in his waking dreams.

These visions, if they may be termed such, were not always of a pleasing character. More than once he saw the aged Hindoo brandishing his long weapon over his head, and threatening him with death. It might have been the phantasma of his over-excited brain; but as the reports of disasters to the British arms before Delhi were at that period industriously circulated by the Brahmins, it is more than probable that the real and unreal were confounded in his ravings.

A good constitution and the care of Absal at last prevailed, and the raging fever was vanquished, but it left him so weak and exhausted, that for several weeks the young soldier was unable to stand. Some time elapsed before he could regain sufficient strength to take exercise, and then only at break of morn or the close of day; the necessity of concealment kept him at other times a prisoner in the hut.

Frequently would he question the ex-soubahdar on the result of the war, but never could obtain any satisfactory account. Sometimes the old man would appear moody, and refuse to answer him, at others torture him by relating the supposed defeat of the English.

One point Wharton succeeded in ascertaining—it was that his regiment, after destroying the temple, had marched with the reinforcement which had arrived so opportunely, to the siege of the City of Delhi, the spot on which the destinies of the East were soon to be decided.

Like most of his countrymen, Absal was much given to contemplation. The Hindoo will sit for hours insensible, or apparently so, to all that passes around him. With many, doubtless, this is a mere affectation; with others a reality, especially with Brahmins of the highest caste, who consider yoga, or the losing of their own individuality in contemplation, as the highest degree of sanctity.

The reflections of his preserver, as the officer soon discovered, were not altogether of this philosophical character; worldly interests and calculations mingled with them, the evidence of which appeared with his recovered strength and return of health.

"The sahib," observed the old man, as they returned from one of those early walks which he never permitted his prisoner, hostage, or whatever else he might consider him, to take alone, "is now strong. The rose has returned to his cheek, and his sinews have regained their elasticity."

"You have saved me," replied the Englishman, gravely, but without expressing the slightest desire to ascertain to what his words tended. The Asiatics entertain a profound contempt for curiosity or impatience.

The soubahdar stroked his beard.

"Delhi," he said, "is six hundred miles."

"It is."

"Still, with courage and a good horse, it might be reached in less than a moon."

"Undoubtedly."

"The sahib would like to rejoin his countrymen?"

"It is my most ardent wish," exclaimed the young man.

"And once with them, speedily forget the ransom you have promised me," observed the former, suspiciously.

To have repeated his offer of rewarding him the Englishman well knew would have been useless, and added to the mistrust of the speaker, who, like most men, judged of others by himself; and the native of the East is never so vehement in his protestations of fidelity as at the moment he is plotting to deceive, or more intent upon cheating than when vaunting his fidelity.

Wharton wisely, therefore, took a different course. "How long have we known each other?" he asked. "Four months," was the reply. "During which time I have several times been at the gates of death, have I not?" "Life hath trembled in the balance."

"Have I shown fear?" "No."

"Or baseness?" "No."

"Then why suspect me of them now?"

"The sahib is right," exclaimed the Hindoo, stroking his beard complacently, "and I were a kafir longer to doubt his word; for, with all their faults, there is truth in the Feringhees. If I beggar myself, as I must do, to procure the horses," he added, "we will proceed to Delhi. You will not quit me?"

"Not till you are paid," replied the officer, joyfully.

"That will be—?"

"When we arrive before Delhi."

With this arrangement the old man expressed himself satisfied; and it was decided that they should start upon their journey the following night, in order to avoid the risk of encountering any straggling parties of the rajah's soldiers, many of whom still lingered in the neighbourhood, although the fort of their master had long since been destroyed.

Absal absented himself during the rest of the day; but at dark returned, bringing with him a couple of horses, which he stated he had bought—Wharton shrewdly suspected he had stolen them—and a disguise for the latter; the sight of whose uniform would at once have betrayed him, in the event of encountering the enemy, and exposed both to their revenge.

The metamorphosis was completed, and the Englishman not only ready but impatient to start. Not so his companion; his avaricious spirit could not endure the thought of leaving the costly jacket of his companion behind; so he sat himself quietly down, and began ripping off the lace and embroidery.

"Head not the trash!" exclaimed the former.

"What is gold weighed against safety?"

"Gold is the strength of the earth," replied the soubahdar, calmly, continuing his work: "only fools despise it."

"Is that the teaching of your priests?"

"It is their practice," observed the old man, in a cynical tone: "words are but air."

It was not till the last strip of bullion had been removed from the uniform, that the speaker consented to depart; once mounted, he showed neither hesitation nor fear, but boldly led the way through the jungle, which they traversed for many miles before reaching the open road; fortunately, the night proved a dark one, and no enemy more redoubtable than the hungry jackal, or the timid antelope, crossed their path.

There was something inexpressibly irksome to the young Englishman, in being compelled to stick to the side of his companion, who was well armed himself; but, as a matter of precaution, left his prisoner, for such he considered him, defenceless. If the former galloped only a few paces in advance, a sharp angry voice recalled him, and the hand of Absal was placed on his carbine.

This state of suspicion on one side, and dependence on the other, endured till the fugitives arrived at a ruined tomb, where they agreed to take up their quarters for the night, the Hindoo, as usual, going to the nearest village to purchase provisions.

On his return he brought with him not only the usual supply of rice, but a fowl and a bottle of arrack. It was the first time he had indulged, since quitting the hut, in his favourite drink, which, after a hearty supper, told upon him, and he soon fell into a profound sleep.

Great was the soubahdar's consternation when he awoke the following morning, to find that Wharton had not only possessed himself of his arms, but of the belt which he constantly wore around his waist.

The latter contained his money, the diamond ring, and the bullion he had stripped from the uniform.

Confused and utterly defenceless, the old man sat staring at him, the picture of despair.

"It is my turn to speak of ransom now," exclaimed the officer, with a joyous laugh at his lugubrious visage.

"I had the sahib's word," answered the former, reproachfully.

"Did you trust to it?"

His companion hung his head; he understood the reproof.

"I slept in confidence," he observed at last; "and we have broken bread and eaten salt together."

"It was the sleep of the wolf," replied Wharton, "who imagines its prey defenceless. There," he added, "take back your gold; I have no intention of depriving you of it."

He threw back the bag, well filled with rupees, as he spoke. Absal clutched it eagerly.

"And there is the ring," continued the speaker. "The word of an English gentleman and officer is sacred."

The Hindoo began to think so.

"And, last, receive your arms—the weapons with which you have so frequently threatened me when I attempted to indulge in a gallop from your side. I only took them, man, to prove to you that I might be trusted. I am unarmed again, and ready to keep faith with you."

Although his companion, in all probability, considered the speaker a fool for his generosity, he felt touched by his conduct. It was something incomprehensible to him, and that, perhaps, caused it to make the deeper impression, for he could not avoid contrasting it with what his own would have been had the case been reversed.

"Retain the arms, sahib," he said, handing him back the pistols and a tulwar; "I no longer doubt you."

"I thought we should understand each other at last," observed Wharton, with a quiet smile. "Never look so serious, man; the ransom shall be paid to the last rupee, and the ring redeemed at the sum I promised."

During the rest of their journey, which lasted about ten days longer, Absal continued to express the most unbounded confidence in his prisoner; and only looked a little uneasy when the latter indulged his horse with a gallop over the plains.

The hand of the old man no longer wandered in search of his weapon, or if it did, the movement was instantly checked.

CHAPTER XCIV.

Then, if you fight against God's enemy,
God will, in justice, ward you as his soldiers;
If you do sweat to put a tyrant down,
You sleep in peace, the tyrant being slain;
If you do fight against your country's foes,
Your country's fat shall pay your pains the three;
If you do fight in safeguard of your wives,
Your wives shall welcome home the conqueror;
If you do free your children from the sword,
Your children's children quit it in your age.

SHAKESPEARE.

THE siege train had arrived, and the rebel host, who had braved the might of England, were hemmed in the doomed city of the Mogul by her stalwart sons, eager to retrieve the honour of the flag; treachery and surprise had gained a brief triumph over.

It was about this time that General Wilson, who had succeeded to the command, issued the following proclamation to his impatient soldiery:—

"The force assembled before Delhi has had much hardship and fatigue to undergo since its arrival in this camp, all of which has been most cheerfully borne by officers and men. The time is now drawing near when the major-general commanding the force trusts that their labours will be over, and they will be rewarded by the capture of the city for all their past exertions, and for a cheerful endurance of still greater fatigue and exposure. The troops will be required to aid and assist the engineers in the erection of the batteries and trenches, and in daily exposure to the sun, as covering parties."

"The artillery will have even harder work than they yet have had, and which they have so well and cheerfully performed hitherto: this, however, will be for a short period only, and when ordered to the assault the major-general feels assured British pluck and determination will carry everything before them, and that the bloodthirsty and murderous mutineers against whom they are fighting will be driven headlong out of their stronghold or be exterminated; but to enable them to do this, he warns the troops of the absolute necessity of their keeping together, and not straggling from their columns—by this can success only be secured."

"Major-General Wilson need hardly remind the troops of the cruel murders committed on their officers and comrades, as well as their wives and children, to move them in the deadly struggle. No quarter should be given to the mutineers; at the same time, for the sake of humanity, and the honour of the country they belong to, he calls upon them to spare all women and children that may come in their way."

"It is so imperative, not only for their safety, but for the success of the assault, that men should not straggle from their column, that the major-general feels it his duty to direct all commanding officers to impress this strictly upon their men; and he is confident that, after this warning, the men's good sense and discipline will induce them to obey their officers, and keep steady to their duty. It is to be explained to every regiment that indiscriminate plunder will not be allowed; that prize agents have been appointed, by whom all captured property will be collected and sold, to be divided, according to the rules and regulations on this head, fairly among all men engaged; and that any man found guilty of having concealed captured property will be made to restore it, and will forfeit all claims to the general prize; he will also be liable to be made over to the provost-marshal to be summarily dealt with. The major-general calls upon the officers of the force to lend their zealous and efficient co-operation in the erection of the works of the siege now about to be commenced. He looks especially to the regimental officers, of all grades, to impress upon their men that to work in the trenches during a siege is as necessary, as honourable, as to fight in the ranks during a battle. He will hold all officers responsible for their utmost being done to carry out the directions of the engineers; and he confidently trusts that all will exhibit a healthy and hearty spirit of emulation and zeal, from which, he has no doubt, the happiest results will follow, in the brilliant termination of all their labours."

This address produced the happiest effect. Every Englishman's heart was in his arm, and each laboured as if he had a brother's death, a sister's outrage, to avenge.

On the fourteenth of September the troops moved to the assault.

Amongst the regiments most impatient for the attack was the gallant 01st, thirsting to add fresh laurels to those they had won in many a well-fought fight.

Although worn and confined to his quarters from the wounds he had received and the great amount of fatigue endured in the defence of the temple, Sir Charles Fourreau insisted on leading his men in person. It was in vain that the doctor remonstrated; for once the entreaties of his wife and Lillian proved unavailing; neither could shake the veteran's determination.

"I must do honour to my spurs," he exclaimed, in answer to their representations—he had lately been promoted to the rank of brigadier; "and then, Bell, a little rest may not come amiss. I shall have earned it."

"You have earned it already," was the reply of his officers. Plinlimmon alone remained silent, for his advice might have been misconstrued, as the command of the regiment, in the event of its being followed, would, as a matter of right, have fallen upon him.

It was a sad trial for Lillian, as well as her adopted mother, that day destined to be so glorious in the history of British warfare in India, for Richard had decided upon taking part in the assault as a volunteer. As a matter of course, Jack Manders and Caleb were to join him; both would have felt themselves cruelly treated at being excluded from any danger in which he shared.

Those who were present will never forget the cheer which broke from the ranks of the 01st when the men recognised the stately figure of their colonel. There was a feeling of love and admiration blended with it, for they looked upon him as a father.

Stock, as usual, rode with him as his orderly.

"I am not going to make you a speech, boys," said Sir Charles. "There is no occasion; we know each other too well by this time."

"We do!" shouted the men, greatly excited.

"You have heard the general order," continued their commander; "mercy to the wives and children, but no quarter to the rebels."

A wild cry arose, in which the words "Cawnpore" and "the women" were distinctly heard.

"I shall add nothing about plunder," added the baronet. "This day we fight for the honour of England, and to avenge our slaughtered countrymen; and the 01st, I am well assured, will be the last regiment engaged in the assault to forget it."

The enthusiastic huzzas of his men were lost in the yet louder roar of the artillery, which now opened on the doomed city, pouring an iron shower upon her guilty palaces and blood-stained holds.

Perhaps the most gallant achievement of the day was the blowing in the Cashmere Gate in face of the enemy. Under a fire which swept the approach, and laid many a brave fellow low, Lieutenants Home and Salkeld, Sergeants Smith, Carmichael, and Burgess, and a party of sappers, undertook the heroic task, the 60th Rifles covering their advance. Unappalled by the shot which scattered death around them, these devoted men crossed the shattered draw-bridge, and placed the powder-bags in position.

The rebels set up a cry of despair.

Sergeant Carmichael was killed just as he had completed the laying of the powder; but what could daunt the bravery of Englishmen?—not death, for the gallant fellows looked him sternly in the face, and sent back frown for frown. The wild cry of triumph from the rebels still rang in the air, when Lieutenant Salkeld advanced to fire the train; but he too fell, and the shouts of "Deen! deen!" were repeated.

The wounded officer raised himself, and, with a look of defiance, handed the slow match to Corporal Burgess, to whose memory the honour of having fired the charge is due—an honour purchased with his life; for, at the instant of the explosion, he fell never to rise again.

In the long list of honours, pensions, and rewards which a grateful country has lavished on her defenders, what notice has been taken of the families of Sergeants Smith and Burgess? None. The distributors of a nation's bounty scoff at the idea of gladdening the hearts, gratifying the honest pride of those who mourn their loss, by any marked recognition of their services. Absurd! ridiculous! mere common soldiers, but one degree removed from the rank of privates! would be the reply to any one who presumed to hint at an innovation which could only please the people. And what are the people? Shall we tell them?

The people are the muscle and strong sinews which have raised the country to a pitch of greatness. They are also the intelligence which has directed them; done more for England than her hundred kings; filled the waters with her ships; spread civilisation and commerce, and planted nations in the remotest corners of the world.

Let those who affect to ignore their honest sympathies and feelings, consider what would be the result if our long-suffering people were to imitate the example of some continental nations.

Meanwhile the system precedent and routine have established, continues to drag on. Promotion, Westminster Abbey, or the Bath, for the officer; ninepence a day, or Chelsea Hospital, for the brave soldier.

Ten to one, had Sergeants Smith and Burgess lived, but such would have been their recompense.

Thrice did the buglers sound the call for the 52nd to advance, and nobly was the signal answered. With a hearty, true British cheer, the serried columns dashed forward and carried the gate, scattering the rebels who defended it before them like a flock of terrified sheep; and before nightfall the assailants found themselves in possession of the enemies' line of works from the water bastion to the Cabul Gate.

The city yet remained unwon; the lion had planted his paw upon his prey, but it still struggled desperately to free itself. The sepoys, knowing the fate that awaited them, fought on the following morning, when the contest was renewed, with all the courage of despair; for what mercy could they expect who had shown none? From street to street the battle raged, the wild yells, the maddening cries and fearful imprecations, by which the infuriated Hindoos sought to excite each other, were answered only by a single word from the British; but that word had a spell in it, which nerved each heart and hand. "Cawnpore!" from rank to rank it was repeated in the deep stern tones of retribution. If the avenging column paused beneath the shower of grape and missiles, poured on them from the roofs of every house and palace, their hesitation lasted but for an instant; the name of "Cawnpore!" was shouted forth, and, with terrible determination, they resumed their march, tracing their path in blood and flames.

It was evening before the men rested from the work of slaughter, and not then, until a breach had been effected in the magazine, which was taken at daybreak by a detachment of the 01st; the gallant fellows sprang forwards with such fury to the charge, that the sepoy artillerymen dropped their lighted port-fires, and fled without discharging their guns.

Six heavy pieces, loaded to the muzzles with grape, commanded the breach.

On the following morning the Bank and its extensive grounds, formerly the residence of the Begum Sumroo and her adopted son, the unhappy Dyce Sombre, fell into the possession of the British, and enabled them to bring their guns to bear upon the bridge of boats and the palace. On the same day the Jumma Musjid was stormed, and the adjutant-general of the army reported to government the capture of 206 pieces of artillery, besides enormous quantities of shot, shell, percussion-caps, and other warlike matériel. But this prize had not lightly been won. Eight officers, 162 rank and file, and 103 native soldiers, had been killed; fifty-two officers, 510 rank and file, and 310 natives had been wounded. One-third of the entire storming party had been rendered unfit for service; but the survivors were sufficient to complete the occupation of the city and suburbs by the evening of the 20th.

"Spare the women and children!" Nobly were the words of the general responded to by his excited soldiers, who, maddened by no common wrongs—stung where Englishmen are most sensitive, in their affections—their homes, their wives, and little ones, stayed their red hands, and respected the lives of those who, in few instances, had shown pity to their own sex or helpless infancy. But to the men no quarter was given. Without a word from the conquerors, the bayonet did its work; thousands fell, and yet they appeared untired. In the assault and taking of Delhi the cruelty, perjury, and treason of the pampered Sepoys were terribly avenged.

Amongst the regiments which had taken part in the tremendous struggle, the 01st was not the least distinguished. Led by its veteran colonel, who twice had his horse shot under him, it bore the brunt of the attack upon the arsenal, where Sir Charles ultimately fixed his quarters. Completely worn out by the fatigues of the day, the old soldier and the major were about to snatch, if possible, a few hours' repose on the rough couch of war which our hero, with the assistance of Jack and Caleb, had prepared for them, when Dr. Burke rushed into the hall in a state of most joyous excitement.

"What has occurred?" demanded the baronet, calmly resuming his sword.

"Nothing: that is, nothing to alarm or regret, but, on the contrary, to rejoice at. India may truly be termed a land of wonder—its miracles will never cease—the dead have returned to life."

"Bah!" exclaimed Plinlimmon, testily; "that passes even your skill."

"But not the goodness of Providence," replied the worthy man. "Wharton—"

On hearing the name of his friend, Richard started from the ground, on which he had thrown himself. His heart divined the rest.

A hearty shout from the guard at the entrance of the building was heard, and the next instant the young officer made his appearance, still wearing the disguise in which he had accomplished his perilous journey; Absal followed, his loyalty to the English wonderfully increased by the sight of the half-won city.

Then followed the warm pressure of friendly hands and words of congratulation, interrupted by questionings and exclamations of wonder at his miraculous escape.

Wharton concluded his narration by pointing to his companion as his preserver.

"Gallant fellow!" said the major, placing his heavy hand on the shoulder of the Hindoo; "I for one feel myself his debtor."

"So are we all," observed the colonel, in a tone somewhat less enthusiastic, for he had detected the quiet smile of his officer. "His reward shall not be wanting. Would all his countrymen had been equally faithful."

"Have I not eaten the Company's salt?" replied the ex-soubahdar; "whose dog am I that I should forget it? As for the rebels," he added, "they are asses and the sons of asses, to dream of resisting the Feringhees. Fools! dolts! idiots! they are rightly served."

The old man concluded his tirade by a series of not very complimentary remarks respecting the wives and mothers of the rebellious sepoys, the usual manner in the East of expressing the most profound contempt.

"Alas!" said Wharton, when the party had recovered from their joyous surprise, "to think that I should arrive too late to share in the glories of victory."

"Too late!" repeated Plinlimmon, "not an hour, not a minute: there is plenty of work yet to be done. To-morrow will prove as warm a day as any that have preceded it. One hour in Delhi will suffice to win an age of glory."

"What would I not give for my uniform!" muttered the cornet, in a tone of vexation.

His wish was gratified: Jack Manders procured him one, stripped from the body of an officer who had fallen in the attack upon the Jumma Musjid.

At the first dawn of day the contest was renewed. True, the rebels no longer fought with the hope of victory to sustain them—that had long since deserted them; but they fought for their lives—fought like wild beasts surrounded in their lair, with no chance of escape.

A portion of the palace still held out, although the phantom monarch and his sons, accompanied by the ministers of their cruelties, had fled to the tomb of Hoomayoon, from which retreat they were eventually dragged by the gallant Hodson of the Guides. The life of the king, on account of his great age, was spared, together with the begums Zenat Mehal; but the three princes, his sons, and grandson, who had commanded the massacre of helpless women and children, and gloried in their shame, were shot like dogs, and their felon carcasses exposed in the Kotwalee, or Mayor's court, like those of any ordinary criminals.

During the last eventful day, Wharton found ample occasion to distinguish himself by his cool, determined courage. Where the fight was hottest, the carnage reddest, the young soldier might be seen, eliciting by his intrepidity the cheers of his men, who felt proud of their quiet but resolute leader.

It was in the palace of the Great Mogul, in the Dewan-i-Khas, celebrated throughout the world for its splendours and vainglorious inscription:

"If Paradise be on the face of earth, Here it is, here it is, here it is!"

which our own poet Moore has so beautifully rendered, that he and Dawlish first met; the latter, having been placed in command of one of the outposts, was ignorant of his return, and the meeting proved fatal to him. He and a party of the 01st were clearing the hall when the cornet, at the head of his detachment, entered through the blazing portals. Surprise at the unexpected apparition of one whom he deemed dead, suspended for an instant the arm of the duellist. That instant proved fatal to him; the tulwar of the sepoy he was contending with struck him down. The wound was mortal.

Long ere the day had closed, India had received a terrible lesson from the Saxon sword. The doomed city was won, and the royalty of the race of Timour numbered with the pageants of the past.

It must have been a glorious sight to have seen the stern victors in that gorgeous hall, which still shone resplendent with barbaric pearl and gold, the scene of so many crimes; to have heard them as they raised the shout of victory, which thousands of voices caught and repeated; even the dying joined in it, and as life ebbed from them felt that their lives had not been spent in vain, for Delhi was won, and Cawnpore in part avenged. We say in part, for never can retribution be deemed complete while the monster who commanded it still lives to pollute the earth by his blood-stained tread.

With the fall of the city of the Mogul the task of General Wilson was accomplished. Worn in health by the exertions and anxieties he had undergone, he resigned the command to Brigadier Penny. Not only the general, but many of his officers—some severely wounded, others broken in constitution, were invalided home to England; amongst others Sir Charles Fourreau and Fred Wharton—the latter having received, at the very close of the struggle, a bullet in the chest, which, for some days, threatened to prove fatal.

The parting between their colonel and the 01st was a sad one; and neither Lady Bell nor Lillian, deeply as they rejoiced in the prospect of once more seeing England, could restrain their tears as the men crowded round their carriage and cheered them on their departure.

Sir Charles, who was seated beside them—for Burke had positively forbidden him to mount on horseback—called for the colours. They were brought him. The gallant veteran silently pressed them to his lips as his adieu to the regiment he had so long commanded and gallantly led.

The journey, in the distracted state of the country, necessarily proved a slow one. Several weeks elapsed before the party reached Calcutta.

"Thank Heaven!" murmured Lady Bell, as the city of palaces rose to her sight; "though we have much to mourn for, those we love have been spared."

Lillian regarded our hero, Rose her husband, and both mentally repeated her words. As for Manders, Caleb, and Lieutenant Marsh, they had escaped unhurt. The former often repeated to himself the lines of the song the old sailor, Bunce, used to sing to him—

"There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft,
And keeps watch for the life of poor Jack."

On reaching the once gay capital of India, the travellers found the city greatly changed. Frivolity and pleasure were no longer the order of the day; serious and more worthy feelings had taken their place. The storm which had so lately passed over the land—whose distant thunders were still heard menacingly—had left too many traces in its track, and desolated too many homes, for lighter thoughts to fill the hearts of its inhabitants; the lessons of adversity, though hard to learn, leave wholesome witness of their teaching.

Adversity, sage, useful guest,
Severe instructor, but the best;
It is from thee alone we know
Justly to value things below.—SOMERVILLE.

As our readers may naturally suppose, the first inquiries of the party were for the Chutnees.

The jealous husband, they were informed, lay at the point of death; and every one spoke in the highest terms of the untiring devotion with which his young and beautiful wife watched over him.

"How like Zamora!" exclaimed Lady Bell, in a tone of admiration. "Such conduct is the only vengeance a heart like hers can take."

That same evening she wrote to inform her friend of her arrival. Wharton was the bearer of the note. For reasons which all who have loved can easily divine, our hero felt no inclination to quit the side of Lillian.

"It will, indeed, be a glad surprise," observed Sir Charles, "for rumour, I find, has been busy with her idle tongue. Our friends here are reported dead."

Richard thought of his grandfather, and the pang which the intelligence he well knew must have inflicted on the old man's heart.

Entering his palanquin, the messenger set out at once for the residence of Mr. Chutnee, where the last painful scene of a selfish life was drawing to its close.

Herbert Chutnee knew that he was dying. On quitting the world he expressed but one regret; it was not for the wealth he must resign, though it had been the toil of years to amass it; it was the thought of leaving his young and beautiful wife that haunted him, and made the grave appear so terrible. Could he have taken Zamora with him—immured her in some cell, or have assured himself that she would never betow her hand upon another, the old man would have felt comparatively happy; death would have lost its sting. Each time she approached to minister to his wants, he importuned her upon the subject—implored her with the fevered eloquence of insanity—for there was madness as well as selfishness in the request—to make him but one promise—never again to become a wife.

Failing to extort it, the dying man became moody and thoughtful.

On the same evening that Wharton arrived with the note from Lady Bell, he had directed his servants, during the absence of their mistress, to remove him from his bed, and wheel him in an easy chair into the saloon, where he awaited the return of his wife. There was a fearful determination in his eye, which startled her, when she entered the room. Still, she was far, very far, from suspecting the terrible scene about to follow. Her husband had resolved to make one last appeal to her weakness and unprotected position.

It was listened to in silence.

"All my wealth," he added, after indulging in the usual strain of passionate entreaties, "shall be yours if you comply. Will you see me die despairing—wretched?"

Mrs. Chutnee answered him only by her tears. She felt it was a request he had no right to make, and a secret monitor in her young heart warned her not to yield.

"Another's!" muttered the jealous husband; "she will live to be another's!"

"Those are not the thoughts," sobbed the youthful victim, who was still a girl in years, "which should possess your heart at such a moment. Let me pray with you, Herbert."

"Useless! useless!" repeated the merchant, with bitter energy; "they burn—consume me! Is this he return," he added, "for a love like mine! A word would calm my agonies, and you will not speak to. Ungrateful—"

"Not that word," interrupted Zamora, with calm dignity, "lest you force me to remind you of the means which made me yours."

"Promise me!" said her husband, sternly.

"Never, Herbert; never!"

This positive refusal appeared to nerve him with momentary strength. Starting to his feet, he caught up a pistol from a pile of Indian weapons near him, and held it to the fair brow of his wretched wife.

"What would you do?" she exclaimed: "die with a murder on your soul?"

"I care not!" shouted the maniac, for such it is only charitable to suppose he had become. "Mine in life—mine in death!"

Before the wretched man could execute his villainous design, a grasp of iron was placed upon his arm, and the pistol wrenched from his grasp by

Fred Wharton, who, from the adjoining room, had been an involuntary listener to all that passed.

Mrs. Chutnee had fainted.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the young officer, indignantly; "have you forgotten there is a God? fear you not to brave Him so near the judgment-seat?"

With a cry of mingled rage and disappointment, the baffled murderer sank back a corpse.

Having replaced the pistol on the stand of arms, Wharton summoned the servants, and directed them to assist their mistress.

"Not a word! oh, not one word of this!" murmured Zamora, as she was being led from the apartment. "Let the memory of this hour be buried with him."

A look from her preserver gave the promise demanded.

The merchant having died intestate, a considerable portion of his wealth reverted, of right, to the widow, who nobly rejected it, however, in favour of his relatives. She had already sufficient fortune, and bitter experience had proved to her how little gold could contribute to real happiness.

On hearing of her loss, if loss it might be termed, Lady Bell and Lillian at once proceeded to her residence, and remained with her till they sailed for England.

Zamora accompanied them.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.—CHRONOLOGY.

It is not possible for us to arrive at any just conception of the progress of the world's history, without entering, in some measure, on a kindred study,—namely, that of chronology. We must have some knowledge of the succession of time, and of the different computations of time common amongst the kingdoms and nations of the earth. The revolutions of one age often give rise to, and are connected with, those of another. We can form, therefore, but a very confused notion of the rise and fall of empires, or the establishment of republics, without some general comprehension of the grand current of time. Just as it is important for us to know the position of the various parts of the earth where the great events of history have taken place, so it is equally essential that we should become acquainted with the exact period at which they occurred. It is not enough for us to know that the Normans conquered England; we want to know the relative position of England and Normandy, and the time at which the conquest was achieved; otherwise, the bare information of the fact would enable us to form but a very inadequate conception of its character or importance.

In acquainting ourselves with the leading principles of the science of chronology, we need enter into no philosophical speculation as to the common definition of time. Let it suffice that our idea of time is that of the general course of things, as considered in the past, the present, or the future. When two events occur at different periods, it is evident that there must be an interval between them, and this we very properly call a space of time. In taking account of things past, it is clear to the mind that they are distinct from each other by intervals of various length. When these intervals come to be compared, some of them appear longer than others, and these longer being considered as double or triple the shorter, we get the notion of measuring one portion of time by another.

But then when we come to apply these measures to time, as it runs on in continual succession, or is already past and gone, we find ourselves lost in an immeasurable depth, and meet with no boundary. This makes it necessary to fix upon some determinate point or points in this infinite duration, from which, as from a beginning, the various measures of time may be measured either backwards or forwards. Accordingly, several terms of this kind have been devised by different nations, they selecting some event, which they deem of particular importance as a starting point, from which to calculate other periods. These are called epochs or eras, as being a kind of resting-place for the mind from which to commence its computation.

The original divisions of time were naturally suggested by the recurrence of day and night. Days were subsequently combined into systems; into weeks, months, and years, all founded on the appearance of the heavenly bodies. The phases of the moon, the apparent motion of the sun, directing mankind to such combinations as corresponded to these changes.

The first and most simple combination is what we call a week, instituted to perpetuate the memory of the creation. It is observable that not only the Jews—to whom this institution was revealed by the Divine Being—but the Syrians, also the Egyptians, and most of the Oriental nations made use of this division of time into weeks.

The next considerable division of time is into months. These, at their first institution, regarded chiefly the lunar motions, and were, accordingly, regulated by them. It is not necessary that we should enter here into the difference between lunar and calendar months. The former, those which are measured by the revolution of the moon, and the latter, by an artificial arrangement, made to consist of thirty or thirty-one days, so as to complete a year in twelve instead of thirteen months.

The last and greatest division of time founded on the motion of the heavenly bodies is the year. This is computed according to the annual revolution of the earth round the sun. The most ancient form of the year is that which divided it into 360 days. This, however, was an error of more than five days; a period which would rapidly shift the seasons so as to bring the harvest into the spring, and the seed-time into autumn. An error of this kind was too considerable to pass unobserved. Accordingly, five days were added. On this footing, Thales is said to have instituted the Grecian year; but that form did not hold long among the Greeks; they, on account of their festivals, preferring the luni-solar year. This consisted of only 354 days; and, consequently, fell short of the true solar course by eleven days. To guard against the beginning of the year being shifted backward through the seasons, rules of intercalation were contrived to keep this matter as accurate as possible. The Roman year was introduced by Romulus, the founder of Rome; and afterwards reformed by Numa. It was measured by lunar months, with intercalary days. The care of these was committed to the high priest; who, neglecting his trust, let things run to the utmost confusion, insomuch that, in the time of Julius Cæsar, the winter months were fallen back into autumn, and the autumn into summer. Cæsar set about regulating these disorders. In order to restore the seasons to their proper months, he ordered the year in which he begun the reformation to consist of 445 days. This done, he instituted a solar year of 365 days and six hours. As these six hours could not be added to each year, he ordered an additional day every fourth year, that is, one day to be twice repeated, which was the occasion of this year being called Bissextile.

But though the Julian year approached very nearly to the truth, yet it was not astronomically correct. The annual revolution of the earth around the sun, or, as it is called by astronomers, the tropical year, consists of 365 days, five hours, and forty-nine minutes. The Julian year was reckoned at 365 days, six hours, which was, in reality, eleven minutes greater than the truth. This, though of no material consequence in one year, amounts to something considerable in the course of centuries. Thus, in the year 1582, when Pope Gregory set about the reformation of the calendar, it was found that the year had receded ten days, so that the vernal equinox, which should fall on the 21st of March, actually fell on the 11th of March. To remedy this disorder, Pope Gregory ordered ten days to be suppressed, and, to prevent the like variation for the future, instituted a new form of year called the Gregorian, in which, once in 133 years, a day is taken out of the calendar.

The Julian, or old style, as it is called, was used in England till September, 1752, when the Gregorian, or new style, was introduced. This accounts for the difference of eleven days between English and foreign computations, which often perplex the reader of history who is unacquainted with this alteration.

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXII.

"BEFORE you add new words to your vocabulary to-day, Robert," said George, "I should like to speak of a few idioms relating to the portion you last wrote; you may remember it included things relating to fire and fuel, viz., 'Le feu et le chauffage.'"

"We English people are very fond of the fireside, so are the French in their way, but, excepting in the north, their climate makes them less dependent on fire than we are. Moreover, they are not so well supplied with fuel as ourselves. On the French coast opposite to us coal is very generally used, but in the midland and southern departments wood furnishes fuel. This is placed on dogs called chenets, and a large log of wood, denominated a bûche, is placed at the back of the fire. The fireside is called in France 'Le coin du feu,' and the hearth (in the sense of the family rallying-place) 'le foyer.' With the wood fires, poker is not used, but, of course, they are required where coals are burnt. If you look to your vocabulary you will find that a poker is un fourgon, but you must not say, 'Fourgonnez le feu,' for poke the fire, the correct expression is 'Attisez le feu.' Neither, when you order a fire, should you say 'Faites un feu' but 'Faites du feu.' You will find that French people use the word feu for light, thus you will hear them ask (when they want to light their pipes), 'Avez-vous du feu.' They also use the word morte, dead, as well as éteinte, for extinguished; thus, in the old nursery rhyme, they say—

'Ma chandelle est morte,
Je n'ai pas de feu,
Ouvrez moi la porte
Pour l'amour de Dieu.'

In English this would be, 'My candle is out, I have no fire, open the door for the love of mercy.' Observe, I translate Dieu, mercy. According to our views, in French books and conversation the name of the Almighty is too lightly introduced, and this is certainly not 'un modèle à suivre,' a pattern to follow, but a habit to be shunned, and it is to be hoped it will be shunned more and more, for breaking the third commandment is by no means uncommon here, and we have nothing to boast of in this respect.

"Now you shall add to your vocabulary the names of colours, and afterwards write down a few rules for your exercise."

"Adjectives must agree with nouns in number as well as gender; so, Robert, we have to consider what change is necessary in their termination, in order to make them agree when used in the plural. To encourage you, I may just say that the formation of the plural of adjectives is nothing like as difficult as the formation of the feminine; and, as a general rule, the addition of an s to the adjective, either in the masculine or feminine, is all that is requisite. For instance: Grand, masculine singular; grands, masculine plural; grande, feminine singular; grandes, feminine plural. For adjectives in the feminine, this rule has not any exception; but, for some masculine adjectives, we must depart from it.

"Adjectives in au and al form their plural by changing au and al into aux. For instance: Beau (handsome), masculine singular, becomes beaux in the masculine plural; and some adjectives in the masculine singular ending in s or x, remain the same in their plural form. Thus: Gros (big), masculine singular, remains gros in the masculine plural; as does also hideux (hideous), which is the same for both numbers.

"You need hardly be told that, with the exception of un and une (one), all cardinal numbers indicate a plural. These numbers, which are, in fact, numeral adjectives, require no alteration to make them plural; and nouns rather agree with the numerals than make the numerals agree with them. For instance: Trois femmes, three women; six garçons, six boys.

"Now, Robert, we are about to enter Paris."

ON THE SOUND u.

This sound is found in the following words:—but, 1 11 4 butt; amuser, to amuse; mur, wall, &c.

It is also produced by the combination of the following letters:—eu, in gagueure, wager; eue in eue, had (past participle feminine of the verb to have); ue, in laitue, lettuce; ut, in il regut, he received; us, in je regus, I received.

The letter u, with the sound u, is sometimes found represented by ü, with a diæresis, which shows that this letter must be sounded by itself; as in the words 4 1 11 16 7 9 11 Essüi, Antinoüs, &c.

A grave accent is sometimes placed over the letter u, as in the word où, where, but it has no effect upon its pronunciation; it is used only to distinguish one word from another, which is spelt and sounded similarly; thus, où means where, and ou, or.

Thus, the sound u is represented by u, eu, eue; ue, ut, us, ü.

The letter w is sometimes silent, as in the words que, Grecque, &c.; and then, as a silent letter, will be marked with a cipher.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXI.

REFRACTION OF LIGHT (continued).

546. Furnish an illustration of the refraction of light.—A coin placed in a teacup so as to be concealed from the eye, will rise into full view, if the cup be filled with water. The rays i, proceeding to the eye from the silver surface, render the coin visible. The point a, the eye, is then removed further back, so that the edge of the basin obstructs the direct rays, and, of course, the coin is no longer seen. If an attendant carefully pour water into the basin, so that the object is not moved, it will presently, as the water rises in the basin, again become visible. This arises from the refraction of the rays by the water, the image thereby appearing at n instead of m.

Fig. 39.

547. Supposing a ray of light to fall perpendicularly on a refracting surface, does it pass on without experiencing any change of direction?—It does: light is bent most out of its course when it enters the surface very obliquely.

548. Do all transparent substances effect the same change in the course of the light?—They do not; the refracting power of glass is greater than that of water, and the refracting power of the diamond is much greater than that of glass.

549. What is a prism?—A solid piece of glass having three faces, and its ends triangular.

550. What is the use of a prism?—It is used to separate a ray of white light into its component parts; namely, red, blue, yellow, orange, green, indigo, and violet.

551. How are these colours separated?—In consequence of their different refractive powers. Red has the least and blue the most.

552. What is a common LENS, or BURNING GLASS?—It is a circular piece of glass, rounded on both sides, so as to be thicker at the middle than at the edges.

Fig. 40.

553. What is the ordinary effect of a lens upon the rays of light that pass through it?—It concentrates them at a focus.

554. On what line is this focus situated?—On the line passing from the luminous point through the centre of the lens.

555. When the rays are parallel, or come from a distant point, what is the point of concentration called?—The Focus of the Lens; and the distance from the lens to the focus is called the Focal Distance or Focal Length of the lens.

MICROSCOPES.

556. What is a pocket microscope?—It is a small lens, with which minute objects may be magnified.

557. Suppose we wish to magnify the letters of a book, in what position must the microscope be held?—Between the eye and the open page of the book, and so near the page that the letters shall be in the focus of the lens.

558. How does a pocket microscope magnify objects?—It enables us to see them distinctly at a shorter distance than we can with the naked eye.

559. How can the letters of a book, or any small object, be magnified without the use of a lens?—By looking closely at them through a small hole pricked in a card with a needle.

560. When the magnified image of an object is formed in the air, and the image is received on a white screen, what is the consequence?—The light from the object is spread over a larger space, and the image appears indistinct.

561. How can it be rendered distinct?—By throwing a strong light upon the object, and darkening the room.

562. What two ways are there of accomplishing this?—One is by concentrating the light of the sun upon the object; when this is done, the magnifying lens becomes a Solar Microscope.

563. Where is the microscope placed?—In a tube, and one end of the tube is screwed into a hole in a window-shutter of a darkened room.

564. How is the light of the sun thrown upon the animalcule that is to be magnified?—A mirror on the outside of the window throws it upon a large lens within the tube, and this concentrates it upon the object.

THE SHADOW ON THE LIFE OF ALBERT DURER.

THE spring blossoms had just begun to gladden the orchards of Nuremberg, on the 20th of May, 1471, and the birds were carolling in the branches of the trees, when the home of the goldsmith, Durer, was made beautiful by the birth of a child. Joy and gladness were in the hearts of the goldsmith and his pretty wife, Barbara; for they had both coveted the treasure that had thus fallen to them.

His father's only wish was to have him well educated, and then to learn his own art of fashioning delicate articles of jewellery in which he so much excelled, and in the pursuit of these two objects fifteen years of Albert Durer's life passed rapidly away. But the father soon found that his son was aiming at another life than that of a simple goldsmith, and kindly and wisely he suffered him to choose his own art. He permitted him to enter the atelier of Michael Wohlgemuth, where he stayed for three years, imbibing a thorough and earnest love of his profession, which could not fail to result in success. The time having expired, he began to travel through Germany, Holland, and Italy, returning home in 1494, a grave, quiet, thoughtful man ordinarily, but an enthusiast in his profession.

If the goldsmith and his gentle Barbara were proud of their child in his cradle, how much was that pride increased when he came home an acknowledged artist, and with a reputation that older men might well have envied! And, what was better still, not a single trait of his pure and innocent boyhood stained or sullied by his contact with the world. Obedient as ever to their will, he did not oppose when they talked of the daughter of old Hans Frey as his wife, although it was certain he had no inclination for the match.

Agnes Frey was beautiful—that is, she was beautiful as any cold, soulless piece of sculpture might have been, but not beautiful as if a warm, loving woman's heart had beamed out from those perfect features. Her outward beauty charmed the painter's eye, but there was no expression in the face, such as would have made his human heart acknowledge her power, independent of form or feature. But the goldsmith saw nothing but the two hundred florins and the connection with his old friend, Hans Frey; and perhaps he lost sight, for once, of his son's happiness, in the brilliant scheme he fancied he was bringing to pass. And Barbara—how could she think for a moment that every one would not love her Albert even as she did herself.

The bridal morn was ushered in with a weeping sky—too prophetic, alas! of future storms and tempests. The bride, too, was in tears, for something at home had vexed her, and the sisters would not affect a sympathy they did not feel. And the bridegroom did not console her. Indeed, his whole appearance was that of a martyr, rather than a joyous bridegroom.

Barbara watched her precious son, and her heart throbbed with a feeling she could not control. She feared they had been wrong in urging this on; but the fear came all too late.

There was a crowd on leaving the wet porch of the church, and Albert was separated from his bride, so that another hand protected her from the rain. The friends of both families accompanied them home to the small but well-furnished house; but, somehow, there was no sunshine anywhere. Before noon, Albert was at his easel, painting away vigorously, and forgetting that his bride was sitting alone, with her lips compressed, and the signs of discontent and vexation on her pretty face. She called him to the dinner that one of her young sisters had brought, for they did not mean the bride should cook on her wedding day; and after that she left him to find out the meal times by his own hunger. There was thenceforth no warmth or cheerfulness in the dreary house. Agnes sat, sullen and discontented, missing the frequent bickerings with her sisters, and envying them the girlish freedom they enjoyed. They added to her vexation every time she saw them, by taunting her with the grave, cold husband she had chained herself to; and she soon learned to curse the shackles.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, he went again to Italy, where he painted those pictures that best immortalise the name of Albert Durer. Apart from the distressing atmosphere of his home, his spirit grew loftier and more genial. Here he met Raffaele, and the two exchanged portraits. He returned home in 1507, his fame going before him, as the greatest painter of Germany.

There was little perceptible change in Agnes Durer. She had the same feverish frown of discontent, the same dread of poverty which had haunted her married life always, and which was increased by the fear that Albert had spent too much money in Italy.

A new light dawned for a season, even upon this loveless home. That sweetest of all sunshine to a house, a child's smile, beamed across the dull apartment. Even Agnes was moved and touched as by Ithuriel's spear, at this new revelation of her being, this new maternal instinct. Could it have been permanent, their home might yet have been happy. But alas! even over that infant's sweet and innocent face angry words came to Agnes's lips.

She had been unusually violent, and Gabrielle, their child, had been constantly weeping unless in her father's room. The child was now five years old, lovely as any of her artist-father's dreams of angels. He drew her to his bosom one evening, and her hot cheek terrified him. She slept in his arms, but she kept starting, and the veins in her neck throbbed under his touch, and the fevered breath came slowly and painfully. He called Agnes, but she was in a sullen mood, and was long in coming. When at length she came, she did not believe the child ill, and was loth to try the remedies he proposed. There was little time, for Gabrielle grew worse, and after a long, passionate kiss to both, and an ineffectual trial to put their arms around her—as if to hold her to life—she passed onward.

We will not say that the mother's heart was not touched; but she covered the arrow—if indeed it pierced her—and gave no heed to the deep and passionate grief of Durer, to whom the death of Gabrielle had shut out all of life or joy from the world.

There, in a little casket, fashioned after his own thought, quaint, yet simple in form, lay all his happiness. He was crushed, stricken to the earth. His mother came and laid her hand upon his head, and dropped soft tears upon his face, and the strong man melted at once; but he never spoke of Gabrielle again. Nightly he threw a green wreath of fragrant roses or violets upon the little grave; but her name was a sacred and holy secret, deep in his heart of hearts, and never to be sounded by his lips.

The temper of Agnes Durer did not improve by advancing years. Morose, irritable and violent, she did not cease to torment the gentle painter, until at last he had the joy of knowing that he should soon rest beside Gabrielle. She had passed away on the 10th of April, and on that very day and hour, in the year 1528, with words of forgiveness on his lips, to her who should have been his joy in life, his consoler in death, he died.

NOTHING NEW.

"THERE is nothing new!" to me said one,
Gravely quoting Israel's Solomon—
"There is nothing new beneath the sun!"

"Ah! what foolish wisdom this!" I cried.
"Adages are pompous robes that hide
The nothingness of that which goes inside."

"Nothing is new?—No silver second falls
Tinkling through creation's echoing halls,
But something blooms: some voice awakes and calls!"

"Spring, when she floats across the hills and seas,
Hangs not her last year's garlands on the trees
Last autumn's fruits were not the twins of these."

"Nothing is new? Ingenious sophist, go!
Lift up your cradle's coverlet of snow—
Is this the babe you lost so long ago?"

SIR JAMES WATTS.

EVERY one has heard of "the merchant princes" of Manchester. The title is not without a solid foundation. If wealth enters into our idea of a prince, or power, or external display, then may the first merchants of Manchester claim the title of princes. They have yet a better claim. If "princely is that princely does" is a sound maxim, then are they princes of a higher character than some of our territorial and hereditary princes. Manchester is emphatically the seat of social beneficence. The achievement of free trade was the greatest social benefit ever conferred on the world. The establishment of the Art Treasures Exhibition was a yet more disinterested boon. Manchester is the field of free thought and free speech. Nowhere are the prerogatives of the mind more honoured. There, without penalty or reproach, a man may think what he pleases and utter what he thinks. If its atmosphere is somewhat humid and murky, its mental breezes are fresh, genial, and fostering. It fails, indeed, to encourage the higher learning as it should do; but the intellectual interests of its busy population are cared for in a truly wise and liberal spirit. The credit lies with its "merchant princes," whose donations of hundreds, and even thousands, of pounds never fail to come forth when called for by some noble enterprise of social benevolence.

To this class of men belongs the subject of this biographical notice. You are, reader, let it be supposed, in the centre of commercial Manchester. Having gone from the Cathedral up Market-street, you see at the top, on your right hand, the vast pile of masonry denominated the Infirmary, presenting little of beauty but suggesting much of good. Passing round the southern end of the building, you stop to contemplate on your left hand and on your right, and in your front, lines of warehouses whose magnitude excites astonishment. If you have "a Manchester man" for a companion, he will tell you that these huge structures cannot bear a comparison with similar structures that have lately risen or are now rising in different parts of the district in which you stand, and which, by their stately beauty and wondrous size, are rapidly converting the city into a cluster of mercantile palaces. Going a little forward in your walk, you are struck with a towering edifice of high architectural pretensions, which on your left hand lines almost half a street. "What is that splendid building?" you ask. "The recently erected warehouse of Messrs. S. and J. Watts," you are told. "Warehouse, did you say? do they build warehouses in that style?" "Yes; but let us go across and enter; the interior surpasses the exterior in taste as well as accommodation—you will find it perfect." You do as you are requested, and are introduced to two of the most enterprising, successful, opulent, and unassuming of men.

It is not unusual in Manchester, especially when, as in the instance before us, the partners are brothers, for one, probably the senior, to make the business his special, if not exclusive care; while the younger, without neglecting business (which "cotton lords" never do), spares time for objects of public utility. Under this arrangement the subject of this notice has been enabled to take part in political and social concerns, in the furthering of which he has done himself credit and served the public. Sir James Watts was born in 1805, in the parish of Manchester. From the age of four he lived at Barnage, near that city, in the house the family had inhabited for several generations. His father and grandfather were farmers and manufacturers. Longevity is a characteristic of the family. Sir James's father lived till he was ninety-three, his grandmother till she was ninety-two, and his grandfather reached a hundred and three. Sir James received his education chiefly at a school conducted by Mr. Hampson, in Gravel-lane, Salford. At a very early age he went to London, to acquire a knowledge of the general drapery business. Returning thence to Manchester, he joined his brother, with whom he had previously been engaged. He then went to Ashton, commencing business on his own account; but afterwards returned to his brother's establishment in Deansgate, Manchester. In 1834 the firm—then S. and J. Watts—removed to Brown-street; in 1844 it settled in Fountain-street; and in 1858 it took possession of the premises it now occupies in Portland-street. Sir James married Margaret Anne, daughter of Nathaniel Buckley, Esq., of Carr Hill. He has been twice unanimously elected Mayor of Manchester; was one of the Executive Committee of the Art Treasures Exhibition; is in religion a nonconformist of the Independent denomination, and in politics a liberal. In him Sunday schools, with which he has been connected above thirty years, find an active and generous supporter. On retiring from his second mayoralty, Sir James received the acknowledgments of the Corporation, conveyed to him in the most flattering terms.

The brightest period of Sir James Watts's life is connected with the Art Treasures Exhibition. It was fortunate for him that the event took place during his period of office. Entering cordially into the enterprise, he spared no trouble to make it successful. It was only proper that he, the public representative of the city, should share in the honours of the occasion. Accordingly he was knighted by her Majesty when she opened the exhibition, and he entertained at his residence her royal husband; when he declared the exhibition closed. That exhibition is, and will probably long remain, unparalleled among instructive undertakings. Public opinion naturally called for some token of gratitude towards those, by whose earnest and judicious exertions it had been, from first to last, so successfully conducted. As the representative of that opinion, the municipality of Manchester entered in its archives the following declaration, which, we understand, is to be supported by the presentation of a piece of plate to each member of the Executive Committee—

"Resolved unanimously,—That this council is deeply impressed with the great advantages conferred upon this city, and the community at large, by the recent Exhibition of Art Treasures of the United Kingdom, an exhibition of works of art unrivalled in magnitude and value, the examination and study of which were eminently calculated to improve the knowledge and elevate the taste of all visitors; and by bringing together different classes not accustomed to associate, to promote goodwill and kindly feeling amongst all sections of the people. That gratefully acknowledging the munificent liberality with which the heavy expenses to be incurred were originally guaranteed, as also the noble manner in which the applications made for the loan of works of art were responded to by the contributors, this council feels called upon, as representing and on behalf of the citizens of Manchester, in an especial manner to tender its most sincere and cordial thanks to Thomas Fairbairn, Esq., the chairman, Sir James Watts, Thomas Ashton, William Entwistle, Joseph Heron, Edmund Potter, and Sigismund J. Stern, Esqs., the members of the Executive Committee, for their disinterested and arduous labours; for the untiring zeal and unremitting attention which, during so lengthened a period, they devoted to the undertaking; for the judgment and ability which characterised all their proceedings and arrangements, and which so largely contributed to render completely successful the most memorable exhibition of modern times, conferring lasting fame and honour upon the city in which it has been held."

THE HOLY CITY.

How far back in the annals of the world does the history of Jerusalem extend; and how eventful is the history of that great city! Its glory has now departed—

"Her tale of splendour now is told and done;
Her wine-cup of festivity is spilt;
And all is o'er—her grandeur and her guilt."

Once she was "the joy of the whole earth," but now "her house is left unto her desolate," her condition forcibly recalling the complaint of Jeremiah—"The city sits solitary that was full of people. She is become as a widow. She that was great among the provinces has become tributary: her gates are desolate—all her beauty is departed."

Jerusalem is supposed to be the city of Melchizedek, King of Salem, in the time of Abraham. When the Israelites entered the promised land they found Jerusalem occupied by the Jebusites, and they fought against it, "and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire." But not till the time of David were the Jebusites finally dislodged. After their entire expulsion Jerusalem became the metropolis of his empire. Solomon enlarged and improved the city. He built the Holy Temple and a royal palace. But by the Babylonian invasion all his works were destroyed, and the people carried away captive. Under the superintendence of Nehemiah and Zerubbabel the city and temple were rebuilt about seventy years after. At a later period an army under Ptolemy Soter sacked the city, and enslaved a large number of its inhabitants. Still later, the Macedonians, who had usurped authority in the land, attempted to introduce pagan worship into the Holy City, but were bravely repulsed by the Maccabees. Finally, the Roman eagles made a deadly swoop upon the city; and after a period of assalage—a period which had witnessed the fulfilment of that prophecy, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come"—the kingdom of Judah was brought to an end, and a dreadful vengeance taken by the Romans on the rebellious Jews. Jerusalem was overthrown; not one stone was left upon another. A great part of the ground on which it stood was ploughed up, and a Roman town was built on the site.

But the interest attaching to Jerusalem could not be quenched in the minds of either Jews or Christians. To both it was a holy city. While the Jew mourned over the city where David lived, the heart of the Christian was wrung because it was the place where the great Son of David died. The Jew thought of the crown, the Christian of the Cross; and both mourned that the heathen should hold possession of the country and city in which the sympathies of both were so entirely centred.

Jerusalem, in name, at least, was restored by the zealous Helena, and no efforts were spared to render it the metropolis of Christendom. But its period of prosperity soon ended. The Mohammedans seized upon it, demanded tribute of all pilgrims, erected a mosque on the site of the temple; and, by their repeated cruelties and oppressions aroused the resentment of all Christian princes.

Thus originated the crusades. Returning from their fatigues and sufferings, the pilgrims narrated the injuries they had sustained; and all over Christendom furious indignation was felt against the infidels who profaned the Holy City by their presence, and derided the sacred mysteries of Christianity even in the very place of their completion.

Peter, commonly called the "Hermit," had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. He had witnessed the sufferings of the Christians in the East. He longed for power sufficient to defend them or to drive out the infidel possessors of the land. He communicated his desire to the Pope, who entered heartily into his scheme. Peter began to preach the crusade, and, with his great heart on fire, kindled the chi-valorous spirit of that age. At Clermont, in Auvergne, the Pope assembled a council, and when he had ended his pathetic exhortation the whole assembly, as with one voice, cried out "It is the will of God!"—words that formed the battle cry in many a subsequent engagement. The sign of the cross was the badge of union. Nobles, artisans, peasantry, priests enrolled their names and enlisted under the Christian banner, impatient to open, by the sword, a way to the holy city. The aged and the sick contributed to the necessary expenses; women disguised as men joined the camp; all things else were neglected or forgotten, and every day the multitude of adventurers increased.

It is not our purpose to trace the history of the crusades. They were attended with varying, but with no positive, success. Much blood was shed, much money spent, much misery occasioned, and the object for which this war was undertaken was not accomplished after all. But the dauntless bravery exhibited on many occasions by the Christian champions is thoroughly characteristic of the chivalry of that age, and shows—right or wrong—that these mail-clad heroes were thoroughly in earnest. Again and again the crusade was renewed under different leaders. Godfroi de Bouillon figures conspicuously amongst the number. In 1099 the army of crusaders reached Jerusalem, and Godfroi erected his standard on Mount Calvary. The time of the siege was fulfilled in forty days of calamity and anguish, during which the soldiers suffered intensely from hunger and thirst. At length on a Friday—said to be the day and hour of the Crucifixion—Godfroi stood victorious on the walls of Jerusalem. His example was followed on every side by those who were his rivals in valour; and, about four hundred and sixty years after the conquest of Omar, the Holy City was rescued from the Mohammedan yoke.

"All in a moment through the gloom were seen
Ten thousand banners rising in the air
With orient colours waving. With them rose
A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
Appeared, and serried shields in thick array,
Of depths immeasurable."

A bloody sacrifice was offered to Heaven; resistance might provoke, but neither age nor sex could mollify the implacable rage of the conquerors. They indulged for three days in a promiscuous massacre, and the infection of the dead bodies produced an epidemic disease.

After the capture of Jerusalem, the Latin kingdom was established in Palestine; but ninety years afterwards Jerusalem was retaken, and the Christians and other inhabitants reduced to a terrible subjection. Ever since, the Turks have held possession of the Holy City, and the green flag of the prophet still floats over its sacred places.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XCV.

'Tis not a set of features, or complexion,
The tincture of a skin, that I admire:
Beauty soon grows familiar to the lover—
Fades in his eyes, and palls upon the sense.

ADDISON.

HOPE sat down with her desk before her, and wrote as follows:—

"My own dear Larky Grigg,—You will be surprised at seeing a letter from me, for you know I feel a little shy about writing to you, because the letters have to go into my lord's bag, and pass through so many hands, and so many cold eyes look at the one loved name, and so many mocking lips read it, and perhaps comment on my writing to you, and guess at the treasured secret of our hearts, dear love, and perhaps ridicule our hopes, talk over our plans, and sneer at those sweet prospects, which are our solace and delight. For this reason, I debar myself from the happiness of writing to you as my heart dictates. But to-day I have no choice, dear Larky, for I gave you a promise, and I cannot feel happy till I have fulfilled it, although in doing so I feel a sort of shame and dread; shame lest you should think it possible I have in the slightest degree courted, or can ever for a moment regret, the grand offers made to me; and dread lest you should feel any pain at the thought (one which I know will haunt you, dearest, though it is a mistaken one, believe me), that what I have refused is nobler or better than what you will one day bestow upon me.

"Well, then, to the point, dear Larky, although it seems so much like a fairy tale—'Cinderella' especially—that I can scarcely believe as I write it that it is not a dream, or one of those old romances I used to read to my lady when she was so ill, in Carlton-terrace.

"Since we came here we have been very intimate, not only with the young Captain Greville I told you of, who came on a visit, and whom we all supposed to be Agnes's admirer, but the Marquis of Doun, having arrived at Castle Doun (a very grand place a few miles off) with his sister, Lady Stella de Hauteville, and a large party of fine gentlemen and ladies, we very soon became intimate at the castle, the marquis and Lady Stella having been well known when they were very young to my lord and my lady, who were very old friends of their noble parents, the late marquis and marchioness.

"Now, ever since we have been here, my lady has been most kind, and has treated me more like her own child than a hired companion; and when the marquis and his sister—who is a very handsome, stately lady, older than himself—invited me to join in the gaieties at the castle, thinking, perhaps, that, like Agnes, I was a young lady on a visit, my Lady Glenlonely would have me go; and, for the first time in my life, dear Larky, I mixed with ladies and gentlemen as one of themselves, and had polite attentions paid to me, and fine speeches addressed to me; and my lady, who is a little romantic, and fond of matchmaking—as most fine ladies are—began to talk to me of girls who, as she said, had 'played their cards well, and married far above them;' and whispered laughingly to my lord that King Cophetua loved the beggar girl! and my lord reminded her of the agreement with your dear mother, Apple Blossom, and mine, and Mr. Goodman, that I was not to be thrown in the way of gay gentlemen; and my lady laughed, and said she would take care I came to no harm, and did not lose my heart to any young coxcomb; and then she took me to her own room, and gave me all sorts of pretty ornaments, and flowers, and laces; and as there was to be a grand ball at the castle, she made me sit down and write to her own milliner for a dress—such a beauty, Larky!—white tarlatan, five skirts, over white silk, and looped up with the same; and blue and silver flowers in my hair; I really do not think you would have known me, Larky. It did make such a difference in me! And Nussy Fitz-Darrell, whose dresses are always admired—she has them from Paris—was very cross with me, for she so wanted me to be dressed like herself, in amber satin, and had gone to the expense of the satin to make me a dress like hers; but my lady said it was a preposterous idea, and that with my golden hair I, in amber satin, should look like a sunflower! But she told me, aside, she thought Nussy wanted me not to look well. But I cannot think that she could be so mean, as she is always trying to do my hair like hers (a l'Eugénie), which is a great deal of trouble—only my lady cannot bear it, and has forbidden me to let her do it; and Nussy is always lending me ornaments and dresses of hers, which I am not allowed to put on; and she seems so anxious to set me off, and deck me out, I cannot think she had any but a kind intention about the amber satin, and the bugle lace, and the wreath of gold flowers. Indeed, when she found she had gone to so much trouble and expense for nothing, she cried. Oh, I am sure, Larky, that she meant to set me off to the best advantage, and it was only a mistake in judgment, or a want of taste. But my lady, who does not like Nussy quite as much as she did, said, 'No, that she has exquisite taste in her own dress, and knew very well that what suited her, with her dark hair and eyes, and small pale face, and tall, slender figure, could not suit me too; that she is certain she wanted me not to look pretty at the Castle ball;' and then my lady called her a vain, envious, designing coquette, who was afraid of a rival—as if I could ever be a rival to any one! Poor little Hope! a ragged-school child, to whom it was a great rise in life to be made companion to a fine lady—a girl who has not a penny she does not earn, or rather, owe to charity—for what do I do to earn anything? Dear Larky, you, brave lad (who know what it is to earn), can answer that. But my lady will have it so, and I can see that she has taken the idea from an old novel, called 'The Rival Belles; or, the Brunette and the Blonde.' However, the result was that my dress from my lady's milliner, though only of white tarlatan, was the most beautiful in the world, and so becoming! You would not have known me. And it made me look so nice, and so like a lady, that I had more partners than any one else, and my lord marquis, thinking, I dare say, to please my lady and dear Lady Arnelcliffe, who did not dance (she never does), opened the ball with your poor little Hope! Think of that, Larky—the most noble the Marquis of Doun leading off at a ball, at his own grand castle, with that little Hope Evermore who used to trot off with you and dear Merry to the Green Fields Ragged School, where kind Mr. Stephen so tried to teach us all that was good and useful, and where Mr. Goodman helped him in that arduous Christian labour of love; the same Hope that used to nestle in dear Mother Apple Blossom's kind bosom, and sit on Father Blossom's knee, and kneel down at night to pray with you, dear Larky, by your little sofa bed. Here was little foster-sister Hope, through the kindness of my lord and my lady, the condescension of the marquis, and those fine feathers which we all know do make such fine birds, called (how shall I tell you without a blush, and where shall I hide that blush, and you so far away, Larky?), yes, called the 'Queen of the Ball,' and (can you believe it, Larky?) 'the Belle of the room.' I wish this were all; and I ramble and digress because I do not like to tell you what, yet, to keep my word with you, I must tell. Well, then, Larky, all at once Captain Greville, whom I, in common with every one else, supposed to be in love with Nussy, led me into a conservatory, and there told me he loved me, me only, and in proof of this he made me an offer of his hand. I was much surprised, but more grieved, Larky, for he seemed so miserable, and so disappointed when I told him I never could return his love; and, on his pressing his suit, I owned, oh, Larky, that I loved another. He left me wild with despair, and rushed out into the grounds; and the marquis, entering and finding me alone, actually (oh, Larky! can you believe it? I scarcely can) drew near, and, in a trembling voice, looking very pale, told me that he loved me as never man loved, as he never dreamed that he could love, and kneeling—yes, Larky, kneeling; that great lord kneeling to poor Hope Evermore—offered me his hand, his coronet, his wealth, and begged me to be the angel of his life, the wife of his bosom.

"I was more sorry for him than for Captain Greville, my own darling Larky, because I like him better—he seems more true, more noble, more sincere—and it is a grand, a generous thing for one like him to make such an offer to one like me. But I told him I had no love to give him in return—that my heart was full of another; and I am certain you will believe me, oh, beloved Larky, when I say that I thought with pride, and weeping fondness, and trembling joy, how far superior was he whom I loved, even to this great lord, who would have made me so very great; but could never have made me the least happy.

"To you only, my love, my affianced husband, in fulfilment of my solemn promise exacted by you, I do reveal these (to me) most distressing events. Of course, the captain and the marquis will never mention what, in the result, must be so mortifying to the pride and vanity of the former, and the noble, generous heart of the latter. No one but you, then, my darling, in your acknowledged right to know every event of my life and every secret of my bosom, can ever hear what it has cost me so much to confess, but would cost me much more to conceal from you.

"Write to me, I beg you, in reply, to tell me that you will never give a thought to what I have told you, except as a proof of the fidelity with which any promise made to Larky—her darling Larky—is kept by his grateful, loving

"HOPE."

"P.S. You know that I am in possession of several relics of my dear, unhappy mother; among others, of a journal which she kept before I was born. You will smile at what you used to call the 'patient abiding' of your little Hope, when I tell you that, much as I long to know something of the life, outer and inner, of this, my dearly loved, though unknown mother, I have felt a dread and a delicacy which have made me shrink from opening those pages which may be full of the secrets of a mother's breaking heart. In three days I shall be seventeen, Larky; on that day I shall expect to hear from you, and on that day I shall commence the perusal of my mother's journal. Pray for me, dear Larky; I shall need your prayers."

CHAPTER XCVI.

For love would still be lord of all.—OLD SONG.

HOPE's unworldly and devoted heart was so full of Larky Grigg, and the humble, happy life she longed to lead with her first and only love, that she never gave a thought (still less a regret) to the great destiny she had disclaimed, and the splendours she had so decidedly and so promptly rejected.

Hope had made up her mind that both the offer of Captain Greville, and of the noble marquis, would remain unknown to every one, save that young lover to whom she had felt bound in honour to reveal them.

Hope, in the case of the marquis, reckoned completely without her host; and, indeed, in that of Captain Greville. She little dreamt, when she made so light of a proposal which she attributed to a sudden fancy, arising in a great measure from an imitative disposition in him to admire any one distinguished by so great a man as the marquis—she had no conception, we say, of the real nature of this man, of his passion for her, or the many schemes, plots, and aims of which she was the object.

We have seen the letter Captain Greville addressed to the person he called his uncle, on the subject of Hope, and as the name of that person was Evermore, and he was just returned from a long exile in India, the reader will begin to fear for Hope's future free agency, and to anticipate the sort of tie that (entirely unsuspected by her) exists between the uncle of Rashleigh Greville and the innocent girl whom we have known only as an orphan, and Apple Blossom's foster-child.

To some it would seem a fortunate thing for little Hope Evermore—so long forsaken, neglected, and disowned—that a gentleman should be about to claim her as his daughter, and that, too, at an epoch in her young life when she was becoming so femininely sensitive on the score of her birth and parentage.

But in a reflecting mind the question will arise, What sort of man must this be who could forsake Hope's young and lovely mother, and leave her in her delicate situation to battle with the cold, cold world, and for seventeen years never concern himself at all about the helpless offspring of that most unhappy and ill-used lady?

Such antecedents made it impossible to augur much comfort for Hope in such a father; but the charitable might trust that he had seen his errors and repented of them; and we know that the most hardened heart becomes soft and kind under the influence of a true repentance.

Certainly there was something cold and mysterious in the conduct of Mr. Evermore, even after he had decided on claiming Hope as his daughter. Why did he never take any interest in this lovely and excellent child—of whose existence he must have been cognisant—until a letter from his nephew, Captain Greville, announced that he was at once "over head and ears in debt and in love"?

This letter reached Mr. Evermore on the same morning that news arrived from Lahore that his most intimate friend, Lord Eaglescliffe, in a gallant attack on the enemy, had been surrounded, and that he himself and his whole band of heroes had been butchered.

Mr. Evermore—who, though he maintained the outward appearance of a gentleman, and had contrived to get his nephew into the Company's service, had no ostensible income or property, but lived in a great measure on his wits and on his friend Eaglescliffe—shut himself up for the whole day after the receipt of these two letters. This caused no surprise among his associates, as the death of so intimate a friend, schoolfellow, and college-mate as Lord Eaglescliffe, whom he had influenced all his life—when he was little Pemberton at Eton, and young Pemberton at Oxford, and Pemberton of the—Dragoons, and still more when he was Lord Eaglescliffe, fond of play and pleasure, and wanted some one to take all trouble off his hands; well might the news, sudden and unexpected as it was, unfit Evermore for society—at least, so said the world of Calcutta. There was a general impression that Evermore had not much feeling; but, if he had any feeling at all, he must have been agitated and overcome by the tidings of Eaglescliffe's death.

And yet, could those who said "Poor Evermore! why, even he will feel this deeply," have availed themselves of our privilege and peeped into his chamber, they would have seen few signs of mourning in the face or manner of Mr. Evermore.

He was a tall, elegant man, with fine features, which, in repose, had a sinister expression—shrewd, scowling, and very unlike the same face when animated by a wish to please, to captivate, or to cajole. He was very pale, with very fair hair, dark eyes, deep-set and keen, and which had a curious expression, owing to their very light eyelashes.

Mr. Evermore was a little coxcombical in dress, and had an appearance never seen but in somewhat dissipated men.

The lines of his mouth betokened vanity, cunning, and sensuality; but a fair and silky moustache concealed them, showing only his very even, white, and well-preserved teeth.

He had a fine figure, wonderfully lithe and slender for his age (which age he kept an impenetrable secret).

He had been called to the bar some twenty-five years before, but he had neither interest nor perseverance, and, on the occasion of the only brief he ever obtained, he discovered to his cost that if a lawyer is nothing without a brief, a brief is nothing without a lawyer.

His début at Westminster Hall was, in spite of great natural talent, such a miserable failure, that he wrote to Captain Pemberton, afterwards Lord Eaglescliffe, then at Calcutta with his regiment, begging him to get him an appointment of any kind in India.

Captain Pemberton succeeded in procuring him a sort of agency. The profits were small, and the work light; but board and lodging were part of the remuneration of this office; and the luxurious life and warm climate of India suited Mr. Evermore far better than his small, close chambers and solitary chop.

Over the careless mind of Captain Pemberton (our Ada's brother) this man exercised an irresistible and most baneful influence.

He had a most pernicious habit of laughing at everything.

With a sort of easy, good-humoured grace, and a dangerous sparkle of wit, and vein of humour, he made a jest of everything serious, moral, religious, orderly, and of good report.

Such a companion was destruction to young Pemberton, whose heart he hardened, whose principles he undermined, whose money he borrowed, and whose vices he encouraged. But for Evermore, Captain Pemberton (who was naturally brave, kind, and unselfish) would have been, if not an admirable, at least an estimable man.

Captain Pemberton, under Evermore's influence, became a roué, a gambler, and a free-thinker; and yet his bravery and high spirits made him popular with men, and his fine person and fascinating manners secured him the favour of the unthinking daughters of fashion.

Evermore was, all his life, Pemberton's evil genius, and got him into all sorts of scrapes, but then he got him out of them as readily.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Why did she love him? curious fool, be still;
Is human love the growth of human will?
To her he might be gentleness.—LARA.

EVERMORE was some years older than Captain Pemberton, but he took much better care of himself in every way, and his manner in Pemberton's presence was frank, thoughtless, gay, almost boyish.

All the early secrets of Pemberton's (now Eaglescliffe's) life were known to Evermore, who jokingly said he was both Chancellor of the Exchequer and keeper of the conscience of "The King of Hearts," adding that the latter office was a sinecure, since Eaglescliffe had no conscience to keep.

Eaglescliffe took this as a compliment.

The joke and the way in which it was received showed what these two men were.

But people who knew both believed that even Evermore would miss Eaglescliffe, and mourn for him; those, as we have said (if any such could be), possessed of our ubiquity, would have seen no signs of mourning, beyond a deep black hat-band and a suit of sables in Eaglescliffe's bosom friend, or rather crony, for profligate men have companions and chums, but the virtuous only have true friends.

In his luxurious apartment, where every device to secure a current of air was put in practice, Evermore, his teeth set, his eyes on fire, and his pale face flushed, was surrounded by letters and papers, mostly connected with the long ago, and which had been intrusted to him by Eaglescliffe.

Many of these letters, old-fashioned, and written before envelopes were in use, were in a delicate female hand, the ink brown with time. Some were signed "Constance" only, some "Constance Evermore." There was one, and this, though it was blotted with tears, and in parts almost illegible, Mr. Evermore read with glittering eyes and a smile of triumph. It was the wretched Constance's announcement of her approaching confinement.

"She died in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital," he said to himself, "I have ascertained that; but her child survives; that child must now be seventeen. It is my firm belief that this Hope Evermore of whom Rashleigh is so enamoured, is that very girl; the age tallies; his description of her is a vivid sketch of her too lovely mother. Now, then, I have the game in my own hands: Rashleigh adores this girl, and he shall marry her. Pshaw! what is this?" he said, as he came, in searching for these papers, upon a parchment, with heavy seals attached to it, "Eaglescliffe's will! Oriana, his Indian wife, as he called her, and Selim, her son and his, come in for all his property, with a remainder to me, in case of my surviving them, else I have only a legacy of a few hundreds, which, however, would come in very handy now."

"But Oriana chose, in the passionate devotion of her tropical heart, to follow him with her boy to battle, and the last I heard of both was that a fever, which was decimating the regiment, had attacked them. Should it prove fatal—and what more likely?—I am his heir, and I come into all the wealth Oriana, an Indian princess, brought—only, in that case, he bequeathes his and her jewels to his mother and sister, and his portrait and a diamond ring to an early flame, by this time, I should think, the starchest of old maids, Ellen St. Ange.

"What have I, then, to do?—to ascertain the fate of Oriana and Selim, to prove the will, realise the property, mine, as I fully believe, and then, with more money in my desk than I ever dreamed of possessing, off to England to claim Hope as my daughter, and wed her to Rashleigh, whose reckless young career will, perhaps, be checked by a marriage with a girl he so adores. What ulterior advantages will accrue to him from this match time will prove.

"The only thing I love on earth is Rashleigh; and for him I will brave everything—risk everything. When I tell him to wed the humble girl, the poor companion, the little Hope Evermore he loves, as he thinks, not wisely but too well, he will smile to think she is my child and his cousin; and, when once they are wedded, what will be revealed then will astonish and delight him still more."

Everything seemed to mould itself to the schemer's wishes.

And lo! an authentic account of the death of the beautiful Oriana and her son Selim, a noble boy of ten years old, reached Evermore, in the shape of a letter confided by Eaglescliffe to a native, and written the night before the engagement in which his company was cut to pieces.

As Evermore pondered on the agony of spirit in which these few lines (lines blotted with tears) were traced, he thought it not unlikely that Eaglescliffe had sought death in the hopes of losing the consciousness of his loss. He knew that he loved her whom he called his Indian wife; that a ceremony satisfactory to her conscience had passed between them; and that she was disowned and repudiated, by her own caste, for her union with a Christian (a Christian by name and profession, at least); but he had never mentioned this connection in the few rare and brief letters he wrote to his home.

There was no confidence between him and any member of his family, nor had there been ever since his arrival in India. Ada was a child when he quitted his home in indignation and disgust at his mother's ill-treatment of a young and beautiful girl, a poor companion, though a distant cousin of her own, whom he loved to distraction, and whom she, when she discovered that the young girl returned this affection, drove with remorseless, reckless cruelty, friendless, and almost penniless, into the cold world to provide for herself, having first contrived to send her son on a tour. That son never quite forgave this inhuman conduct, nor its disastrous results.

His father, at that time, as the reader will remember, the victim of habitual intemperance, was, as all such unhappy beings are, without power or influence in their own homes.

He knew nothing that passed, and his son believed he had consented to acts of which he was not even cognisant. To insure (as she thought, in her ignorance of much that had occurred in the interim) her son's final separation from the beautiful loving object of his boyish passion, Lady Pemberton not only got her son into the army, but into a regiment on the point of sailing for India; preferring (in her ambition, her jealousy of her son's affection, and her sudden hatred and implacable revenge against the object of his passion) all the dangers of India and war to those of England, with what she considered an unfortunate and degrading attachment.

And yet the poor companion was a pure-hearted, noble-minded, intellectual, accomplished girl, of gentle birth and breeding, and with no fault of any moment, save that feminine and lovable one of too yielding a temper, and too believing, pitying, and tender a heart.

A wiser woman than was Lady Pemberton at that time, would have seen in the deep and devoted love of her son for this sweet girl, a shield for his young heart, an object in life, a purifying and ennobling influence.

Not so the woman of the world. The vainest, idlest daughter of fashion, if with title and fortune, would have been welcomed and cherished as the future wife of her son, while the poor companion, in spite of all her beauty, her virtues, graces, and love, was grossly insulted, and heartlessly expelled.

Lady Pemberton little thought when she plotted, schemed, cajoled, and manoeuvred to get her son into a "crack" regiment, under orders for India, that what she looked upon as a brief absence, would be come a permanent exile.

Disgusted with his mother's cruelty, his father's indifference to everything, caused by the intemperance at that time habitual with him, tormented by his duns, and perplexed by difficulties in which he had been involved by the machinations of his evil spirit (Evermore), young Pemberton did not refuse to comply with his mother's wish that he should enter the army, and repair to India; but when she wished him to return, she found him an altered man. The life in India suited him; his attachment to Oriana, and his passionate love for his boy, engrossed his heart. Evermore, who was become indispensable to him, was settled at Calcutta. And when Captain Pemberton's regiment was ordered home, he exchanged into another, in order to stay in India.

The news of his father's accession to the peerage, and of the change in his own grand name and brilliant prospects, made no difference in his feelings. War by this time was raging, and Lord Eaglescliffe, with all his faults, was very brave. Experienced officers were wanting, and he had been so long in India that his services were invaluable.

He was not indifferent (what Englishman brought up like him could be so) to his new honours. He liked to call his dark-eyed Oriana Lady Eaglescliffe, and to prophecy that Selim would one day sit in the House of Lords; but he loved India, and loathed the memory of England, and of much that had happened there, much with which, in his few moments of reflection, he had bitterly reproached himself.

It was at Lahore that the beautiful Oriana and their beloved and only boy sickened of the fever then raging among the troops. They very soon fell victims to the disease, and the agony of Eaglescliffe's mind may be gathered from the letter in which he announced their death.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The first dark day of nothingness,
The last of danger and distress.—THE GIAOUR.

"Lahore Sept. 18.

"THEY are gone," wrote Eaglescliffe to Evermore; "yes, friend, they are gone for ever! that devoted wife,—that loving, that fond, that noble boy! I call them, and they do not come; I kiss them, and their cold lips do not return the pressure of mine—they remain stiff and impassive in my warm embrace. My hot tears fall like rain on their pale, rigid faces. No words of love come as heretofore in answer to mine; and yet I cannot realise to myself the terrible truth that they are dead—that I shall never, never see them in the flesh again—they—the all left me to love! My devoted, my beautiful Oriana! in whose perfect affection I often forget that I had ever loved another better; and my glowing, loving boy, who so doated on and delighted in his father. Oh, Evermore! I have stood by the death-bed of my only child. I have seen agonies unutterable borne with the patience of a saint and the courage of a martyr; and when I said, 'My darling, whence comes this fortitude?' this child, whose training I have so neglected, taught the great truths of Christianity by that old English nurse you used to laugh at, replied, 'Oh, papa, think what the Saviour suffered! I am going to Him, and you and dear mamma will meet your poor little Selim there, if you repent and believe. Papa,' he said, between the convulsions that were hastening him to his end,—'papa, will you read your Bible, and pray to God, and believe in his blessed Son? and then we shall be happy through all eternity.' I do not know what were poor Oriana's thoughts and feelings. She died almost suddenly; but if ever a true Christian left this dark and troublous world, it was my Selim, my beloved, my loving, my only boy. Oh, at the thought that those dark, loving eyes are closed for ever!—that that young lovely form must moulder in the grave, and become food for worms, I grow almost impious in my fierce despair; and then I remember his last words, and I try to pray; I pray that I may not survive those dear ones; and probably to-morrow we may meet the foe, and my prayer may be heard! And you, friend, if you love me, do not wish that I may linger here, but that I may be forgiven the rashness of my youth—the profligacy of my manhood, and for the sake of Him who died for sin, I the sinner may be saved—saved to share a blissful eternity with the wife of my bosom and the child of my love.

"Be not angry when I say I hope we may never meet again on earth, but that you will so live, and so repent, and believe, that we may meet above. I cannot tell you, Evermore, how I am haunted at this dreadful moment by the image of my first love, and her early doom, her broken heart, her obscure grave. All I leave, and Oriana's fortune was great, will be yours. When you return to England, seek out the spot where she lies, and let a marble slab, with her real name, do some tardy justice to the loveliest and most loving of women. They are come to hide from me for ever all I loved on earth..

"I grow wild, and desperate, and savage at the thought, and then I remember my Selim's last words, and I try to pray—Oh, that I were sure of lying by his side before I am mad with misery!

"Your friend,

"EAGLESCLIFFE.

"If I fall by the hand of the enemy, seek out my parents and my sister Ada, and tell them I wish them farewell, and to Ellen St. Ange (dear friend of the long ago) convey an affectionate adieu from one who, had he listened to her, would have been a wiser and a better man.

"Evermore, I am a convert to those great truths, at which it is, alas, your wont to scoff! The dying child has converted the living man. If I survive, it will be in the hope of living and dying a Christian, but I believe I shall be cut off in the approaching engagement. What then?

"For while its way the parting spirit wings,

If the parched lips to name the Saviour strive,

The God of Battles, and the King of kings,

For that one name shall save the soul alive."

"Repent and believe, oh, Evermore, and may we meet in heaven!"

Evermore, the worldly, the unbelieving, full of plots and schemes for enriching and aggrandising himself, and still more his beloved Rashleigh, cared little for this letter, except as evidence of the death of Oriana and her son.

As rapidly as he could (after the report of Eaglescliffe's death by the hand of the natives, who had led him into an ambush), he realised Eaglescliffe's property—this, as his agent, he easily accomplished—and set sail for Europe. But, a gambler by passion and habit, and having during the passage home, as he thought, lighted on a scheme certain to double the property he possessed, he resolved to accompany a fellow-passenger (a gamester too) to Hombourg for a week or two, previous to returning to England.

Of course, as he did not actually cheat, all his "dodges," as he called them, failed signally. His schemes for breaking the bank ended in his being "cleaned out."

More than ever, now, he longed to put his schemes into practice—schemes which were to end in the advancement of Rashleigh.

But his first step had yet to be taken—a step which we trust our readers will not contemplate with indifference, now that they know the crafty and cruel nature of this man—namely, the establishing his claim to poor little Hope Evermore as his own child, and the removing her from all her kind friends, both gentle and simple, to live with him, wherever he pleased; expecting her to show him in all things the submission and unquestioning obedience of a daughter—and he such a father!

Alas! poor Hope and poor Larky

HOW THE MONEY GOES.

How goes the Money?—Well,
I'm sure it isn't hard to tell:
It goes for rent and water-rates,
For bread and butter, coal and grates,
Hats, caps, and carpets, hoops and hose—
And that's the way the Money goes!

How goes the Money?—Nay,
Don't everybody know the way?
It goes for bonnets, coats, and capes,
Silks, satins, muslins, velvets, crapes,
Shawls, ribbons, furs, and furbelows,
And that's the way the Money goes!

How goes the Money?—Sure,
I wish the ways were something fever;
It goes for wages, taxes, debts,
It goes for presents, goes for bets,
For paint, pommade, and eau de rose,
And that's the way the Money goes!

How goes the Money?—Now,
I've scarce begun to mention how,
It goes for laces, feathers, rings,
Toys, dolls, and other baby-things,
Whips, whistles, candies, bells, and bows—
And that's the way the Money goes!

How goes the Money?—Come,
I know it doesn't go for rum;
It goes for sermons and Sabbath-chimes,
It goes for charity—sometimes;
For missions, and such things as those—
And that's the way the Money goes!

How goes the Money?—There!
I'm out of patience, I declare;
It goes for plays, and diamond-pins,
For public alms, and private sins,
For hollow shams, and silly shows—
And that's the way the Money goes!

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. IX.

"THE Cyprea, of which there are numerous species," said Wilton, "some of them being commonly called Cowries, display a high natural polish, uniformity, and shape, and delicate and distinct markings, with great beauty and variety of colour. They may be readily distinguished from all other shells, by their lips being rolled inwards, and both of them being toothed. The history of this genus is very interesting, from the remarkable difference of the same shell at the various stages of its growth. In its earliest state, the substance of the shell is very thin, almost colourless, and dull; the mouth rather wide, the outer lip not rolled inwards, but having a sharp edge, and neither lip-toothed. In the second period of growth, the shell begins to approach the general form that characterises the genus. The lips are curved inwards, and the teeth become visible; but the substance is still thin, the colour faint, and the markings little more than ill-defined transverse bands. In its perfect state, the cyprea has received an additional coating of shelly matter, the pattern appears with its vivid tints and delicate markings, and the spire, if not entirely hidden, scarcely projects out of the body whorl. The animal itself undergoes a considerable change in appearance during its growth; its mantle at first is small, but increases with its age, and expands at the sides into two ample wings; from these is deposited the final layer which completes the shell."

"Is not one species of this shell used as money in the east?"

"Yes; it is the current money of Bengal, Siam, and Africa; and is picked up by the negro women of the Indian islands about the full of the moon. The genus, on account of its great beauty, was formerly dedicated to Venus, the deity of the Isle of Cyprus, from which circumstance its name is derived. The inmates of these shells have a fleshy foot, with which they crawl in a similar manner to that of the snail; the head is placed on a neck, and has two finely pointed horns, with two eyes situated at their base; the mouth is a round opening armed with teeth, which act not only as organs of nutrition, but as defensive weapons. In a state of rest the cyprea remain buried under the sea at some distance from the shore, but, at certain seasons, they quit this retreat and traverse the rocks."

"It is to shells of this kind, doubtless, that a poet alludes as he says—

'Shake one, and it awakens; then apply
Its polished lips to your attentive ear,
And it remembers its august abodes,
And murmurs as the ocean murmurs there.'

Wordsworth thus carries out the same idea:—

'— I have seen
A curious child applying to his ear
The convolutions of a smooth-lipped shell;
To which, in silence hushed, his very soul
Listened intensely, and his countenance soon Brightened with joy, for murmuring from within
Were heard sonorous cadences; whereby,
To his belief, the monitor expressed
Mysterious union with its native sea.'

"I perfectly agree with you. If a shell of this kind be broken, the cubic pieces thus made generally present on two of the fractured sides flat surfaces on the inner and outer edges, separated from each other by a shelving portion in the centre, and on the two intermediate broken sides, shelving external and internal edges, connected by a flat central portion; these differences of surface being produced by the different positions of the crystals in the different ayers. Each of the three layers thus rendered obvious, is composed of very thin laminae, or plates, placed side by side as high as the thickness of the plate, and perpendicular to its surface. And the more minutely we examine the structure of such shells the more we shall be struck by the perfection that appears even down to their most microscopic details."

CROWN VOLUTE, IMPERIAL VOLUTE, TROCHUS, ETC.

"Is there a good way of observing them without a microscope?"

COWRIES.

"There is. A good illustration may be obtained by examining with a pocket-glass, the fractured edge of a cone olivi, or other spiral shell, in which you may observe the extremities of the laminae of the outer and inner plates, and the sides of those of the central layers, or the converse, according to the direction of the fracture, the extremities of the laminae showing the angles of the crystals; while their sides, when closely examined, will often exhibit the crystalline flakes. In order to observe the lines of cleavage, the best mode of proceeding is to bruise part of a shell with a hammer, and to examine the fragments, when moistened, under a microscope, until one is discovered which exhibits two laminae in conjunction. The plates and their structure are also well seen in the polished surface of shells which have been slit or ground down to exhibit the internal structure of their cavity. The relative thickness of the three plates varies in different species, but the central plates appear generally to be rather the thickest, and the outer ones the thinnest. The Italian cameo-cutters appear to be aware of this circumstance, and avail themselves of it in cutting the cameos; the ground being always formed of the innermost layer of the three, which is also generally the most transparent. You have, doubtless, observed the iridescence of some shells; even that of the edible oyster is thus rainbow-hued within, while others, like that of the Pearly Nautilus, is so within and without."

"I have, with feelings of warm admiration. A poet says:—

"They that lustre have imbibed,
In the sun's palace porch, where, when unyoked,
His chariot wheel stands midway in the wave."

And no doubt shells are most radiant amidst tropical beams."

"They are and must be so. Strange as it may seem, iridescence is dependent on a peculiarity of surface, and not a peculiarity of substance. You would not look, perhaps, for these beautiful hues to be exhibited by sealing-wax, or a layer of gum arabic; and yet let them be placed, in an impressible state, on mother-of-pearl, and when removed, having acquired the surface of that beautiful substance, they will be arrayed with its hues also. If, too, a clean piece of lead, or of fusible metal, be hammered so as to receive a due impression from mother-of-pearl, it will vie with it in iridescence. Do you remember our experiments with a prism, when we were school-boys?"

"Most certainly I do. Unbounded was our delight when, placing it in a solitary sunbeam admitted into a dark room, very early one morning, the prism divided the ray into the various colours of which it was composed, and threw them, as was the case with Sir Isaac Newton, on the screen prepared to receive them. But what has this to do with iridescence?"

"Only what a cause has to do with an effect. The plain fact is, that mother-of-pearl has this quality because its surface is an aggregate of infinitesimal prisms, which break up the light as it falls upon them, and thus present the colours of the rainbow to the eye of the spectator. Aware of this, a gentleman of the Royal Mint constructed an engine by which he could engrave on the surface of steel and other metals, lines so exquisitely minute that from 2,000 to 10,000 are included in a single inch. Steel buttons were thus made; when seen on a cloudy day they presented but few aspects of colour, but when the light of the sun or of gas fell upon them, they were brilliantly iridescent, and a change was produced in the play of colours by every motion of the light or of the wearer. You need no further proof, I imagine, that it is not substance but surface on which iridescence is dependent; or, that when this is naturally or artificially like a congeries of prisms, it attracts and delights the eye."

"None whatever. I suppose mother-of-pearl was never more largely used than it is now in various ways? I have seen this substance, which is of a scaly laminate structure, separated, by different means, into a number of thin films, each surface presenting the same beautifully coloured appearance. Like tortoise-shell and the veneers of fancy woods, mother-of-pearl is used to decorate a great variety of small articles, as well as for the purpose of inlaying dressing-cases and work-boxes. The artists engaged in this manufacture often draw on these films various devices or patterns with opaque turpentine varnish, and as they are then repeatedly brushed over with strong nitrous acid, the parts not previously covered are eaten away, while, when the varnish is washed off, whatever has been traced appears in relief. Sometimes the pattern is cut out with a knife-edged tool or a fine saw. If several devices are required of the same kind, a number of films are glued together, and the pattern being drawn upon one of the outer films, the saw cuts through them all at one time, and the glue being softened in hot water, the various patterns are entirely separated."

"Just so. Pearls are formed by some particles admitted between the valves of a shell, and which would otherwise irritate the inmates, being covered over with the same nacreous substance. The finest quality of pearl is produced by a bi-valve called, par excellence, the 'pearl oyster.' It is found in the Island of Bahrein, in the Persian Gulf, in Catescer, on the coast of Arabia Felix; and Kondatchie in the Island of Ceylon. The pearls fished in the waters that wash this coast are remarkable for their roundness and clearness; but others have yielded pearls of larger size and greater value. The prices of some of these gems seem absolutely fabulous. A pearl presented to Philip II., though no bigger than a pigeon's egg, was valued at £14,400 sterling; another, belonging to Cleopatra, was priced at £80,000, and one in the possession of the King of Persia at £110,400. Pearls of a far inferior description have been obtained from the deepest parts of the river Strule, near Arrah, in the county of Tyrone; from the river Ythan, in Aberdeenshire; and from the river Conway, in North Wales. It is probable that pearls from this source, collected by the ancient Britons, may have given rise to the statement of Tacitus, in his 'Life of Agricola,' of pearls, 'not very orient, but pale and wan,' being among the indigenous products of Great Britain. Pearls are said to change and become greatly deteriorated by time, especially when worn, as they often are in the East, immediately upon the skin. Redi states that, on opening the tomb where the daughters of Stilicho had been interred, with all their ornaments, eleven hundred and eighteen years before, every article was found in high preservation except the pearls, which were so brittle as to be easily crushed by the fingers."

"Some pearls are much smaller than those obtained in the regular fisheries."

"A kind, called 'seed-pearl,' is obtained at Kurrahee, on the coast of Bombay. The oysters producing them are washed up by the surf-waves to high-water mark, and are left there as the tide falls. They are gathered by coolies, employed for the occasion, put into boats, and landed at Keamaree Point. There the shells are broken, and the pearls extracted, under the superintendence of the contractors, who, within the last seven years, paid the Julpore government 40,000 rupees per annum for the pearl contract. Even the gleaners who come after them pay for the right of sifting the broken shells, in search of any pearls that may remain. And yet they are of little value, except to those who esteem them as medicine, like the Persians and some of the hakems of India, who give them to their patients, and imagine them to be wondrously efficacious."

"I presume some of the molluscs find a strange habitation?"

"They do. As when four oysters falling from the surface of the ocean, where they had been indulging in all the vagaries of their earliest life, fell on an old-fashioned champagne bottle, which was taken from the wreck of the Royal George, sunk so disastrously at Spithead, and still retained the four lower valves, all of which were modified in form by the figure of the bottle. Two of them, instead of being concave internally, are convex, moulded, in fact, by the globose body to which they adhere, so that the oysters must have been perched up, and covered by an arched or vaulted valve, instead of one that was flat. The oysters continued to live under these circumstances, though the usual order of things was reversed. The two other shells show how the instinct of the creatures made the best of their condition by arranging layer after layer, to promote their security and comfort. One lying on the base of the neck of the bottle, though somewhat irregular, is fairly concave, and is raised up by numerous rough external layers, acting as a sort of buttress—a singular example of building skill."

"I have observed, too, that shelled creatures frequently offer a dwelling-place to others."

"They do. A madrepora has become accidentally attached to the shell of a pearl oyster, and has there put forth its tree-like coral. The balanus is often to be observed, as it may be now in the Zoological Society's Gardens in the Regent's Park, attached to a shell. And so it is with a multitude of exceedingly diversified creatures."

STARRY RAIN.

SOFTLY fall thou, starry rain,
O'er the roof and window-pane;
Sing to me a lullaby
Softer than the zephyr's sigh;
As the evening comes again,
Gently, gently fall thou, rain!

Gleam in brightness o'er the rose,
Blushing in its meek repose:
O'er the larkspur's pink and blue,
And the marigold's rich hue;
Touch the maple's nodding plume,
Tossing through the evening gloom;
Cherries, with their fruitage red,
Whence the wild bird has just sped:
O'er the vines that cross the pane,
Gently fall thou, starry rain!

Gently, gently fall thou, rain,
Never with a sound of pain:
Never like a wail of woe
Let thy tender numbers flow
Round this hushed and shadowed home,
Where the joy-light may not come!
For, alas! it is but late
Since the mourners through yon gate
Entered in this darkened room,
Shut from summer scents and bloom,
Where, excluded from the day,
Hushed in sleep the maiden lay:
Sleep, the silent and "profound"
That they take "beneath the ground."
Though her smile was very soft,
Though her voice had gladdened oft,
Ere the fount of joy grew low,
From our love the maid must go.
White flowers in her soft brown hair,
White flowers on her bosom fair:
Thus they bore her through the gloom,
To her dark sequestered tomb.

Therefore, gentlest rain, I pray,
List the words that I would say!
Whispering round that home-to-night,
Be thy voice subdued and light;
So to those who sit and grieve,
In the dull and darkening eve,
O'er the fondly cherished dead,
Thou shalt say, "Be comforted;
Ye will meet your lost again!"
Will you say it, starry rain?

Gently, gently, airy sprite,
Wandering, homeless, through the night:
Softly let thy silvery feet
Print the grass and flowers sweet,
Heaped above one precious face,
In the lonely burial place.
So, when next we go to see,
Something shall remind of thee:
Bursting buds and springing grass,
Telling us where thou didst pass,
With a slow and sad refrain,
O'er our darling, pitying rain!

The Matron.

NO. XXXIX.

THE last chapter was devoted to the subject of winter clothing. I spoke principally of outer garments, and I have still a few words to say on this subject.

If your resources are limited, do not, in laying in your winter stock, attach too much importance to fashion. Recollect that last year's goods are quite as warm and strong as those of this year; and they are generally sold for much less.

I have said nothing about furs, because those that are good are very expensive; and those that are not good last so short a time that they are hardly worth buying. I rather recommend the substitutes for furs, made in knitted lambs'-wool. Both muffis and boas of lambs'-wool look very nice, keep out a great deal of cold, and last at least a season. Woollen gloves are not only cheaper than kid, but more comfortable—if we except the kid lined with fleecy hosiery, and these are dear.

On the subject of winter bonnets, I have only to add to the observations made in the last chapter, that as fashion requires that the bonnet should be so small as to afford little protection for the ears, it is a good plan to wear under the bonnet a straight band of knitted wool, passing over the head and tied under the chin. This would be found a very great protection in travelling; for, in passing rapidly through the air, the cold wind is very apt to give pains in the face, teeth, and ears.

The principal thing I have to say on the subject of winter under-clothing relates to flannel. One of the most trying peculiarities of our climate is its changeableness. In the month of November one day may be mild, almost warm, and the next may be cold and frosty. By wearing flannel next the skin we are much less affected by sudden changes in climate. It was the opinion of a very eminent physician that much mortality might be prevented by using flannel in this manner. It is even more efficacious than a great quantity of outer garments. But if you once take to flannel jackets, you must be very careful how you leave them off. Some recommend them all the year round; but if, on the return of the fine season, you are determined to get rid of them, you should cut off a bit of the flannel every week, until you have reduced it to a mere strip; and then, when the weather is really warm, throw it off altogether.

Perhaps some of my readers are surprised at my having made no mention of india-rubber and waterproof garments. In the first place, these garments are expensive, and in the second, they have the drawback of not being ventilators. By this I mean that they exclude the air altogether; and those habits are most favourable to health which admit air, while they maintain warmth. On this account knitted petticoats, jackets, and shawls, are highly desirable as articles of apparel. But waterproof wrappers have some great advantages, provided they are not worn constantly. A waterproof cape on a showery day may protect one from becoming wet through; and india-rubber shoes are invaluable for those who have to walk out when the ground is covered with snow. The rich who wish for waterproof things had best go to some of our waterproof warehouses and suit themselves; but some of my readers might be glad to have waterproof garments, yet be unable to give the price for those manufactured from india-rubber. To these the following receipt (according to a method practised by seamen) may be welcome:—

First, make the coat, cloak, or trowsers of linen, then soak them well for a day or two in boiled oil. Here I must pause for a moment, to beg my readers who use this receipt to be very careful in the process of boiling the oil. Mind you only half fill the saucepan in which you boil it. Watch it yourself carefully until it boils and you remove it from the fire, and do not let children have anything to do with it. Having soaked the things in the boiled oil, hang them up till they are perfectly dry, without ringing the oil out; then paint them, without dryers or turpentine being in the paint, making them any colour you like. Mind you lay the paint on thinly, and let it dry. Another receipt for waterproof clothing is as follows:—Make the garment of strong, unbleached calico, hang it up in a dry place, and, with a brush, give it two coats of boiled linseed-oil. Buy the oil ready boiled. A pint will be sufficient for a cape or a pair of overalls. I can furnish you with yet another receipt on this subject:—Get some weak size—such as is used by paper-makers—make it hot, and stir a little lump of alum and a small quantity of soap-lather into it. Then, with the brush, apply it to the garment equally all over. If the garment be of good cloth, the size may be laid on inside.

In conclusion, I have only to say that these remarks about winter clothing are as applicable to the clothes of children as to those of grown people. But while particular care is taken to protect children's chests and stomachs from cold, they must not be so wrapped up as to impede the freedom of their movements. But a frosty air will do children good, if they are well protected by clothing and able to jump and run about so as to keep their blood well circulated.

Small Change.

"I don't think you need trouble yourself to visit me any longer, doctor." "But, my friend, I had better visit you as long as you are in danger." "Oh, sir, I fear then I shall never be out of danger."

'Tis not unfitting that a virtuous young lady should blush at her first presentation in society. The morning herself blushes when she first appears, unless she is "under a cloud."

TITLES are properly the insignia of wise and honest men. The fool or knave that wears one is a falsifier.

THE head-coverings that the ladies wear now-a-days are barefaced false-hoods.

In respect to using the thoughts of other writers, almost every author is a Spartan, being more ashamed of the discovery than of the depredation. Yet the offence itself may not be so heinous as the manner of committing it; for some not only steal, but, like the parpies, befool and bespatter those they have plundered. Others again give us the mere carcasses of another man's thoughts, deprived of all their life and spirit—and this is to add murder to robbery.

THEY who dilate upon their glorious ancestry are foolishly vain of a debt which, probably, they will never be able to pay.

WHEN men of infamy soar to places of grandeur, they light a torch to make their shame more manifest to the world.

"I AM told, miss, that your lover plays and drinks." "Oh yes, sir, he plays the flute divinely, and drinks continually at the spring of Helicon."

To change enemies to friends, treat them with kindness. To change friends to enemies, treat them with liquor.

A VERY ill-natured cynic observes:—"Most females will forgive a liberty rather than a slight. If any woman were to have a man indicted for stealing her picture, although it were set in gold, it would be a new case in law; but, if he carried off the setting and left the portrait, there would be no mercy for him."

CUSTOM is the law of one description of fools, and fashion of another; but the two parties often clash, or precedent is the legislator of the first, and novelty of the last. Custom looks to the past, and fashion to the present; but both are purblind to the future.

WIT is a dangerous fool. It may tickle, but tickling isn't safe if, while it makes us laugh, it gives us pain.

"HAVE you read my last speech?" said a vain orator to a friend. "I hope so," was the reply.

THE straits of Thermopylae were defended by only three hundred men, but they were all Spartans; and, in advocating a cause, we should trust rather to the force than to the number of our arguments, not caring how few they be so that the few be incontrovertible. Puzzles for the Ingenious.

Answers to the Question in No. 37, page 175, respecting a trench in a garden, have been received as follows:—

I.—Since A can dig the trench in 10 days, B in 12 days, and C in 14 days, therefore A in one day digs 1-10th of the trench, B 1-12th, and C 1-14th; and the three working together in one day dig $\frac{1}{10} + \frac{1}{12} + \frac{1}{14}$ of the trench. Reducing the fractions to their lowest common denominator, and adding, we have $\frac{42+35+30}{420} = \frac{107}{420}$ = the fraction of the whole trench dug by A, B, and C in one day. Dividing, we find that the trench would be dug in $\frac{420}{107}$ days, by A, B, and C working together.

T. H. A., Trin. Coll. Camb.
II.—1. Arithmetically. A will do 1-10th in one day; B, 1-12th; C, 1-14th: therefore A, B, and C's work for one day = $\frac{1}{10} + \frac{1}{12} + \frac{1}{14} = \frac{168+140+120}{1680} = \frac{428}{1680}$. Then $\frac{1680}{428} = 3\frac{39}{107}$ days (Answer).—2. Algebraically. Let x = number of days. Then $x = \frac{x}{10} + \frac{x}{12} + \frac{x}{14} = 1680x = 168x + 140x + 120x$.

Collecting the terms, $1680x = 428x$. Therefore $x = \frac{1680}{428} = 3\frac{39}{107}$ days (Answer). T. BILLING.

$$\begin{aligned} \text{Let } x &= \text{the age of the person.} \\ \text{Then by Question, } \frac{x}{8} + \frac{x}{12} + \frac{x}{7} + 5 + 1 &= \frac{x}{2} \\ \frac{x}{8} + \frac{x}{12} + \frac{x}{7} + 9 &= \frac{x}{2} \\ 14x + 7x + 12x + 756 &= 42x \\ 33x - 42x &= -756 \\ -9x &= -756 \\ x &= 756 \div 9 = 84 \text{ Ans.} \end{aligned}$$

The son's age was 42.

A father divides his estate among his three sons in such a manner that his first has £1,000 less than the whole; the second has £800 less than one-third of the whole; the third has £600 less than one-fourth of the whole. What is the value of the estate?

| 1. B to K 4 | 1. K to B 3 |
| 2. B to K R 7 | 2. K moves |
| 3. Q mates | |

JABEZ B.—We should have preferred Kt to Q 6 for White's 27th move. Black must have played his K to K R sq, when White would have replied with Kt to K 7, with an overwhelming attack.

W. H. T.—Upon the first move of a Pawn it has the power of playing two squares at a move, but if, in so doing, it should pass an adverse Pawn, such Pawn has the power of taking it. In that case the taking Pawn should be placed on the square which the captured Pawn would have occupied had it advanced only one square.

R. WILLIAMS.—Your Problem is defective. Black can delay the mate several moves by playing Kt to Q Kt 5.

J. N. SMITH.—Thanks for your contribution. It shall appear amongst the Enigmas.

MONA.—Your analysis of the position to which you refer is quite correct. We shall be happy to forward to you some blank chess diagrams if you will favour us with your address.

NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL OF PHOTOGRAPHY.—"THE PHOTOGRAPHIC NEWS," price 3d. weekly, or free by post, 4d.—This journal must prove of the highest interest to every person wishing to become conversant with the beautiful and progressive art of Photography. Communications to be addressed to Messrs. Petter and Galpin, Belle Sauvage Yard, E.C.

AN ANXIOUS QUERIST.—The cessation of the signals from Newfoundland are supposed to have arisen from the circumstance of the cables close in shore not being sufficiently strong to stand the tremendous lashing of the Atlantic waves on the coast. This interruption is no cause for discouragement, since the possibility of telegraphic communication between England and America has been proved, and we have every reason to believe that it will be maintained. As soon as the interruption was made known the directors repaired to Valentia, and aided by various and practical electricians, began to investigate the cause of the stoppage, with the view to remedy the existing difficulty. Of course, this occasioned delay in opening the wire to the public. Instead, however, of being astonished at this impediment, we think it would have been a wonder if none had occurred.

A STUDENT.—Prince Alfred, the Queen's second son, is fourteen years of age. He was highly successful in the examination he recently underwent for a midshipman. This examination lasted four days. His proficiency was tested in arithmetic, algebra, plane trigonometry, Euclid, geography, sacred history, and history of England; and also in Latin, French, German, and English dictation. Prince Alfred will soon join his ship, and we understand he will be kept as strictly to the duties of a midshipman as though he were the son of an unknown individual. He will be neither in the captain's cabin, nor even in the ward-room, but among the juniors in the gun-room. In the education of her son the Queen has acted with that judgment which secures for her the confidence and respect of her subjects; and in this case, as in many others, she gives an excellent example to all mothers in England.

P. Q.—Pheasant-shooting begins in October. The pheasant is a native of Asia; the common fowl and the peacock are from India.

O. PENFOLD.—Westminster Bridge, shortly to be removed, was begun September 13, 1738; the first stone was laid January 29, 1738-9, and it was opened for passengers November 17, 1750. A new bridge is now in progress.

A WORKING GARDENER.—The dewpoint is the degree indicated by the thermometer when dew begins to be deposited. It varies with the degree of the moisture of the atmosphere. The more moist the atmosphere, the less the difference between its temperature and that of the dewpoint, and vice versa. When the air is saturated with moisture, and any colder body is brought into contact with it, deposition of moisture or dew immediately takes place on its surface. As we ascend into the atmosphere, the dewpoint remains stationary to great heights, and then falls suddenly to a large amount.

J. B. W.—The hours during which masters may require the services of apprentices must depend, as we have before stated, on the custom of the trade to which they are apprenticed. The usual number of working hours is twelve, including meals; but it is impossible, of course, for retail shopkeepers to abide by such rule. As to going to places of worship, taking care of children, recreations, &c., these must be regulated by circumstances, domestic arrangements, &c.

EXCELSIOR.—The engraving of "The Gentle Shepherd," in "Cassell's Art Treasures Exhibition," is from a painting by Sir David Wilkie.

A SUBSCRIBER.—It would be difficult to prescribe a cure for damp walls, unless we knew exactly what occasions the dampness. The following may be used with effect in most cases:—Boil two quarts of tar with two ounces of tallow for fifteen minutes; add to this two parts of dried slacked lime and one part of pounded glass which has passed through a sieve; then mix all together till they form a thin paste. In using it, do not mix up more than will do for one square foot of wall at a time, as it dries very quickly. To remedy a wall which is merely damp, lay on a coating about half an inch thick; but if the wall be wet, there must be a second coat.

J. H.—Capital Victoria buns may be made thus:—Mix one pound and a half of dried flour with half a pound of loaf sugar, pounded and sifted; melt a pound and two ounces of butter in a little warm water; add four spoonfuls of rose water, and the same quantity of cinnamon water; knead the above into a light dough with half a pint of yeast. Then mix in six ounces of Patras currants well washed and cleaned. Set it to rise by a fire till the oven be ready, and bake quickly on tins. The term Queen's Cakes is given to cakes made in a variety of ways. The following is strongly recommended:—Half a pound of the finest flour, a teaspoonful of powdered cinnamon, the same quantity of powdered nutmeg, and a little mace; mix all well. Put in a wine-glassful of rose water. Add half a pound of loaf sugar pounded and sifted. Put these into a deep pan, cut up into it half a pound of fresh butter, warm them by the fire, and work them into a sort of cream, adding by degrees the spice and the liquor. Beat five eggs very light, and stir them into the mixture. Strain also the juice of a lemon, and beat the whole well. Butter some little tins, half fill them with the mixture, set them in a brisk oven and bake for a quarter of an hour. When done, turn them out, and place them upside down to cool. These cakes should have a slight coat of two of icing.

THEOPHILUS WIGGINS.—The spleen, or milt (sometimes called melt, though improperly), is an oblong, flattened organ, situated in the left side, in contact with the stomach and pancreas. Its exact use has never been described. The ancients supposed it to be the seat of melancholy, anger, or vexation, and sometimes of perverse mirth; but the reason for their doing so is not evident.

RICHARD.—It is intended to employ some auxiliary letter-carriers in the London districts, but the pay will not exceed from 6s. to 10s. per week. The applicants must be of the ages of from seventeen to twenty-seven, and not less than five feet five inches in height. They will have to undergo a medical examination, to give satisfactory references as to character, to read manuscript readily, to write from dictation, and to be quick in working compound addition and subtraction of money.

BEAUTY.—We have so many letters on the subject of beauty, that it is evident our readers are unaware how little importance we attach to personal charms unenhanced by those of the mind. Our fair correspondent wishes to know if we consider that blue eyes and black hair are thought handsome. As, in all probability, the lady herself has blue eyes and black hair, it would be impolite to say we think them ugly; but, as it happens, we do consider blue eyes and black hair handsome, provided the blue eyes beam with intelligence, and the black hair is soft and shining from care and attention.

PISCES FETIDA.—You have certainly fixed upon a cognomen admirably illustrative of your taste and quality.

MAJOR PLINLIMMON AND D. JONES.—A receipt for varnishing maps, pencil drawings, &c., will be found in No. 41, page 240.

CONSTANT READER.—No silks look well after washing, however carefully it may be done; but you may try the following: When you have washed your dress in the usual way, spread it out as flatly and smoothly as possible on an ironing-board, the inside uppermost, and sponge it lightly and smartly with a very weak solution of isinglass. When dry, smooth it on the right side with an iron moderately hot. If you do not wish it to appear glossy, place thin paper between the silk and the iron.

K. B. E.—It is customary to use the term brace; but, as that word has so many different significations, we prefer the term couple.

SARAH ANN.—You can obtain the number you require by sending two postage-stamps to Messrs. Petter and Galpin; from whom also you may obtain "Cassell's Art Treasures Exhibition," price 8s., in handsome cloth boards; or, by post, 9s.

JUNICS.—Read the notice in the first column of "Our Editorial Table" in No. 41, for our answer as to your inquiries respecting photography.

A SCHOOLGIRL.—Use as much exercise as you can, and don't fret because you are somewhat shorter and stouter than you wish to be. Yacht is pronounced yot, or cot.

VERNON AND A CONSTANT READER are both greatly mistaken; the letter d is not wanting in the lines page 191.

S. B. SMITH.—Several tumultuous gatherings of the Chartists of the metropolis took place in the spring of 1848. What was called "the Great Demonstration" took place on Kennington Common, on the 10th of April in that year.

A. B. C.—"A bill of sale" is when a person borrows money, and delivers goods to the lender as a security, and, at the same time, gives him a bill empowering him to sell the goods if the money is not repaid at the appointed time, with interest.

JOSEPH.—Coroner is the title of an officer under the crown, established in Saxon times, for the purpose of attending chiefly to the property of the crown. Coroners were officers of the realm in A.D. 925. Coroners for every county in England were first appointed by Statute of Westminster, 4 Edward I., 1276. The principal function coroners now exercise is that of holding inquests on the bodies of such persons as either die, or are supposed to die, a violent death.

A YOUNGSTER AND J. B.—"Cassell's Educational Course" may be had complete in sixty-four numbers, 1s. 4d. each—8s. the set; or in six volumes, neatly bound, 15s. 6d.; or it may be had in monthly parts, 8s. 4d. or 10s. each, according to the number of weeks in each month; or in separate volumes, varying in price according to the quantity they contain.

A LOVER OF EDUCATION.—It is not usual to write the title Esquire in full, except in legal documents, and then only in reference to persons who have a just claim to it.

FRANCES EVANGELINA AND JANE C.—Wait a few years, and, in the meantime, apply yourselves to useful pursuits; being of the ages of fourteen and fifteen, you have, doubtless, much to learn.

ONE ON THE COAST.—Samphire is the herba sancti Petri, or St. Peter's wort, a corruption of the French Saint Pierre. This plant generally grows on the sea coast, and is used for pickling.

R. R.—We fear your agreement, as you describe it, is worthless. You should apply to a magistrate. What you have heard of Dick Turpin is fact; but poor Black Bess dropped down dead.

T. M. (Oundle), S. JAMES.—Write to the secretaries of the institutions for the particulars you desire.

FLEDA ROY.—You will find directions for making ice creams in No. 31, page 80.

CHARLEY.—You state that you have spots on your face, "arising from the heat of the blood, and obstructed perspiration;" you should consult your medical adviser as to the best mode of treatment.

TRUTH.—The best advice we can give you is this: direct all your energies to improve your fortunes. We are much mistaken if your success in life does not induce the parents of the young lady to withdraw their opposition.

A. D.—"Cassell's Illustrated History of England" will include all the leading events of the present reign, up to the period of publication.

CLUTHA.—"The Augustan Age" included a period commencing about thirty years before the birth of Christ, and terminating about fifty years after that event. It has been called also the golden age of Latin literature, as, during the reign of Augustus Cæsar such a number of illustrious writers flourished, as caused it to be distinguished as one of the great ages of human literary excellence. The term "the Augustan age of English literature" is usually applied to the reign of Queen Anne, during which period a considerable number of eminent literary men lived and flourished.

DUBLIN.—Apply to the Secretary of the Committee of Council on Education, Downing-street.

AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—You take a wrong view of the subject. Leave nature alone; that which you consider so disfiguring is looked upon by some as a beauty.

A FOUR YEARS' READER had better buy ready-made gunpowder, than run the very dangerous risk, and the great expense, of making it himself.

A DISTRESSED FATHER.—In the present state of India you will hardly be able to obtain your son's discharge.

JUDITH.—If a bill of sale has been previously obtained, it will stay an execution from the county court; or from any other writ in execution.

MERRISON.—The place, improperly called by many "Driest," is Driffield, a town in the eastern portion of Yorkshire.

M. A. DUNDON, WILLIAM WATTS, AND MERCANTILE, are all afflicted with a tendency to blushing. This tendency distresses them, but we see no reason for its doing so, since blushing is a very becoming proof of sensibility.

T. H.—Your friend is one among hundreds who have been disappointed in the expectations they formed as to the result of emigration; but we do not think it likely that he is on that account entitled to insist upon a free passage home. The demand for labour at the Cape, especially for mechanics and artisans, is still great.

TOTAL IGNORANCE.—We do not think you would be likely to succeed.

T. W.—Horn may be softened, bent, or moulded by means of heat and pressure.

PUMKIN.—You will find an excellent receipt for making ink suitable for window tickets in No. 17, page 272.

BLANCHE.—We certainly do not recommend "an only sister, with good references," to take the perilous situation of barmaid.

A FLATTERED ONE.—You wish to know why a young girl of seventeen always smiles when she meets you? If you are a suitor for her hand, we think you may interpret her smiles as a sign of preference.

A YOUNGEST SON.—A commission in a hussar regiment, together with the necessary equipments, would cost you nearly a thousand pounds, and you could not live in the same style as your brother officers on the income you speak of. We advise you to relinquish the idea of becoming a dashing hussar.

PATTY JONES.—If you and your lover are in a hurry to marry, merely because you fear you may alter your minds, we advise you to remain single. It is better to change before than after marriage.

LIZZIE.—You should never leave food in any metal vessel longer than the time in which it is actually being cooked.

RICHARD TYRRELL.—Wait till you have "popped the question." How can you tell there will be any occasion for the engagement ring? Until you know your fate, we advise you not even to think of the ring.

MARY ANNIE.—You would be considered a most ignorant lady's-maid if you remained unacquainted with millinery, dressmaking, and hair-dressing; and your wages would be comparatively low.

EVA HUGHES.—The Princess Alice is pleasing in appearance.—The language of white jasmine is, "I desire a return of my affection" (something like the language of most men).—The hair forwarded for our inspection is of a pretty shade of brown.

JIM.—You say you are so fond of onions you do not like to give them up, though you know they taint the breath. After eating onions, swallow parsley-leaves chopped up in vinegar. This will counteract the smell of the onions.

CALATHUMPIA.—Your question was answered in No. 37, page 176. J. W. R.—We do not furnish receipts for making explosives. DICK TYRRELL.—Apply to the Custom House.—J. B. B.—Mastic varnish is that most commonly used. MARS.—Apply to a sergeant of the Life Guards.

BARREPLACE, GILLAUDE, BALD, and ROSEBUD will find receipts for hair oils in previous numbers. J. HARRY should obtain medical advice. PAUL.—We decline offering an opinion as to the stability of newly-formed monetary associations. C. DIBBS.—You must obtain a letter of recommendation from a subscriber. EPAMINONDAR.—Do not tamper with your eyelids. Bathe them with rosewater morning and night. ROSE JANE.—Seek medical advice.

LOUISA.—Be content with your natural colour.

A LILY.—There was not any law to interdict the marriage of the Queen with one of her subjects; but such a marriage, it is thought, would have been inconsistent with the public interest.

FANNY.—The young man who obtained a sum of money from you to furnish a house previous to marrying you, may be prosecuted for felony since he has absconded with the said money. He was guilty of obtaining money under false pretences.

J. R. DENIS, EDGAR.—We decline furnishing directions for the manufacture of dangerous explosives and combustibles.

FAIR PLAY.—We advise you to have nothing to do with "the Royal Saxon State Lottery."

UPSILON.—Marcus Porcius Cato was born about 98 B.C. His profession was that of a soldier. His first military service was as a volunteer in the war against Spartacus, in Spain. He then went as a tribune in the army to Macedonia. He next became tribune of the people, and was afterwards made praetor. He joined the army of Scipio, and, on the defeat of that general, Cato shut himself up in Utica, where he put an end to his own life, 45 B.C.

HARRIETTE.—To "paint the lily, or perfume the rose," from "King John," Shakespeare, are figurative expressions to denote the idleness of attempts to improve that which has already reached perfection. Your table-cloth may be cleansed by the ordinary process of washing.

LOUISE.—The first Council of Trent assembled in the year 1545, and continued, but with interruptions, under Popes Paul III., Julius III., and Pius IV., to 1563, when the last council under this name was held.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XCV.

Home is the resort
Of love, of joy, of peace, and plenty, where,
Supporting and supported, polished friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss.—THOMSON.

It would be difficult to describe the impatience of the heart which, after a long absence, the traveller feels to behold once more his native land. As he approaches the well-remembered shores, minutes seem hours, and the swift foot of time changes to the sluggard's pace; visions of home and kindred smiles, affection's kiss, and friendship's manly grasp grow doubly vivid, and slumber's dreams haunt the waking thoughts.

So strong was the desire of treading again the soil of England, that even Egypt's wonders lost their attraction; home was a spell more powerful than the pyramids to the returning wanderers, who, having taken the overland route, reached Alexandria in time to catch the steamer just as it was on the point of starting for Southampton. Without one sigh of regret for gorgeous Thebes, that monument of regal and sacerdotal magnificence, the sphinx, time's riddle, or the colossean Memnon, they joyfully embarked.

During the former part of their voyage Lieutenant Marsh had explained to Lillian the tie which existed between them. His object in leaving our hero in Calcutta had been to visit the distant station where the marriage of his sister with the unfortunate Allan Boothroyd had taken place. It was in the hands of the rebels. Every paper and record had been destroyed.

"Let not that distress you," he frequently urged; "unlike man, Providence never leaves his designs imperfect; witnesses may yet be found."

This was, at least, a hope; and we know how fondly youth will cling to it.

Seldom had deeper or more tranquil happiness been found than in the hearts of those embarked on board the Fairy mail packet. Sir Charles and Fred Wharton were gradually recovering their health; and Rose—the grateful, happy Rose—could gaze with pride upon the manly form of her husband as he trod the deck; no longer a skulking felon, flying from justice, and haunted by terrors, but now free to meet the world, and throw it back its glance.

"We shall see St. Faith's again," she whispered, "and the kind familiar faces of our youth. Friend will smile upon us, and welcome our return."

JACK MANDERS RECOGNISES MIKE.

"You forget," answered Mark, doubtfully, "the woman."

"I forget nothing," interrupted his wife, with a cheerful smile; "their scorn will be for the heartless woman who tempted us, not her victims."

"How I will work," exclaimed the repentant man. "They must have wily tongues who lead me again to idleness. Rose," he added, and as the words that followed fell upon her ears, the arm of the speaker stole gently round her waist, "never, till misfortune overtook me, did I feel the real value of the treasure I possess. Dearer—dearer to me now than even at the moment which made you mine."

Mark Rayner, we suspect, is not the only husband in the world who has made a similar discovery. The heart of a true and faithful woman resembles, in one respect, the flower which, when crushed, exhales the most delicious perfume.

There is something contagious in happiness. Even Zamora, at times, forgot the terrible scene she had so lately passed through, as she sat listening to the grave remarks of the young soldier to whom she owed her life.

The baronet more than once hinted his suspicion to his wife that her widowhood would not prove interminable—an insinuation which her ladyship very properly refused to listen to, and declared the idea of such a thing preposterous.

Perhaps the kind-hearted speaker reconciled this opinion to her conscience by mentally adding "For at least a year to come;" if so, neither her husband nor our readers have the least right to accuse her of insincerity.

Even Jack Manders and Caleb had their projects; but, as it is no part of our plan to declare every mystery at once, we shall drop the veil, leaving it to time, the greatest of all tell-tales, to unveil them.

What bright and happy pictures of the future did our hero and Lillian draw as they sat hour after hour upon deck watching the vessel breasting the waves, or calculating the distance which still separated them from England. Shakespeare has told us, and every hour's experience confirms the wondrous wisdom of the great reader of the human heart, that the course of true love never did run smooth—that is to say, perfectly smooth. The fair girl had still one drop of doubt which mingled in her cup of happiness; and wisely so,—perchance the draught might have been too delicious else. Should it prove that she was the child of the poor soldier, Barney Gee, would the wealthy grandfather of her lover ever give his sanction to their marriage?

Richard smiled at her fears—nay, felt almost angry when she repeated them.

"Vain supposition!" he replied. "The old man loves me. If he has pride, it is the pride of honour; he is no worshipper of the herald's musty parchments; besides, have I not won the right to choose where my heart dictates? Lillian," he added, "you cannot count the affection that waits to welcome you—a mother's, sister's; scarcely dare I trust my lips to name them; tears drown my words when I anticipate the meeting."

The Fairy touched for a few hours at Malta; and, after a successful voyage, entered the Southampton waters. It would be difficult to describe the feelings of the hero of our tale or Lillian when they first caught sight of the still distant shore. Each remembered the circumstances under which they had quitted it—the former his parting with Mr. Bently on the beach, the latter being smuggled on board the Harold, beneath the cloak of Rose.

On reaching London, Richard's first visit was to Mr. Curry. The worthy merchant shook him cordially by the hand, and warmly congratulated him upon his safe return to England.

"You were reported dead," he observed, "and the intelligence has nearly broken my old friend's heart."

"Where is my grandfather?" impatiently demanded his visitor.

"At Meldown Park," replied the former. "This will be happy news to him; but it must be imparted gently; his health is much shattered."

"Is he there alone?"

"Alone," repeated Mr. Curry. "I guess the motive of your question, and can answer it. Your relative kept faith with you, and became reconciled to his daughter. The papers you forwarded from India enabled him to defeat the scheme of that unprincipled scoundrel, Carus Kearn, to blast the reputation of your father, and the reconciliation, from all I hear is complete."

"And yet he is at Meldown alone," observed our hero, regretfully. "I should have thought that at his age, and under such circumstances, his daughter would have been with him."

"He could not endure the sight of her tears. They were a constant reproach to him," answered the merchant.

"My dear mother, then, knows—"

"She knows nothing," interrupted the old gentleman. "Morton and myself are the only confidants of his secret. Your grandfather could not bring himself to destroy the fond lingering hope of once more beholding her son. Her very life appears entwined with it."

"My poor mother," sighed the youth, "when will her sorrow end?"

"Soon, very soon, my dear boy!" exclaimed Mr. Curry, joyously. "You must proceed to Meldown at once; lose not an instant. I would go down with you myself, but the Indian mail has just arrived, and—let me see—I have it! I will send Banks, my cashier, with you. He is a prudent man, a father, and will know how to break the happy news."

"A thousand thanks for your consideration," replied Richard, "but it is unnecessary. The true and faithful friend who accompanied me to India, my guardian and adviser in every peril, will go with me."

"Lieutenant Marsh?"

"The same, sir."

"Glad to hear it," said the merchant, rubbing his hands; "deuced glad to hear it. A capital fellow—understands business. He has made one or two lucky hits. Yes, yes, you may trust to his discretion. But go at once," he added; "should my old friend read your name amongst the arrivals, the sudden shock might kill him."

His visitor informed him that both himself and his companion had taken the precaution of requesting the captain of the Fairy to suppress their names from the list.

"And an excellent one, too," observed the friend of his grandfather. "You are a noble fellow, and—but it would be absurd to offer services to one who, in all probability, will be a richer man than myself; but if ever Curry and Sons can be of any use to you, you may command them."

From the counting-house of his friendly correspondent, our hero returned to Mivert's Hotel, where he had left Sir Charles and the rest of his friends; to them he related all that had taken place in his interview with the merchant.

"He is right," said the baronet; "you must proceed at once to Meldown."

"Pardon me, my first visit ought to be to my mother," replied Richard.

Lady Bell and Lillian looked as if they thought so too, and smiled approvingly.

"Affection, doubtless, would dictate it," observed the lieutenant, "but prudence says no; the hand that deprived her of you, in justice ought to restore you; your grandfather's motives might be misconstrued else, and estrangement ensue."

There was so much truth as well as good sense in this objection, that the impatience of his ward gave way, and he consented to be guided by the advice of the speaker, who undertook to make arrangements for their departure that same evening.

One of the waiters informed our hero that Mr. Wharton had several times inquired for him, and was waiting to see him in his own room.

Richard had not forgotten the claims of friendship on the recollection of his school companion, but despatched the cornet immediately on his arrival in London to break the intelligence to Harry Morton, who had kept the secret intrusted to him at the risk of his own happiness, of which, by-the-bye, our readers will hear something more anon.

It was some time before mutual emotion permitted either of the long-separated friends to speak.

"Harry!" "Richard!" were the only words that escaped their lips as they stood grasping each other by the hand.

"Welcome back, a thousand times welcome back!" exclaimed the former, when he had at last recovered something like self-possession. "I can never tell you how deeply I have regretted your supposed death."

"I can imagine it by my own feelings," replied Richard, warmly.

"I never saw any one more upset by the intelligence than my father. Had you been his own son he could not have felt the loss more keenly. After having succeeded, too, in the object of your journey to India, it was terrible; but never mind that now. Thank heaven, the report has proved a false one. You must have seen much, endured much, and felt much. I trust you have returned heart whole?" he added, with a smile.

"Not quite, and you?"

"Haven't a bit of heart left," replied Harry, joyously; "and, what is more, have long since ceased to regret the loss of it. It was a precious mission, Richard, you intrusted me with."

"But you executed it?"

"Yes."

"And gave my dear mother the portrait?"

"Into her own hands."

"I do not see the peril you speak of," observed our hero, at the same time regarding his friend with serious air.

"Brothers are proverbially blind," observed Morton, with an arch smile.

"What," exclaimed Richard, "my sister Mary? I see it all. She must be a lovely girl now; and you are—"

"Exactly—that's it—over head and ears in love with her. I could not help it; and now the murder is out."

Then followed a mutual explanation and interchange of confidence, such as can only exist between friends who have tried and proved each other's worth. Our hero felt extraordinarily elated at the intelligence; for could he have chosen a brother-in-law from all the world, Harry would have been the man.

"You cannot imagine," observed the latter, "what I have endured—the test my friendship has been put to; but I kept your secret. First, I had to withstand your sister's smiles; that was difficult enough. Next, her tears; and they were ten times more persuasive. If ever I should make a figure as an Old Bailey lawyer," he added, "I shall date it to the experience I have had in cross-examination."

"Poor Harry, how little did we foresee the result."

"Of course we did not," replied the lover of Mary Markham. "Wisely or unwisely, mercifully or unmercifully, Providence conceals such dangers from us, and yet we fall into them with our eyes open. The intelligence of your death placed me in a most embarrassing position. Trusting to your return, I had promised that a few months should explain the mystery."

"It will soon cease to be one," said his friend; "I start to-night for Meldown."

"At what hour?"

"Eight."

"I shall be ready," replied Morton. "A note to my father, whose sanity I will scarcely undertake to answer for, when he hears that you are living—"

"Do you really intend to accompany me?" demanded our hero. "This is kind, indeed."

"Say rather selfish," observed Morton; "were I to lose sight of you for a single hour, I should imagine that I had been cheated by one of those day dreams so often indulged in—so seldom realised."

"I will not refuse your offer," said Richard; "the happiness it affords me is too great."

"Useless, my dear fellow, useless, if you did," exclaimed Harry, with a laugh. "I don't intend to part with you till I have seen you and Mary in each other's arms; then, and not till then, I shall consider my responsibility at an end, and leave you to take care of yourself."

When the speaker was introduced to Lillian, his friend could not avoid noticing the astonishment he evinced. In his present excited, happy state, he had forgotten the circumstance which called it forth.

"Pray, pardon me," said Harry, recovering himself; "but, really, the resemblance is so extraordinary that—Richard, you remember the portrait we were both so—that is to say," he added, correcting himself, "that you were so fascinated with at Meldown Park?"

"A family likeness," replied our hero; and looked as if he would have added, "only far more beautiful. Lillian is the niece of the late Sir Norman Boothroyd."

"Not the little girl that—I beg pardon, the young lady who was stolen from her friends at St. Faith's?"

"The same!" exclaimed Sir Charles Fourreau; "though how you became aware of the circumstance, I confess, puzzles me to guess."

"Nothing more easily explained," answered the young man. "A client of my father's, one Major Hawley, and his wife, a strong-minded woman, with a quick tongue and a warm heart, have been making fruitless efforts to discover her. The lady is Miss Boothroyd's godmother."

"I recollect the name perfectly," observed Lieutenant Marsh. "My sister frequently mentioned it in her letters to me. Perhaps we shall find that they were the witnesses of her marriage!"

The arrival of the lawyer threw still more light on the affair, although it was some time before he could answer the questions put to him, so elated did he feel at once more beholding the grandson of his friend. Harry declared that he had never seen his father so excited in all his life; the warmth of his congratulations equalled his own.

"If we were not likely to become brothers," he whispered in the ear of Richard, "I should absolutely feel jealous."

Mr. Morton promised to communicate with the major and his wife in the morning; adding that, for the present, it was his advice the return of the young lady to England should be kept a profound secret.

"Do you remember, Miss Boothroyd," he inquired, "a man named Fiddler Dick?"

Lillian had no recollection of the name. "A sort of mountebank, I believe, who obtained a living by the exertions of several children."

"But too well," answered the fair girl, blushing deeply at the recollection of the humiliations to which she had been exposed.

"And his wife, a coarse, vulgar woman, with beetle brows, and a voice to which a raven's would be music? She calls herself Bet."

Lillian shuddered. Years had not effaced the remembrance of the brutal violence of her former persecutor.

"Do you know such a person, sir?" demanded his son, greatly surprised.

"She is a client of mine," answered his father, drily, "and likely to prove a valuable one. Tomorrow," he added, "if Sir Charles Fourreau will honour me with a visit, I doubt not but I shall have important information to communicate."

"Willingly," said the baronet; "the interests of my adopted child, I feel assured, cannot be in safer hands."

The saying that Time flies swiftly when we are happy is a very trite one, but never was it felt more true than in the present instance. Richard could scarcely believe it possible when the lieutenant informed him that it was time to depart for Meldown.

The happy lover could not avoid contrasting his present adieu to Lillian with the misery of their parting in Calcutta. The future then appeared dark and clouded; now, all seemed bright and fair—a smile was on their lips, and sunshine in their hearts.

As a matter of course, he promised to write; and obtained a promise of receiving a letter daily.

It wanted about a week to Christmas when the party started for Meldown Park.

We must pass over the journey as far as Exeter, where the travellers were obliged to quit the railroad and proceed by post. St. Faith's being, as we observed at the commencement of our tale, such a remote, out-of-the-way place, that not a stage coach communicates with it, surveyors have forgotten to place it in the maps; we question if our readers would find it even on the Ordnance ones, and should not feel surprised if some of our critical readers did not write to the authorities to point out the omission.

We will willingly afford them all the information we possess upon the subject.

CHAPTER XCVI.

The wrathful winter, hast'ning on apace,
With blustering blasts, had all ybar'd the trees,
And old Saturnus, with his frosty face,
With chilling cold had pierced the tender green;
The mantles rent, wherein enwrapped been
The gladsome groves, that now lay overthrown;
The tapets torn, and ev'ry tree blown down.

SACKVILLE.

SOME persons picture winter like old age—dull and cheerless; to others it is the season for sport and every manly enjoyment. It has, at least, one pleasure peculiar to itself, being the period of the year peculiarly set apart for the interchange of friendship, the re-union of long-severed families and friends, rejoicing to meet once more around the patriarchal board on that auspicious day, when peace on earth and goodwill to men was first proclaimed by angel tongues to the astonished shepherds on the mountain top.

The night, although intensely cold, proved a lovely one, and the chaise which conveyed the party towards Meldown rattled merrily along the crisp and level road. The fields and gently undulating hills, no longer clad in summer's verdure, or the more sober foliage of autumn, but in the silver livery of winter, appeared like a landscape carved in ivory, as they lay glittering in the light of the moon, which, like a lamp suspended in the heavens, shone brightly to light the impatient travellers on their way.

Jack Manders and Caleb, who occupied the rumble of the vehicle, enjoyed the journey exceedingly. It was home, and though neither of them could recall many happy days spent in England, the word had still a spell even for them.

"Do you know anything of the part of the country we are about to visit?" inquired Caleb of his companion.

"Not much," was the reply; "but I have a relative who resides there, a sort of uncle."

"Lucky fellow," said the sailor; "no doubt you are impatient to see him."

Jack admitted that he did feel rather impatient.

"I can imagine the pleasure of such a meeting."

"Can you!" exclaimed his friend, with a bitter laugh. "All I can say is, that your imagination must be exceedingly strong, then; for Andrew Sillex would sooner see the murrain amongst his cattle, or a bailiff in the farm, than the face of his nephew."

"What!" exclaimed Caleb, "the old rascal who trepanned you on board the Caradoc? Whew! I understand you now. Of course, you intend to thank him."

"Most affectionately," muttered the former. "But haven't you friends in England?"

"A mother," answered the young man, with a sigh, "and I dare not go near her yet."

"Why so?"

"I am not of age; when I am—"

"You intend to square accounts with your precious father-in-law," added Jack, finishing the sentence for him. All right, I can understand that. I, too, have certain family matters to settle. Suppose we assist each other."

The proposal was agreed to, and further explanations might have been entered into between the speakers, but for a circumstance which made a considerable impression upon the mind of one of them. Just as the chaise entered the common close to St. Faith's, a heavy-looking dog-cart, with two men in it, emerged from one of the by-roads. It was drawn by a powerful black horse, and both the occupants were muffled up to the eyes. But that might have been to guard against the cold. There was nothing in their appearance to indicate that the precaution was intended as a disguise.

On catching sight of the chaise, the driver of the dog-cart suddenly pulled up, as if uncertain which road to take; his hesitation, however, lasted but an instant, for on his companion exclaiming, "Take the left, can't yer?" he gave his horse the rein, and started at a rapid pace across the common.

It might have been that their route lay in that direction, but it was equally probable that they had changed it to avoid being recognised.

"What a powerful horse," observed Caleb.

His fellow-traveller took no notice of the remark; he was leaning over the side of the rumble, attentively considering the appearance of the two men; the voice of the one who gave the direction "to take the left," had evidently struck him.

"How very odd," added the speaker.

"What is odd?" demanded Jack, in the tone of a person whose reflections have been suddenly broken in upon.

"That they should have quitted the high road at our approach," answered his friend. "I wonder if they will take to it again, now that we have passed them."

"No doubt of it."

The supposition proved a correct one; for the two vehicles had not crossed each other more than a couple of hundred yards before the dog-cart was seen driving along the usual track.

Caleb repeated his observation, that it seemed very odd.

These circumstances, from whatever source, evidently made a great impression upon the mind of his friend, who, during the rest of the journey, appeared buried in his reflections.

It was nearly midnight when the chaise drew up at the little inn at St. Faith's. The landlord, who had long since retired to rest, had to be roused up, to receive the unexpected guests. A fire was speedily lit; and whilst our hero, the lieutenant, and Harry Morton stood over the crackling faggots, enjoying the blaze, Jack Manders proceeded to the stables to have a little private conversation with the ostler.

Caleb went with him.

At first the man, not over delighted, perhaps, at having been disturbed from his sleep by the arrival of travellers at such an unwonted hour, did not seem inclined to be very communicative, till the sight of a crown piece unlocked his tongue; then he could not be too communicative.

With a tact that might have done credit to an Old Bailey lawyer, Jack Manders proceeded to cross-examine him.

His first question was, "How far is the Home Farm from the village of St. Faith's?"

"About three miles."

"Who lives there?"

"The old steward, Andrew Sillex."

"Is he much liked in the county?"

To this inquiry the ostler appeared embarrassed how to reply, not knowing whether the speaker might be a friend or not of Andrew's. Of course he had no wish to offend a gentleman who paid for information so liberally.

"Some like him," he answered, "and some don't; for my part, I know nothing bad of him—that is to say, very bad."

"Or good, I should say," observed Caleb, amused at the hesitation of the speaker.

"Well, not much," said the man. "Mr. Sillex, like the rest of us, can't please every one; but he is in high favour with my lady."

"No doubt of that," thought Jack, remembering the scene he had witnessed in the park when Lillian was transferred from the care of Rose and her husband to that of Andrew.

"But he is rich," added the ostler, in a tone of confidence; a piece of information he thought that could not do any great harm either way.

"And does much good with his money?"

"I dare say he does, but I never heard on it."

"Has he many visitors?"

"None," said the man, "since his brother, who wor like him as one pea to another, staid wi' un."

"Is that long since?"

"More than a year last Michaelmas. The whole family, housekeeper and all, wor nearly poisoned."

"By accident?"

"No; by mushrooms."

Jack smiled. He could have made a shrewd guess at the nature of the accident the man spoke of.

"And now, my good fellow," he said, "before I propose to you to guide us to the Home Farm, for which service of course I am willing to pay you handsomely, for the hour is late, answer me one question more, and I have done."

"Ees, sir."

"Are you acquainted with any one in the neighbourhood who drives a dog-cart with a powerful black horse?"

The ostler considered for a few minutes; then shook his head. Evidently he was at fault.

"Not in this neighbourhood," he said. "Tims, of Exeter, has just such a trap, which he sometimes lets."

"And who is Tims?"

"A horse-dealer, who was in trouble about five years since consarning a hunter of Sir Norman's; but it turned out to be all right."

"Suppose," said the nephew of Andrew Sillex, "that I were on the common just where the three roads meet?"

"Near the old sign-post?" demanded his informant.

"The same."

"I know exactly the spot."

"Which would be my road to the Home Farm?"

"There be two roads; the one the chaise came by, through the village, is the nearest."

"And the other?"

"Goes round by the lane, between the Elms, Squire Thornton's place and the pits; but it be a long way round."

"Thee bees a mortal curious chap," thought the speaker, as Jack Manders called his companion aside, and held a brief conversation with him, which, for the benefit of our readers, we shall repeat.

"You recollect the dog-cart and the men?" he asked.

Caleb nodded in the affirmative.

"I cannot explain, even to myself, the effect their appearance, and, above all, the voice of the one who spoke, produced on me—it was my uncle."

"The steward?"

"No; Mike, his brother, the man who would have trained me in the same school of crime in which he himself was an adept. It is impossible I should be mistaken."

"Say improbable," observed his friend; "remember, we had been speaking of him just before."

"Silenced, but not convinced," replied Jack.

"Should my suspicions prove correct, he can be in this neighbourhood with no good design. Besides, he is an important witness in proving the claims of Miss Lillian."

"What do you propose?"

"To proceed to the Home Farm and watch."

"Then I am your man," exclaimed Caleb; "I would rather run the risk of going a dozen times upon a fool's errand than miss one occasion of rendering a service to my benefactor."

On being promised a second recompense for acting as their guide, the ostler readily consented to accompany them, and the three started at once, from the stables, on their way. The simple villager could not avoid wondering what business travellers who posted with four horses could possibly have at such an hour with Andrew Sillex.

It is now time to follow the two travellers in the dog-cart, who had shown so marked a desire to avoid observation by turning off the high road the instant they encountered the party in the post-chaise, and by that very act, as well as the sound of the voice of the one who spoke, excited the curiosity of Jack Manders.

For some time they continued to drive rapidly and in silence, the tread of the powerful horse and rolling of the light wheels of the vehicle being scarcely heard upon the snow, which like a thick carpet covered the earth, and it was not till they reached the entrance to the narrow by-lane skirting Mr. Thornton's park of the Elms, that either of them uttered a word.

"Vel, which is the way now?" demanded the man who held the reins, in a thick, surly tone.

His companion pointed to the turning he should take.

"And how far is the crib?" added the speaker.

"About two miles."

"Long uns?"

"Pretty vell, for that," was the reply.

"Vy didn't yer say three at once?" observed the first speaker, who was evidently in no very amiable humour; perhaps the meeting with the chaise, or the coldness of the night, or the effect of both combined had ruffled it. "But it's like yer," he continued, "yer never could give a pal a straight-forard answer. It's my opinion yer were born with a throat twisted like a corkscrew. The truth, when yer does speak it—which ain't often—gets twisted into a lie afore it can wriggle itself out."

"And it's my opinion," retorted the person to whom this not very complimentary observation had been addressed, "that you ain't no heart for the business we are on. Better say so at once; not beat about the bush, and nag, nag, nag till I am tired o' hearin' on yer. I can get to Meriky without it."

"No, yer can't."

"You forgets the reward for your apprehension," answered the driver of the dog-cart. "Fifty pounds; it's more than yer worth."

"There is exactly the same sum for those who assisted me," quietly observed his companion.

By the above conversation, our readers have doubtless discovered that the suspicions of Jack Manders with respect to one of the parties were correct, the speaker being no other than Mike and his companion, his old pal, Fiddler Dick. We need scarcely add that the crib to which the latter person had inquired the distance, was the Home Farm.

Immediately after the escape of the old convict from Chatham dockyard, he proceeded, with his two friends, at once to London, as affording the best chance for concealment, and took a quiet lodging in a remote part of the town, far from his previous haunts. Here he and his companions agreed to remain for some time, in order to repose themselves for awhile, and mature their plans for the future; an arrangement which suited the mountebank and the warder Brandt exceedingly well, seeing that the expense was borne by Mike, and that it gave the former time for his air to grow again. Like Sampson, he felt he was not half himself, shorn of the hirsute honours of his head.

Although Fiddler Dick had always shown a peculiar pride in his air, it was not vanity alone that in the present instance prompted him to watch with all but parental fondness, the reappearance of two tender little sprouting corkscrew curls, which formerly dangled in well iled luxuriance, one by the side of each ear; prudence had something to do with it—for the Chatham, like the Brixton crop, is so well known to the police, that an experienced officer can tell by a glance at which of the establishments a gentleman's hair had last been cut.

We remember, during that delightful parody upon a republic which our lively Gallic neighbours got up a few years since, for the amusement and astonishment of Europe, a similar fashion being introduced in France; the mode of wearing the hair became the type of party. The principles of the citizen whose locks were cropped à la Brutus—Anglice, à la Brixton—admitted of no dispute; whilst, on the contrary, long curls and the beard à la Henri Quatre were considered unmistakable signs of aristocracy and disaffection. As a matter of course, neither the mode nor the form of government identified with it could last. The hair-dressers, who found their interests compromised, felt disgusted with both. Some persons, not behind the scenes, attribute the fall of the republic to Louis Napoleon. Let every man enjoy his own opinion; we know the influence which really brought about the coup d'état, and had we been consulted, might possibly have suggested the means of avoiding it.

Had the National Assembly, instead of indulging in long, dreary harangues, consulted, as they ought to have done, the genius of the people for whom they legislated—vide Archbishop Whately's "Logic"—and invented a more becoming mode of wearing the hair—something piquant, bizarre, ravissant, bien original—France might have remained republican to the present day to amuse us still.

Not that England has the least cause to complain of the empire in the last respect, and it would be singularly ungrateful to hint at such a thing.

Before any of our readers are rash enough to dissent from our proposition, or suspect us of advancing it in jest, let them reflect how much the charming Empress Eugénie has done to establish her husband's dynasty by the invention of crinoline.

But to return from our digression. Well, there—it is a dreadful habit; we admit it, and, having said our mea culpa, promise to offend no more.

It was cautiously and by slow degrees that the two worthies proceeded to unfold their project to Brandt. Not that they gave him credit for entertaining many scruples—like their own, his conscience was a convenient one; but at present he had given no proof that it would stretch to burglary, or possibly, to a still darker crime.

When fairly informed of their purpose, the ex-gaoler's only anxiety appeared to regard the chances of success and probable amount of plunder; satisfied on these points, he made no further objection, but at once consented to assist in the scheme of robbing the Home Farm.

He had preceded them in their journey to St. Faith's only a day before, in order to ascertain whether the steward was absent from his home or not, and to make such inquiries and observations as might prove useful to them.

On reaching the croft, an extensive field between the farm and the common, Mike touched the arm of his companion—a signal for him to pull up.

"Is this the place?" growled Fiddler Dick.

The old convict pointed to the house, which was plainly to be seen in the moonlight.

"And where is Brandt?" added the speaker.

"Oh! he can't be far off," was the reply.

Mike gave a sharp, peculiar whistle—something resembling the cry of a bird—and the next instant their confederate made his appearance from the other side of the hedge.

"All right?" inquired the mountebank.

"The steward is at the farm, and I have sawn through the bars of the shutters, as you directed," replied the ex-gaoler; "but I am not all right; my teeth are chattering with the frost; and I dared not venture a second time into the village—the hobnails questioned me enough this morning when I arrived there."

"It is cold," said Mike, complacently. "A drop of this will warm you."

The speaker handed him his pocket flask, which was half filled with spirits. Brandt eagerly drank off the contents.

"Why, you have drained it all!" exclaimed the ruffian, with a chuckle.

"And little enough, too," answered the man. "I wish you had been watching and shivering behind that infernal hedge as long as I have, that's all."

"Well, well," observed Fiddler Dick, in an ironical tone, "it will soon be over, now; take the rug out of the cart, wrap yourself up in it whilst I and Mike crack the crib."

"You won't be long—I feel plaguy sleepy," muttered Brandt.

Instead of appearing angry at the speaker's expressing an inclination to sleep at such a time, his confederates seemed highly amused at the idea; and, after securing the horse to one of the branches of a stunted pollard growing near, advanced cautiously towards the house, Mike, being acquainted with the place, leading the way.

The abode of Andrew Silex was one of those old-fashioned residences, half mansion, half farm, which were so common in England, and which may still be found in remote nooks and corners of the country.

It had been intended originally, we believe, as a residence for the dowager ladies Boothroyd, but if so, a century at least must have elapsed since it had been occupied by any one of them, for the building had been permitted to fall into decay, and a wing, the foundation of which might still be traced on the north side, now the principal entrance, pulled down.

On the south was the large bay window, belonging to the oak-room, the sanctum of the old steward, his chamber being directly over it. The rooms occupied by the housekeeper and farm servants, were situated on the opposite side of the house.

Mike was perfectly aware of his brother's habit of passing the greater portion of the night in the oak-room, to watch over his treasures, and had taken his measures accordingly.

Like most sullen and revengeful natures, he anticipated with delight the moment when he should have his respectable and affectionate twin completely in his power, and repay him for the years of misery he had endured at the hulks.

The debt, if not morally, was at least partially a just one; and the old convict was the very person to exact it to the last stiver.

For several days, Andrew Silex had been in a state of pleasing excitement; he and Lady Boothroyd had come to an understanding at last; the codicil to his first master's will, by which, in the event of Sir Norman's death without male heirs, the property was to be equally divided between his female issue and that of Allan Boothroyd, was to be given up, and the price of its concealment paid.

To be sure, the sum he had agreed to accept was not near so large as the one he had once calculated upon, but then he was getting old, and could not afford to wait any longer; besides, he had no Lillian to produce. Mike had checkmated him in that game; and he considered that, under all the circumstances, he had made the best of the affair. As he had arranged to start the following morning at an early hour for London, Andrew retired sooner perhaps than usual to the oak room, in order to look over his papers, and take additional precautions for the security of his badly-earned wealth.

Had not his attention been absorbed in the contemplation of his treasure, as he knelt over the chest which we had occasion to describe in a former chapter, the old miser might have noticed how the candles upon the table flared in their sockets; but he saw nothing but his gold, felt nothing but the glittering pieces as he counted them. No wonder that the current of air from the half-opened shutter escaped his observation, especially as it was somewhat broken by the heavy moreen curtain drawn before the window.

"Only to think," he muttered, as he drew from a packet of parchments the codicil to his first master's will, "that this scrap of paper should be worth fifteen thousand pounds!"

Little did the wretched man imagine that other ears drank in his words.

"With this," added Andrew, still speaking, as he thought, to himself, "I could blight the memory of the dead, blast the reputation of the living, and—well! well!—money is better than revenge; and, after all, fifteen thousand pounds is not to be despised."

There were two listeners behind the curtain who thought so too.

"And after all," continued the old man, falling into a cynical vein, "what can I do with it? I must die one day or another, and can't take it with me; there is the drawback—the bitterness of being rich. We toil that others may spend,—sin that others may enjoy the fruit of our crime."

"Think of your relations, Andrew!" exclaimed a well-known voice, in a chuckling tone.

The steward started to his feet; but before he could call for assistance, or utter a single cry, an iron grasp fastened round his throat, and he was forced upon his knees again.

Whilst engaged with the contents of the chest, the two ruffians had crept from their place of concealment and secured him.

"Take the knife," whispered Fiddler Dick to his companion, "it is in my left-hand pocket; it won't do for me to let go my hold."

"Not yet," answered Mike, who had been quietly barring the door; "there is no hurry, is there? Andrew, we must have a little brotherly conversation first; I have not thanked yer yet for the year's board and residence ye wor good enough to provide me. To be sure, government paid the bill; but yer kindness wor none the less."

Andrew Silex uttered a half-stifled groan, and there was an expression of agony in his dull gray eyes which amused his affectionate twin exceedingly.

"Stash it," muttered the mountebank.

"Not yet," repeated his confederate; "let him taste it, as I have done."

Mike walked to the still open chest, and began filling his pockets with gold and notes, till his brother, mad and desperate at being plundered thus before his eyes, made violent efforts to release himself.

"Take it quietly," said his tormentor; "I was obliged to do so. How much did yer say this dokerment was worth? Fifteen thousand pounds? Too much money, Andrew, to have been honestly come by."

"The knife, I say!" exclaimed Fiddler Dick, whose patience began to give way. "Are yer mad?"

"Yer shall have it in a minute," replied his companion in crime; "can't yer let a pal have a little quiet enjoyment. I'd ha' done more nor that for you, Andrew," he added, chinking a handful of gold in the face of the unhappy man. "How is mushrooms?"

Andrew uttered a second groan, much fainter than the first; his breath was fast failing him, beneath the pressure of the mountebank's fingers, which encircled his neck like a collar of iron.

"And the worthy housekeeper wot cooks 'em so well," added Mike; "she'll be rayther surprised in the mornin', I'm thinkin'."

Here Fiddler Dick declared with an oath that he would hold the steward no longer. Mike heard him with regret; for, like the tiger, he felt a savage pleasure in prolonging the torments of his victim. As his confederate was not a person to be trifled with, he consented, although with reluctance, to abridge his enjoyment, and thrusting his hand into the mountebank's left-hand pocket, drew forth the knife.

A film came over the sight of Andrew Silcox as he saw his brother deliberately open it.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.—CHRONOLOGY.

In the history of particular nations we are continually meeting with computations of time, which, in order to make them intelligible to us, we must reduce to our ordinary chronology.

In the history of the Chaldean kings, the writer (Berosus) computes by Sari, Neri, and Sosi. These measures of time, though well understood in the age of the historian, are unknown to us, any further than that they are certain collections of years, the number of which we are unable to ascertain.

The Jubilees and Sabbatical years of the Jews are better understood, and of far more importance than these Chaldean computations. As among the Jews, every seventh day was holy and a day of rest, so every seventh year was a Sabbath for the ground, which the people were neither to sow nor reap. Thus, there were weeks of years as well as weeks of days. The year of Jubilee was held every fiftieth year (Lev. xxv. 10), and was a year of universal joy and festivity, being marked by the reversion of all mortgaged estates to their original owners, and the emancipation of all Hebrew slaves.

Amongst the ancient Greeks, the method of computation was by Olympiads. An Olympiad was a period of four years, at the expiration of which the Olympic games were celebrated, near Olympia, in Peloponnesus. They are said by some to have been instituted by Hercules, in honour of Jupiter; but being afterwards discontinued, they were revived by Iphitus, 776 years before Christ. From this time they were continued without interruption, and became the periods from which the Greeks computed their years.

The Lustrum was a Roman institution, and employed by them to signify a space of five years. It took its rise from the institution of the census by Servius Tullius. By the order of this king, the number of the people, and the value of their estates, were taken every fifth year; and at the completion of the census a sacrifice was offered for the sins of the people, and the ceremony was called lustrum, from a word signifying paying, expiating, or clearing.

Epochs are certain fixed points of time, from which our computations may begin, and to which other calculations may be referred. Where different epochs are used, as is frequently the case in history, we must have some common measure by which to compare them together, and discover what relation they bear to one another. The Creation of the World, the Deluge, the Olympiads, the Building of Rome, the Birth of Christ, are all celebrated eras in history. But it is evident that before we can arrive at any just conception of the connection of these events, we must throw the whole train of past events into one connected series.

This is accomplished by what is known as the Julian period. It would be beyond our purpose to enter into any explanation as to the computation therein adopted, or the theory on which those computations are founded. It will suffice to state that the first year of the Christian era coincides with the year 4714 of the Julian period; and that, according to the commentators, 4,713 years had elapsed before that event. If, therefore, to any year of our Lord's nativity (commonly represented by the initials A.D., Anno Domini, in the year of the Lord) we add 4,713, that will be the year of the Julian period answering to the given year of the Christian era. Thus, the present year of our Lord, 1858, is 6571 of the Julian period. The Turks compute their year from what is called the Hegira. This takes its rise from the occasion of the flight of Mahomet from Mecca. The first year of the Hegira corresponds with A.D. 622; this number added to 4713, gives 5335, the year according to the Julian period.

The reduction of the year and epoch after the Christian era to the Julian period is extremely easy. Those which precede it cost a little more time, it being necessary to ascertain the year before the birth of Christ in which they took place. As soon as we have ascertained this, we have only to subtract that number from 4713, and the result given is the corresponding Julian period. The Olympiads began B.C. (before Christ) 776, which, subtracted from 4714, leaves 3938 for the year of the Julian period. Rome, according to Bishop Usher, was founded B.C. 748, this number taken from 4714 leaves 3966, the year of the Julian period corresponding to that of the building of Rome.

It is only by thus comparing dates with some fixed standard that we can arrive at anything like a connected view of the progress of history. By the use of such a standard we can compare events occurring at one part of the world with circumstances taking place at another, and can bring our historical reading into a connected and consistent form. By keeping this general plan constantly in mind, we are enabled to read our historians with much more advantage than could otherwise be the case. The knowledge we thus acquire of the general course of ages preserves our facts unconfused, and enables us to digest our historical reading by referring each event to that period to which it properly belongs.

OR, AN EASY METHOD OF LEARNING FRENCH.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"I HOPE that to-day you can tell me the names of all the colours in French," said George to Robert, when next the friends met.

"Oh yes, I recollect them all, that is all you dictated to me," answered the pupil; "but you did not say what the French for pink was."

"In French," replied George, "pink is rose, and rose, like all other colours, is of the masculine gender; but when rose means a flower, bear in mind it is feminine, la rose, the rose; le rose, the colour we call pink. I have not much more to say about colours, except to direct your attention to the changes some of them undergo, when used for feminine substantives. Blanc, which becomes blanche; jaune, yellow; olive, olive; pourpre, purple; and rouge, red, are the same in both genders; but brun, brown; gris, gray; and vert, green; becomes feminine in the general way, viz., by the addition of e to the masculine.

"Flowers and colours seem to present themselves to the mind at one and the same time, so you may as well add to your vocabulary the names of some of these ornaments of creation, so often considered as emblems of the ladies."

"To-day's exercise is on numeral adjectives; and, in order to write French correctly, you must, among many other rules, pay particular attention to the following ones:—

"The word 'hundred,' cent, takes the plural termination, provided it is not followed by another number, for instance, 'Two hundred months,' 'Deux cents mois.' But 'Two hundred and one months,' would be written, 'Deux cent-un mois.' In like manner, 'Eighty boys' would be 'Quatre-vingts garçons,' and 'Eighty-two boys,' 'Quatre-vingt-deux garçons.' But, if used instead of an ordinal adjective, cent does not take the plural; thus, 'A great conqueror died in the year 800,' you must translate thus, 'Un grand conquérant mourut en l'an huit cent.' I have already touched upon the subject of the word 'A thousand,' mille, when employed in dates. You may recollect it is written mil if other numbers follow it. The year '1858' may be written 'mil huit cent cinquante-huit,' or 'Dix-huit cent cinquante-huit.'

The word mille, meaning mile, forms its plural by the addition of s.

In French, and is not used with adjectives of number, excepting for the sake of sound in such cases as 'vingt-et-un,' 'twenty-one,' &c.

"Let us now go on with the 'Voyage à Paris,' and I shall make it the means of telling you something about the Post-office.

LE VOYAGE À PARIS.

L'HÔTEL DE LILLE ET D'ALBION.

Gentlemen, I hope you slept well last night? Messieurs, j'espère que vous avez bien passé la nuit? Perfectly; and now we are excessively hungry. Parfaitement; et nous avons une faim de loup.* Breakfast awaits you. Le déjeuner vous attend. We do not wish to breakfast until we have been to the post-office. We expect news from England. Non ne voulons pas déjeuner avant d'avoir été à la poste aux lettres. Nous attendons des nouvelles de l'Angleterre. In that case, take your passport. En ce cas, prenez votre passe-port. If you do not show your passport, they may refuse you your letters at the post-office. Si vous ne montrez pas votre passe-port, on pourra refuser de vous donner vos lettres à la poste. Sir, I expect a letter addressed "poste restante" coming from London. Monsieur, j'attends une lettre poste restante, venant de Londres. Have the goodness to tell me your name? Veuillez me dire votre nom?

* Faim de loup, literally, "the hunger of a wolf," meaning excessive hunger.

† Poste restante is the principal post-office in any town. As travellers leaving their country cannot always tell their friends for certain at what hotel they will stop, the best way is to direct that letters should be addressed to them at the poste restante of any town where they are expected to arrive. The letters remain at the poste restante till called for.

‡ Veuillez, the second person plural of the imperative mood of the verb vouloir, "to will." It has the same effect as "have the goodness to." It is an elegant mode of expression, and one we recommend to our pupils.

At seven o'clock every evening.
Would you have the kindness

FRENCH PRONUNCIATION.—

OF THE SOUND u.

This sound has no corresponding one in English; it is similar to that of u, but a little broader, as in the French words flûte, flûte, nous fûmes, we were, crû, grown, &c.

This sound is also the result of the following combinations:—eu, in nous eûmes, we had; ue, in gue, homlock.

The circumflex accent is the result of the suppression of the letter s after the vowel u, as it was in the ancient orthography; thus, nous fûmes is now written nous fumes, we were; flûte is written flute, &c.

Thus the sound u is represented by û, u, ue, &c.

NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.—LESSON XXII.

MICROSCOPES (Continued).

565. How is the magnified object seen?—It is received on a screen in the dark room, placed at the distance of 20 or 30 feet from the microscope, and is visible from all parts of the room.

566. How much does a good solar microscope magnify?—About 10 million times; that is, it would take 10 million animalcules to fill up the spot on the screen that is occupied by the image of one of them.

567. Mention some of the astonishing results that have been obtained with the solar microscope.—The most diminutive insects are magnified into creatures of large size. A drop of vinegar is seen thronged with cels, and a film of stagnant water becomes a large pool, in which a host of strange animals are darting about and preying on one another.

568. Mention other remarkable results. — The delicate and intricate structure of plants and flowers is distinctly seen, and the wonderful processes of crystallisation, from the beginning to the close, go on before the eye.

FIG. 11.

569. What is the second method of illuminating objects that are to be magnified?—By concentrating on them the light of a lamp.—This is the arrangement in the Magic Lantern.

570. What objects are put near the focus of the magnifying lens?—Small pictures, painted in transparent colours on glass.

571. Why is the apparatus represented in Fig. 41 called a magic lantern?—Because of the astonishing effects and wonderful illusions that may be produced by it. The figure represents the magic lantern and the arrangement of the lens. A is the reflector; B and C, lenses; and D the painted slide.

572. What is the best and most convenient form of microscope for the careful examination of minute objects?—The Compound Microscope. The object is seen through two lenses placed at the ends of a tube about seven inches long.

573. What is the magnifying power of COMPOUND
microscopes?—They have been made to magnify 3,000 times, and to show lines marked on glass so close together that 80,000 of them would occupy only an inch.

Fig. 42.

THE TELESCOPE.

574. What is the construction of the common telescope for viewing the heavenly bodies?—It consists of two lenses placed at the opposite ends of a long tube.

575. What are these called?—The smaller one, into which the eye looks, is called the eye-glass, and the other the object-glass.

576. What is the diameter of the object-glass called?—The aperture of the telescope; the quantity of light coming from the object, that enters the telescope and passes on to the eye, depends upon the size of this lens.

577. How does a telescope enable us to see distant objects more distinctly?—The object-glass forms an image of the object at its focus within the tube, and the eye-glass magnifies that image, just as a pocket microscope magnifies the letters of a book.

578. How does the telescope enable the astronomer to see remote objects in the heavens, which are not visible to the naked eye?—The object-glass is much larger than the pupil of the eye, and condenses into a small space near the eye a much larger quantity of light than the naked eye would receive.

579. What is the power of a telescope to reveal remote, invisible objects called?—Its space-penetrating power.

580. How is the magnifying power of a telescope ascertained?—By dividing the focal length of the object-glass by the focal length of the eyeglass. For example: if the former were 20 feet and the latter 1 inch (or one twelfth of a foot), the magnifying power would be 12 times 20, or 240.

581. Long telescopes must then be more powerful than short ones—does not the real effectiveness and value of a telescope depend also upon the size of the object-glass?—It does; a telescope of large aperture furnishes more light, and thus admits of the use of a more powerful eye-glass. We have already seen that it is more effective for the discovery of remote invisible objects.

DEAD AND ALIVE.

DEAD?—and what was that death?

There was the sound of weeping about my couch, tears fell like rain upon my face, lips pressed mine with passionate kisses. Surely I was dreaming.
And yet for hours I had been striving to shake off the spell of that horrible vision—for vision it was.
For hours I had struggled with the strange torpor that was upon me, the torpor that benumbed my limbs, chilled my blood, and stagnated my pulses.

For hours I had heard that desolate sound of sobbing, felt the tears dropping on my forehead, the pressure of caressing lips against my own. I had heard my mother's voice calling my name in tones of agonising entreaty, and tried in vain to answer her. My father had lifted me in his arms, pressed my face against his bearded cheek, chafed my cold hands, called me by all the pet names I had ever known, and when I gave him no response, he laid me back upon my pillow, and, kneeling beside the bed, sobbed and trembled with the strength of his great grief. My little sisters had stood on tiptoe by my side, smoothed back the hair from my forehead pitily with their dimpled fingers, hushed the glad music of their childish voices into silence, and lisp'd that terrible word whose meaning had always been a mystery to them—death!

Death! What had death to do with me? Was I not alive? Could the dead hear?—could the dead feel?—could the dead think? How slowly dawned the fearful truth upon my mind! How long, how fiercely, how resolutely I combated the cruel reality of my situation!
How eagerly I tried to convince myself that I was indeed dreaming all the while; that I should awaken soon from that disturbed slumber; that I should remember the sobbing, the tears, the wild words, as only the bitter ingredients of a troubled vision! How lingeringly hope gave way to fear, and fear lapsed into the dead calmness of despairing certainty! I knew it all at last.

It was the second morning of May. I had been out the whole day before, with my mates, gathering flowers. All the dewy morning, the quiet forenoon, and the long, golden afternoon, we wasted wandering in the cool, shadowy old wood, winding our hats with festoons of evergreen, and crowding our hands with the pink and white blossoms of the sweet arbutus.
I was very, very weary when I reached home at twilight, too weary even to taste the tempting supper which waited for me; so tossing my flowers idly upon the table, I went up to my room, and throwing aside my hat and shawl, flung myself upon my couch.
But the delicious repose I had anticipated did not come to me. My weariness increased rather than diminished. It seemed as if a belt of iron girdled my head—as if a hand of ice was pressing coldly against my heart. I did not attempt to account for the unnatural sensations I experienced, attributing them all to my excessive fatigue, and supposing they would of course pass away with that. Lying thus, I fell into a kind of stupor, a stupor that seemed like the approach of sleep, and yet was not sleep; a feeling of numbness, of languor, of oppressive drowsiness, and then followed unconsciousness.

When I awoke, it was to hear every member of the collected household lamenting me as one dead.
I tried to answer them, to force my rigid lips into speech, to open my shut eyes, or move my heavy arms—but in vain. My will had no control over my body. I felt that girdle of iron still about my head —that hand of ice still crushing my heart; and every effort I made to release myself from the spell but tightened their death-like pressure. I thought I was in a nightmare; but no nightmare ever lasted like that. I could give no solution to the mystery of my utter feebleness. I had read often of persons lying for weeks in trances that had every appearance of death, of men and women buried alive; and finally the awful thought forced itself home upon my mind
—I was to be the victim of a like fate! I, like them, was doomed to have the sunlight, the blessed air, the sights and sounds of life shut out from me for ever, before my time! I, too, was to suffocate in a living tomb, to revive, perhaps, at the last moment, only to strangle and writhe and die in my narrow coffin home. The white shroud-plaits would be folded across my bosom while a living heart was beating underneath. The coffin-lid would be fastened down above my face, the green sods piled upon my breast, while death lingered a truant on his way, to torture me. The thought was anguish most maddening, terror most awful, agony the most unendur-able.

The family physician came, and laid his hand professionally upon my heart. How bitter were my feelings towards him when he turned away and assured my weeping friends, in his cool, methodical, business tones, as if it were the commonest matter in the world that there was no life remaining. Oh, the sufferings of that moment! Passionately I strove to signify that I was not dead—strove to gasp, to stir, to unclose my eyes, to speak even in the faintest whisper. No motion, not so much as the tremor of an eyelid—no sound, not even an audible breath, rewarded my eager efforts.

The May wind, fresh and cool from the meadow lands, came in and drifted mockingly across my face. I could hear the crimson-breasted robins calling to each other from the budding hawthorn. I knew when the sunlight came and crept over my chamber floor, till it slanted in a golden line across my forehead. And then kind hands closed the blinds and drew the curtains closely over the windows. The room was hushed and darkened, and I was left alone, alone with my dead and living self.

Hours went by while I lay there; hours that seemed concentrated into so many seconds, so precious had time grown to me. Every moment carried me nearer my living sepulchre, further from the faint possibility of resuscitation. The family clock struck the passing hours; every stroke was like a knell to me. Ten, eleven, twelve, one, two—and then another sound broke the awful stillness of my chamber. God of heaven, the village bell was tolling! Intuitively I knew what it had to tell. I tried to think of something else, to shut from my hearing the horrid sound. As well might I have bidden an angel to my rescue. With an exquisite self-torture I counted the strokes. Every one smote upon my ear like a human-blow. It tolled my age—nineteen years! Reason deserted me then; hope fainted within my heart; my soul reeled on the shores of consciousness, and all was blank.

Days passed before I knew more; days in which I was the same as dead—speechless, motionless, senseless. But my misery was not to be of so short duration. I revived to an intenser horror, a blacker fear. I knew that I was no longer in my own chamber; that my limbs were composed for burial; that my hands were folded stiffly upon my bosom, my hair combed back straightly, and that there were flowers on my breast and about my head. I heard voices and footsteps in the room, and once or twice a face bent down above me so closely that I could feel a warm breath on my cheek.

"How lifelike she looks; poor Mellie!"

It was the voice of Lucia Maynard, my dearest friend, who spoke. Lifelike, indeed!—why should I not? No words could have been a more exquisite mockery, and for a moment I hated her for speaking them.

"Do you know how the doctor explained her sudden death?" inquired another voice, one which I did not recognise.

"He attributed it to a disease of the heart, I understand," was the answer.

"What a sad death to die, and she so young, too! Her family are very much distressed by this sudden stroke."

"And Guy Edson, I hear, is well nigh distracted."

"Guy Edson, who is he?"

"Why, is it possible you have not heard? He was her betrothed lover, and they were to have been married in the autumn."

"Indeed; how sad!"

And so they talked and gossiped carelessly, little dreaming that their idle words fell upon ears to which listening had become torture. Guy Edson well nigh distracted! Even in my own mad intensity of anguish, I had time to pity him. I knew he loved me, truly, fervently, almost idolatrously. I was to have been his wife so soon—how he would miss me! And I, so young, so full of hope and strength and vigour, should go down to the grave, the victim of a living death; while thousands to whom existence was a misery, would live out their allotted years. No one would ever know what I had suffered. The grass would grow above me, the birds sing, the flowers blossom, and I should pass out of remembrance as so many passed before me. And Guy, my Guy, might live till he, too, learned to forget me. Possibly, after a while, when the wound in his heart had healed somewhat, he might find another woman to share the home that had been planned for me; another's head perhaps would lie on his breast; another's children climb his knee and call him father. Merciful Heaven!—could I not break the stony calmness that petrified me?

"Hush, there comes Mr. Edson!"

The voice was again Lucia's. Dumb as I was under the burden of that fearful stupor, her words sent a quick thrill through my blood. Guy coming! Yes, I heard his well known footstep at the door—on the carpet—by my side. Perhaps he would know that I was not dead. One by one, as if respecting his claim to solitude, the various persons in the room stole softly away, leaving us alone together. Then the restraint which had kept him silent before so many curious eyes gave way; the great grief of his manly heart burst forth in sobs and tears. He drew me up into his arms with a clasp so close that I could count every pulsation of his heart. My head fell heavily against his shoulder, the crown of flowers brushed his cheek. Passionately he rained kisses upon my lips and cheeks and sealed eyelids; caressingly he smoothed my hair, and wound its shining curls about his fingers, as he had been wont to do in his tenderest moments.

But no bashful flush crept into the cheeks that always before had reddened beneath his kisses; no words broke over the pale lips that never before had failed to give him welcome. If I could have thrown off, even for a moment, the dead weight which paralysed me; if I could have wound my arms but once more about his neck, spoke a single word of tenderness in his ear, laid my lips for a single instant to his, I would have been content. But even that precious privilege was beyond my power. I could utter no soft farewell, bestow no parting caress. Mountains were light in comparison with the powerless arms I yearned so madly to lift; granite more yielding than the lips I struggled so fiercely to part.

And so I was forced to lie there like a weight of marble on his breast; forced to listen to the outbursts of his wild sorrow, and receive passive by caresses that my whole soul longed to answer. I could have torn my heart from my bosom for a single glance into the blue eyes whose hot tears had bedewed my forehead. I could have spurned my hope of heaven, if so he might have known he held a living form in his embrace. I cursed myself, my fate; I wrestled with the unutterable fear that cramped my heart. I prayed with vehement earnestness and despairing strength. I called on God, and flung accusations of cruelty in his holy face. I besought him to give me the life he had half robbed me of, or else make that bitter, unendurable mockery of death a reality. I implored him to shut upon me the gates of sense; to give me oblivion, night, nothingness.

Then there came a revulsion. I wondered if I were not really dead as they said I was. Perhaps I was to suffer an eternity of just such torture as that; to crumble into dust under the mouldy sods, yet have no power to divide my conscious soul from its rotting tenement of clay. Perhaps the grass, heaving like green billows all over the broad earth's bosom, held each a spirit tormented like mine with consciousness.

Then there came another change, the quiet apathy of unutterable despair. All the sounds of outward life became suddenly infinitely precious to me. As a miser might count his gold when he sees it slipping from his grasp, so I counted greedily the passing moments which still intervened between me and my horrible destiny. All over the house I could hear the murmur of subdued voices, the sound of hushed footsteps, as though I had fallen into a sleep from which they feared to waken me. Through the windows came the breezy murmur of winds and leaves, the singing of birds, the low din of village life, the voices of children at play;—how they mocked me!

My coffin was brought in and placed upon the parlour table. I heard the lid turned back upon its hinges. Once more I was clasped closely to my lover's heart; once more a rain of tender kisses fell upon my face; and then he gave me into the hands that waited to lay me in my coffin. Carefully, very carefully they placed my head back on its white pillow, yet their slow, gentle movement seemed to me like the most indecent haste. I would have sold my soul for a moment of time, for a single instant's delay of that cruel preparation.

I know not how it happened, but when they were composing the shroud over my limbs, a careless arm jostled the coffin. The heavy cover dropped down with a crash and a jar. The glass lid shivered into atoms, and a shower of fine, sharp particles fell upon my face. My flesh tingled painfully at the contact; a drop of blood oozed from my temple and trickled down upon the pillow. I heard it fall, and blessed instinctively the wound that caused it. My heart leaped with a thrill of rapture—O Heaven, how blissful! The sluggish blood moved in my veins; my stagnant heart throbbed; a spasm of returning life trembled through all my limbs; I gasped, breathed, saw, moved! My lips parted; I sat up—right; I called faintly—"Guy!"

A rapid glance of surprise, an expression of unutterable rapture, a bound, a cry, and he was by my side. I trembled in his arms, nestled against his heart. The deliciousness of sensation came back to me; the bewildering phantoms of deathly torpor fled away. I lived, I laughed hysterically; I wept tears of passionate gladness and heartfelt gratitude; and when, a few moments later, father, mother, sisters, friends, and the one dearer to my heart than all, stood breathless with hope and joy by my side, there was not a single eye that did not glisten with tears of thanksgiving; no face that did not shine with intense happiness; no voice that did not echo the ecstatic, thankful cry of mine—"God be praised!"

THE MIDNIGHT WRECK.

Down bath the brave ship
Down in the deep;
Mad billows thundering on,
Break not the sleep
Of the true-hearted brave,
Who, when no hand could save,
Tossed by the whirling wave,
Went to destruction hurled.
Down in the deep!

Heard ye the 'frighted shriek?
Heard ye the gun?
Saved from that midnight wreck,
Is there not one?
No!—quickly, silently,
'Neath the night-blackened sky,
Seen by no mortal eye,
Wrapped in the arms of sleep,
Found they their grave!

Ah, who can tell the hearts
Sundered for aye?
Tender hearts, generous hearts,
Doomed to decay!
Who, of the fearful eyes,
Watching 'neath other skies,
For the dear one who lies
Locked in death's sleep,
Coldly and silently
Down in the deep?

Souls of the fated brave,
Peacefully rest!
Lightly, O stormy wave,
Lie on each breast!
Speak of their fate with tears,
Think of them through the years,
Who, 'mid the ocean-storm,
Went to their rest.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ARCHDALE WILSON.

THE year Eighteen hundred and fifty-seven will be memorable in the annals of our history. One disastrous event especially distinguishes it. We refer to the revolt of the native troops of India. Many years must elapse ere the effects of that great military outbreak will cease to be felt, as it threatened to annihilate our supremacy in the East, as it plunged our Indian possessions into all the horrors of civil war, and was marked by the atrocious massacre, and worse than massacre, of our countrymen.

Cawnpore! what a ghastly picture is evoked by the mere mention of that name. The dusty street, and old brick houses with their wooden balconies, may appear as they have done before; in the red hot glare of a summer's noon, swarthy, half-clad men, with white turbans, may be looking in vain for a cooling shadow; the peculiar rich produce of the surrounding country—maize, wheat, barley, may glisten like fields of gold; the old assembly-room may wear again its common aspect, and the Ganges flow placidly—unstained by blood—towards the sea; but, though everything appears as fair as it was formerly, the story of a certain well hard by cannot be forgotten. There lie the victims of treachery and cruelty the worst that fiends could suggest, or men could put in practice. There lie the mutilated remains of unoffending and defenceless women—wives, daughters, sisters of the best and bravest of our race.

But with the story of the massacre at Cawnpore is connected a brilliant passage in military history, and a name which will ever remain as a household word amongst us. We connect it with the victorious march of the gallant Havelock. We remember with gratitude the "men of iron" who rushed like an irresistible sea, swept away every obstacle, and put to flight the treacherous sepoys.

Delhi also was the scene of acts of determined heroism. That city of iniquity—whose name suggests a thousand fearful unknown things, and revives the memory of a thousand well-known atrocities—bore witness to the bravery of our men, as well as to the atrocity of the sepoys. In yonder palace scores of victims were sacrificed, while the old king—petted and caressed by the English—looked on well pleased. Here a whole family was slain, and here another, and here again a third! and there some of our men were buried alive! and yonder some of our women were crucified! everywhere such things were done as make the cheek pale and the heart sick. But together with these painful acts committed in Delhi by the rebel-sepoys, there are brilliant passages of arms. Availing themselves of every advantage which the defence of the city afforded, and profiting by the British discipline they had acquired, the sepoys offered no contemptible resistance; and when the brave band who witnessed his approach, were almost delirious with joy—they hung out their banners on the wall, and kindled immense bonfires; but their joy was suddenly changed into despair, for Philip, after vainly challenging Edward to come out and fight in the open field, withdrew.

Next day, the great banner of France, which had floated for eleven months from the loftiest tower of the city, was pulled down, and an English flag run up in its place, in token of surrender.

A parley was immediately held, between Sir Walter Manny on the part of the English, and John de Vienne, the governor of Calais. The latter pleaded hard for the lives and liberties of the citizens, as the sole condition of surrender; but Sir Walter assured him that King Edward was so much incensed at the long resistance he had met with, that no conditions would be made, and that young and old, rich and poor, regardless of sex, might expect to be put to the sword, as soon as the English troops marched in.

Sir Walter Manny, however, undertook to obtain what mitigation he could in favour of the starving citizens, and soon afterwards the news arrived that the English king had so far relaxed his purpose as to extend his clemency to the whole number, except six of the chief burgesses. These he required to come in the guise of criminals, in their shirts, bare-headed, bare-footed, carrying the keys of the city and castle in their hands, and with halters round their necks.

On the receipt of this message the consternation in the city was great. The people were struck with horror: all must perish unless six principal men would voluntarily lay down their lives for the rest. The great bell tolled from the church tower, and crowds assembled in the market-place to learn their fate. There was much weeping and lamentation; all shrank from the dreadful sacrifice; but at last a noble citizen stood up. All eyes were fixed upon him. It was Eustache St. Pierre.

"Gentlemen, great and small," he said, "he who shall save the people of this fair town at the cost of his own blood shall, doubtless, deserve well of God and man. I will be one who will offer my head to the King of England as a ransom for Calais. Who will be my fellows?"

Encouraged by this magnanimous proposal, another was speedily induced to follow his example; a third and a fourth presented themselves, and the whole number was speedily completed.

Stripped of their ordinary apparel, and clothed as malefactors, in compliance with the conditions dictated by the conqueror, these noble citizens, whose memory deserves to be held in veneration to the end of time, were led forth. They were accompanied by John de Vienne, who was so exhausted with wounds and fasting that he had to be mounted on a small palfrey; the men, women, and children, weeping bitterly, followed them to the gates, and as they passed out there was very great lamentation.

Eustache St. Pierre and his fellow victims were led into the presence of the English king. They were clothed as criminals, and the halters round their necks indicated the ignominious fate reserved for them; but they looked like heroes; their faces were radiant with that sublime heroism which distinguished the worthies of antiquity. They knelt down before the king and presented the keys, at the same time imploring his mercy. Edward, looking on them with extreme displeasure, ordered them to instant execution. On this the knights and nobles about him ventured to interfere. They besought him to have pity on these worthy men; they reminded him that his own honour would be tarnished by their death; but he sternly bade them be silent, and let the executioner do his work. Then the Prince of Wales, who had covered himself with so much glory on the field of Crecy, implored his royal father to take compassion on these citizens; but nothing moved the grim monarch. Impatient at the delay, he grew angry with those who pleaded. But there was one there who had watched the scene with interest and pity. It was Queen Philippa, the Soldier Queen, who, after defending the kingdom in her royal husband's absence, after winning a great victory, and taking the King of Scots prisoner, had hastened to France, herself the bearer of the good news. Her condition also at that time was such that the king must have been more insensible than a stone to refuse her. She fell on her knees before him—

"Ah, gentle sire," said she, "since I have crossed the seas in great dangers, I have asked nothing of thee; but now, I implore you, for the sake of the son of the Holy Mary, and for your love to me, that you will have mercy on these six men."

There was a moment's silence, and then the angry visage of the king relaxed. "Ah, dame," he said,

"I could well wish that you had been elsewhere this day; but how can I deny you anything? Take these men, and dispose of them as you will."

Eustache St. Pierre and his companions were congratulated on their escape, clothed in befitting attire, feasted in the Queen's tent, provided with money, and safely conducted to the town gates.

On the next day the English marched into the city in triumph. The inhabitants were immediately ordered to depart, a thoroughly English population was introduced, and Calais remained an English colony until the reign of Queen Mary.

The story of the six burgesses is related by Froissart, who dedicated his history to Queen Philippa herself. The circumstance—although doubted by some authors—appears highly probable, and mankind will not readily disbelieve a passage of human life so full of noble sacrifice and sympathy, and which has held its place in history and tradition for more than five hundred years.

HOPE EVERMORE;

OR,

SOMETHING TO DO.

A TALE OF THE RAGGED SCHOOLS.

CHAPTER XCIX.

The softest blush that nature spreads
Gave colour to her cheeks;
Such orient colour smiles through heaven
When May's sweet morning breaks.
Nor let the pride of great ones scorn
The charmers of the plains;
That sun which bids their diamonds blaze
To deck our lily dawns.
Long had she fired each youth with love,
Each maiden with despair,
And though by all a wonder owned,
Yet knew not she was fair
Till Edwin came, the pride of swains,
A youth that knew no art,
And from whose eyes, serenely mild,
Shone forth the feeling heart.—MALLET.

WE have said that Hope reckoned without her host (her noble host, the Marquis of Doun), when she imagined that with her rejection of his generous offer would end all attempts on his side to obtain her hand.

Had he not been really and deeply in love this would probably have been the case; but the sort of feeling with which our little simple, unworldly Hope had inspired this man—who was sated with dattery, who loathed deceit, and despised the hollow-hearted, empty-headed daughters of fashion—was not a feeling made up of vanity and an idle love of personal beauty; it was true, deep, first-love, full of delicate tenderness, respect, deference—nay, even reverence.

With such a love, had our little Hope Evermore—just seventeen, born in a hospital and reared in a ragged school—filled the heart of a nobleman, who had drained the cup of pleasure to the dregs, who had reached his fortieth year, and who would not have sued in vain for any of the loveliest daughters of the proudest peers of the realm.

Nor was it her beauty (much as he admired its soft lustre and maiden charm) that so enthralled him; it was her perfect purity of heart, her tender, loving, trustful disposition, her sweet humility, her simplicity, which had nothing coarse or rustic in its beautiful nature; her noble, fearless frankness, her unaffected piety; then, too, though not highly accomplished, like Nussy Fitz-Darrell, she had been carefully educated as a lady's companion, in addition to all the valuable teaching of the Green Fields Ragged School. There she had learnt the one thing needful, and many others very useful.

Miss Fitz-Darrell excelled in, and could display every kind of new and elegant fancy work; but she could not sew, or hem, or mend, or piece, or darn like Hope.

Hope, when a little creature of eight, could piece Bob Blossom's breeches better than Apple Blossom herself; and one day that they were all out far from home, the ladies having taken the gentlemen their luncheon, the marquis, in getting a branch of wild briar rose for Lady Glenlonely, tore his shepherd's plaid shooting jacket right in halves down the back. Nussy consoled, Lady Glenlonely laughed, but Hope, the ever ready, took out her lady's companion, and simply, kindly, and, without the slightest affectation, seating herself on the grass, in an incredibly short space of time repaired the rent so neatly that no one could detect the mend; and the marquis, when she handed it back to him, thought that henceforth that old shooting jacket would be dearer to him than any other garment in his wardrobe; and this little incident, of which no one else thought anything, occupied his heart and mind for many a day, aye, and night, too. Perhaps the greatest of Hope's charms was, at least in the eyes of one to whom it was so rare an attribute, her utter unconsciousness of her own powers to captivate and delight. "She never thought about herself at all."

If she was asked to sing, she did not, like Nussy, tire people out with excuses; she simply did her best. Her sweet young voice had been cultivated just enough to make it agreeable to the most fastidious ear, and every word was given clearly, and with exquisite taste and feeling.

In everything there was the same absence of effect, vanity, and display.

Nussy, on the contrary, was all vanity, ambition, effect, and show.

The marquis had met many a Nussy, of whom the greater number were of course much handsomer, and more refined. He had never met a Hope Evermore, and he felt certain that if he failed to secure this sweet specimen of "excelling nature," he should never meet with another.

We have said he was bent on marrying; and, however improbable and romantic it may appear to the reader—knowing as he does the forlorn and dependent position, the mysterious birth, and all the painful and humble antecedents of little Hope—that a great and wealthy nobleman should fall in love with her, and wish to marry her; yet when we remember that he met her first at Burnside, in the elegant home of Lord and Lady Glenlonely, treated by them as a child of their own, and with the education, dress, and belongings of a lady, it ceases to astonish that a man of taste and feeling should fall in love with her, without any close inquiry about her origin; and as to marry a woman he could really love was now the great object of Lord Doun's life, and Hope was the only woman he had ever felt he could love, it ceases to be a miracle that he resolved to propose to her at once.

He took it for granted that she was a lady, and he was too rich and too great to wish to aggrandise himself by marriage; indeed, it did even occur to him (all spoilt and flattered as he had been by the world and its women) that Hope, barely seventeen, might think him a little too old for her; but in his world such disparities never for a moment influence mothers or daughters, and he drove the thought from his mind, for of course we all judge of things as they are judged of in that little narrow circle in which we move.

But if he took everything with regard to Hope on trust, when first he met those large blue upturned eyes, in which Heaven seemed mirrored, after he had watched her, listened to her, and conversed with her, he felt for her a passionate devotion which nothing could have shaken. You might have told him then that her parents were unknown; that it was suspected that she was "the sinless child of sin;" that she was born in Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital, reared by a poor applewoman out of charity, and educated at a ragged school, till "in her eyes their ninth blue summer shone," he would not have been at that time deterred, as meaner natures and less fervent lovers might have been, by such revelations. He would have said, "Sweet angel Hope, if fortune has indeed been so cruel to this favourite of nature, if she has no name to insure her the world's respect, I will atone, and endow her with one I shall reverence." He would, probably, have subscribed munificently to the hospital where she first saw the light; have sought out and enriched the poor applewoman who had so kindly sheltered and reared his darling; and have for ever befriended the ragged school which had taught her all that was good and really worth knowing.

Loving her as he did, before he had known her a week, nothing would have lowered her in his eyes. He would have loved her all the more, and have cherished her the more tenderly, to atone for all she had suffered from iron fortune. And so it ever is with true love. If a man truly loves a woman, everything makes him love her better. If others praise and exalt, he loves her all the more; if they slander and neglect her, the result is the same. He loves the rose of health on her cheek; he loves the pale lily there that speaks of suffering and sickness; he loves her smiles; he loves her tears, her frowns, her caresses, her courage, her timidity, her eloquence and self-possession, her blushes and silent reserve, her simple muslins and her richest silks; a wild rose wreath in her hair, or a bandeau of gems on her brow—whatever forms part of her he adores, is adorable in his eyes, if he is really, truly, and passionately in love. And that the Marquis of Doun unquestionably was with little, loving, truthful, simple, and graceful Hope Evermore; our Hope—the Ragged School's Hope, and above all, Larky Grigg's dearest, fondest, most treasured Hope.

CHAPTER C.

These shall the fiery passions tear—
The vultures of the mind—
Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
And Shame that skulks behind;
Or pining Love shall waste their youth,
Or Jealousy with rankling tooth
That only gnaws the secret heart,
And Envy wan, and faded Care,
Grim-visaged, comfortless Despair,
And Sorrow's piercing dart.—GRAY.

"WHAT is the matter, Nussy?" said Hope, as the latter—pale, her eyes on fire, her teeth set, and her hands clenched—brushed past Hope on the landing, the second morning after the ball, and hurried into her own room, whither Hope followed her, repeating her question "What is the matter?"

"Go to Lady Glenlonely, Miss Evermore," said Nussy, in a voice so husky it could scarcely be recognised; "the post has come in, and my lady has received a letter from Captain Greville, which she, looking upon him, as every one else did, as my admirer—nay, suitor—thought it right to show me. It seems, you—artful, designing, venomous girl—you have wheedled him away from me! You have gazed at him with your upturned, staring eyes till you have made him believe you are in love with him; and men are vain, and my modest and dignified reserve he has perhaps construed into indifference; and now, having led him on to propose, he complains that you reject his proffered hand. He appeals to my lady: he begs her to plead his cause. No mention of me; no allusion to me. I—!" and here she burst into a passion of tears, "I who would have lived or died for him—I, whom he certainly admired, loved, and came here expressly to see; for you know he did, false, cruel, treacherous Hope!"

"Poor Nussy," said Hope, drawing near, and trying to take her hand. But Nussy turned upon her like a tigress at bay, her drops of tears she indeed turned to sparks of fire, as she cried—

"Leave me; touch me not, vile coquette, false, treacherous, heartless girl. If you loved him, I would forgive you; but you have by your arts won him from me, merely to reject him—got possession of his heart merely to break it. What is sport to you is death to me. Go, I loathe you; but I will be revenged yet. He shall know what you are—a penniless outcast, born in a hospital, bred up by the charity of an applewoman, educated in a ragged school."

"Where," said Hope, mildly, but firmly, "we were such friends and partners in poverty, such sisters in adversity, and such happy but yet hapless objects of poor, dear Apple Blossom's Christian charity and motherly kindness, that it ill becomes us to quarrel now about the capricious preference of a gay and worldly coxcomb."

"Don't talk of those dreadful, those disgraceful, those horrible days of burning shame and pinching poverty; and do not dare to put yourself on a level with me. Whatever the degrading miseries of my childhood, fortune has atoned. I am a young lady now. My uncle, Mr. Stone, of Stoneleigh, whose name I am to take directly I am twenty-one, has left between my brother and myself landed property which has been in the family of the Stones for centuries. I am an heiress; you are still as you were when it was my misfortune to meet you long years ago—a beggar: for what else is a fine lady's hired companion? But I forgive you this, and treated you as an equal; and I even let you see into my heart and read the secret of its love for Rashleigh. What I cannot forgive is your mean betrayal of one so confiding; your cruel coquetry; the arts by which you have supplanted me; the sly and remorseless cruelty with which you have robbed me without enriching yourself; for you well know (and hence your refusal, perhaps) that, when once Rashleigh knows who and what you really are, he would loathe the thought of marrying one so basely born, so beggarly an outcast."

Hope could have retorted. There was, as she well knew, in Nussy Darrell's history much that made her own story fair and honourable in comparison; but Hope's was the true charity that endureth all things. She saw agony unutterable in Nussy's distorted features; and when, suddenly starting to her feet, the wild, strange girl ordered her to leave her room, Hope went meekly and sadly away, resolved not to add, by one taunting, bitter word, to the misery of that wayward, passionate heart.

CHAPTER CI.

Believe me, prince, though hard to conquer love,
'Tis easy to divert and break its force;
Absence might cure it, or a second mistress
Light up another flame, and put out this.

ADDISON.

Hope knocked gently at Lady Glenlonely's door.

"Come in, dearest; I know it is my sweet, my only Hope," said her ladyship, in the gentlest voice and kindest tone imaginable.

"Dearest!" never before had Lady Glenlonely called Hope "dearest."

Hope, blushing deeply, entered noiselessly—she had the lightest foot possible, and always in the house was, or seemed to be, shod in velvet, all her movements were graceful and gentle, she never upset or knocked about anything.

Her voice was sweet and low, "an excellent thing in woman."

"Come here, my Hope," said her ladyship, and turning to her maid, who was brushing out her still fine hair of golden brown (here and there streaked with silver), she said, "Leave me now; Miss Evermore will, I dare say, be so kind as to finish brushing and combing my hair, and will help me to dress."

The maid went silently and with apparent readiness, but no sooner was the door closed than she murmured, "Stuck up puss, finely she'll comb your hair, my lady; but I'll comb hers in return, and no mistake; a chit of a companion, forsooth! Rag, as they may well call her, with all her fine airs and graces. Who did ever? Well, I never!" And on she muttered till she reached a looking-glass, when the reflection of her own charms drew her from that of Hope's delinquencies, and the servants' dinner bell found her still "setting out" her hair.

Meanwhile, neat-handed Hope deftly arranged her lady's head, and that done, the latter took out a letter and gave it to Hope to read.

Hope ran her eye over the following lines:—

"My dear Lady Glenlonely,

"I know you will not think I presume on your kindness, if I ask you to use your influence with your fair protégée, Miss Evermore, to induce her to reconsider a verdict which robs me of 'Hope' in every shape.

"I know it has been thought at Burnside (and I believe even by your ladyship) that the artificial graces of Miss Fitz-Darrell were the attraction that kept me in your delightful and most hospitable home. But I should as soon think of wearing an artificial rose in my bosom, when the sweetest of moss rosebuds was before me, as of giving one serious thought to Miss Fitz-Darrell in the presence of that sweet girl who, to the loveliest gifts of nature, adds the rare advantage of having had before her, in the shape of your ladyship, a bright model of all that is noblest, best, and most admirable in woman.

"I can conceive nothing so desirable for any young lady as to be allowed to pass the impressionable years of plastic youth in the benign presence of one gentle without apathy, dignified without hauteur, learned without pedantry, and supremely elegant without vanity or affectation.

"If Miss Evermore owes nature much, she owes Lady Glenlonely more.

"Being, then, what she is, and what you have made her, can you marvel that I covet one who in your garden has become the rose of the world! She is young, modest, coy—probably as yet knows not her own mind. And though she spoke of a prior attachment, I love to believe that nothing deserving of that name exists in her young heart; and that if some fleeting fancy for some rough being, unworthy of so fair and delicate a creature, should induce her seriously to decline proposals, which I think your ladyship (when I lay them before you) will not consider mean or unsuitable, you, madam, will deign to exert your influence, which must be boundless over Miss Evermore as over every one else, to make her give up a girlish predilection, which would be detrimental to her prospects. On your ladyship's advocacy I venture to rely, for what is in itself the sweetest of realities and dearest of Hopes.—I have the honour to be, madam, your ladyship's most devoted servant,

RASHLEIGH GREVILLE.

"I will present myself at Burnside this evening to know my fate. On you, kindest and most admirable of the noble ladies of the land, that fate depends."

"Well, my sweet Hope," said Lady Glenlonely, glancing from her mirror to the "young companion," whose eyes flashed through their tears, and whose cheeks burned at the disparaging reference to the object of her heart's deep love, "you see he wants to make me a match-maker, whether I will or no. Has he any chance?"

"None, my lady," replied Hope. "Not only, I do not like him, but as I think your ladyship knows, I love another."

"So I suspected, you wise and aspiring wild flower, and his name is the most noble the Marquis of Doun."

"No, my lady," said Hope, firmly and almost proudly, steadily meeting her ladyship's looks of wonder (half sham, half real), "his name is Gregory Blossom, but he is commonly called Larky Grigg."

Light and long, but very satirical and very mocking was the laugh into which Lady Glenlonely burst at these words.

Hope, as she stood opposite her ladyship (she had been early trained to do so), patient and passive, changed colour several times during this prolonged and most exasperating proof how very rude a very fine lady can be when she dares.

How could she have the heart so to insult and outrage the deep, true love of which she had long known the history, and which suffused with tears the eyes of the orphan—caused the blood to ebb and flow on the virgin cheek, the gentle bosom to heave convulsively, and the delicate frame to tremble violently?

Hope felt it to be most cruel; yet it was not unkindly meant. Lady Glenlonely thought to laugh Hope out of what she considered the extreme of girlish folly, and even madness. Lady Glenlonely had often been laughed out of what was wise, and right, and good herself, and she had great faith in a mocking laugh.

Pretending, at last, to check herself by a violent effort, and deliberately taking up her eye-glass and surveying Hope through it, she said, "Forgive me, my dear Hope, but I must have a good look at such a natural curiosity as that girl who, having (marvellous to relate) taken the fancy, won the heart, and been offered, I believe, the hand of the Marquis of Doun, can think with anything but shame and regret of any idle thought she had ever wasted on a Larky Grigg. Such a being is, indeed, a natural curiosity."

"And, my lady," said Hope, "she would be a most unnatural one if a marquis, or a monarch, could make her forget the son of her foster-mother—the more than brother, the best friend, the guide, the lover of her youth—the affianced of her heart!"

"You silliest of silly girls," said Lady Glenlonely, "is not this Larky Grigg the same who was a ragged school boy?"

"Yes, my lady," said Hope, proudly; "when I was a ragged school girl he was a ragged school boy. You cannot expect, my lady, that I can despise him for having belonged, like myself, to that Christian refuge for outcast children—the shorn lambs of the fold, where all that is really worth knowing was taught with the zeal and the tender patience that belongs to a labour of love."

"Well," said Lady Glenlonely, "that was all very well at that time, and I dare say what this young fellow learnt at the ragged school will make him an industrious working-man, and keep him honest, respectable, and sober. If he was kind to you in those early days, you should always think kindly of him, wish him well, and serve him, if in your power; and when you are the Marchioness of Doun, if the young man has any abilities, you may easily get him pushed forward as a mechanic. There are many small appointments on railways obtainable for such people, if a little interest is made in a proper quarter."

"Stop, my lady, I implore you," said Hope, clasping her hands, and weeping bitterly. "You cannot imagine how cruelly you are wounding me and misjudging him. Do you think wealth, or rank, or title, or any of this world's paltry, frippery advantages would make me break my solemn troth, and crush the loving, true heart that is pledged to mine? and were I so mean, so false, and so vile a thing as to forsake him, do you believe he would accept help or advancement at the hand of one so base, or owe his rise in life to a creature so false and so perjured? No, my lady, I have no ambition to rise in the world, except as the great talents of my future husband may enable him to mount the ladder of life with me by his side. The great people among whom you, my lady, deign to wish that one so humble should take her place, would scorn, would despise, would probably hate me. Humble orphan though I be, as the wife of Larky Grigg I shall be looked up to, loved, and respected. A girl born in a hospital, reared by Apple Blossom, and trained in a ragged school, is not fit for the rank of a marchioness, and would be out of place and wretched in courts and palaces."

"Nonsense!" said Lady Glenlonely; "your origin need never be known, nor is it known to any. It is my belief that gentle, perhaps noble blood flows in your veins; and, were it not so, beauty and grace like yours carry all before them, and love (like Doun's) lays the shepherd's crook beside the sceptre."

"Ah, my lady, sceptres are better side by side, and crooks the same. That very love that works the miracle you speak of makes me prefer a cottage with Larky Grigg to Castle Doun without him."

"Perverse girl!" said Lady Glenlonely; but at this moment the countess's maid tripped in to say that the Marquis of Doun was below, begging to see her ladyship.

Lady Glenlonely hurried down to meet him, and Hope sank on a chair, weeping bitterly.

(To be continued.)

BIARRITZ.

BIARRITZ is now a place of importance: for it is patronised by the Emperor Napoleon, and has become fashionable.*

Previous to the formation of an efficient route between Bayonne and Biarritz, the means of transport between that important city and the little seaport was the cacolet, or wooden pack-saddle, supporting on either side of a stout horse a seat of basketwork. The origin of this contrivance is claimed by Spain, but it has been extensively employed in Algeria by the French, and proved to be an excellent ambulant for the wounded. At the side of the cacolet trudged a country girl, fresh, blooming, and coquettish, calling to the passers with an inviting air: "U cacolet, moussu," and if the invitation was accepted, the traveller climbed into his basket, jumping lightly into the opposite pannier. "We shall have a pleasant ride," she would say, as she put the rawboned horse into his business trot, and she said truly—riding side by side with so pleasant a companion could not fail to be pleasant, even though the roads had never been repaired since the days of Alaric the Goth.

But, as we may readily imagine, visitors to Biarritz were few under this primitive mode of transport, and the rocks of Biarritz were left in their wild grandeur to keep solitary watch over the expanse of waters, and to hurl back in defiance the waves that covered them with crested foam. The coast line of Biarritz is singularly fantastic in appearance. Masses of rock seem to have been flung together by Titans in a playful mood. Here lie prostrate rocks like stranded leviathans, here are crags, and cliffs, and pinnacles of stone like spires, kiosks, towers, pagodas, Gothic towers, and Chinese bridges; there is one called the Roche Percée, which forms a sort of casemate, and commands a splendid dioramic view of the surrounding country. The effect produced by the waves of the Atlantic on the bare and rugged rocks is peculiarly grand. There are few bits of coast scenery more impressive.

The active, bustling town furnishes a strange contrast to the solitary grandeur of the shore. Speculators have arrived in shoals to feed on other shoals of visitors who have come to make holiday at Biarritz. The cottages are transformed into houses of public entertainment. Slips of garden ground are distinguished by grandiloquent names, and become public resorts; carriages of every description are driving everywhere, and Jehus are mad for customers; caterers for amusement are there of all sorts, and beggars in every stage of destitution or depravity—the old, the young, the lame, the blind, the deaf, the palsied,—all but the dumb—begging for a sou.

After passing this ordeal of mendicants, and arriving at the bottom of the principal street, the visitor finds himself in a remarkable inclosure, the sides of which are formed by a perpendicular rock. This species of arena, not so large as that of Nîmes, communicates with the sea by a straight opening, commanded by two promontories. The bottom of the basin is dry at low water, but completely covered by the high tide, which rises to the foot of the rock on which are built the bathing rooms and shops for the sale of the articles which bathers may require. A cord is extended from one promontory to the other, indicating the point to which bathers may advance with safety. The aspect of the shops, the costumes of the bath, of the washerwomen, of the traders, of bathers and swimmers in and around the little basin, give to Biarritz an appearance entirely different from that of all other watering-places.

MY VISIT TO THE SEA-SIDE.—No. X.

"HERE is a soft-bodied creature, Wilton," said I, as I touched the circular mass lying on the sand with my toe: "do you call this a mollusc?"

"I do not," replied Wilton. "The common people call it a jelly-fish; the scientific, a medusa. Of these animals there is an immense variety. Crabbe says truly, there are

'Some in huge masses, some that you may bring
In the small compass of a lady's ring;
Figured by hand divine, there's not a gem
Wrought by man's art to be compared with them.'

He might have told us, however, that many medusæ are of strictly microscopic size, and so transparent that they can scarcely be seen in the water in which they swim, except when rendered apparent by the motion of the small hairs, called cilia, with which they are endowed, or the flashes of light which they send forth in the dark."

"Coleridge, you remember, has most graphically painted the phosphorescence of the ocean—

'Beyond the shadow of the ship
I watched the water snakes:
They moved in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light
Fell off in hoary flakes.
Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire:
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,
They coiled and swam, and every track
Was a flash of golden fire.'

"Those verses are exceedingly vivid, yet they fall short of realising one of the most interesting and beautiful phenomena of the ocean. Words fail adequately to describe the far fainter luminosity of the waves on our own shores, flashing most brilliantly as they roll on the pebbly beach, or gilding the oars of the boat passing over the waters, the little vessel itself being scarcely visible amidst the darkness of the night. But how is this surpassed when a ship sails with a strong breeze through a luminous sea! The wake of the vessel is then one broad sheet of phosphorescent matter, so brilliant, indeed, as to cast a dull, pale light over the after part of the ship; while the foaming surges, as they gracefully curl on each side of the prow, appear like rolling masses of living phosphorus; and in the distance, even to the horizon, it seems an ocean of fire; the far off waves breaking and giving out a light inconceivably beautiful and radiant. Sometimes this luminosity is visible without any disturbance of the water, its surface remaining smooth, unruffled even by a passing zephyr. On other occasions, however, no light is emitted unless the water is agitated by the passing through it of some heavy body, or by the action of the winds."

"Do you attribute this remarkable effect in whole, or in part, to luminous medusæ?"

"In part, unquestionably. The sea, in all climates, produces these creatures, and sometimes swarms with them in countless multitudes. Even on the coasts of Britain the shore has been observed to be rendered offensive for miles in extent by the stranding of shoals of medusæ, so minute that each one was scarcely bigger than a pea. But it is in tropical latitudes, and through the scarcely fathomable waters of the deep sea, they multiply in the greatest profusion, and emit their phosphorescent light. Here it is that the whole surface of the ocean, as far as the eye can stretch, seems one sheet of radiance; while, looking down into the waters close to the ship, large globes of fire are seen slowly moving along at various depths. The wake of the vessel, also, displays the most vivid and varied scintillations, and the spray that breaks on her prow falls off like a shower of many-coloured sparks."

"The numbers of medusæ in such circumstances would require some marvellous flights of our arithmetic."

"It would, indeed. Scoresby reckoned that a single drop of water, when the sea had a green appearance, contained no fewer than 26,500 marine creatures; hence reckoning sixty drops to a dram, there would be a number in a gallon of water exceeding by one half the population of our globe. Another calculation he made of this number in a space of two miles square, and a depth of 250 fathoms, gave an amount of 23,888,000,000,000!"

"Astounding, indeed. The medusa we have just left on the shore must be a foot in diameter; are there any still larger?"

"There are; some are nearly two feet in diameter, and are several pounds in weight. And yet, if one of the largest were removed from the sea, and exposed to the sun and air, it would absolutely melt away, and show that its ordinary bulk and weight are owing to the presence of sea-water contained in numberless filmy cellules, combined with that indefinable power called animal life. The water drains off gradually in a clear, unaltered state, and, in a short time, this fluid will entirely escape, and leave only a filmy tissue, so inconsiderable in quantity, as convex above, and somewhat concave on the under surface, from which various processes hang in a pendent manner; these are organs for the absorption of nutriment. In the species called rhizostoma, there is placed beneath the disc a pendent peduncle or footstalk, which is divided into eight portions, each of which contains numerous canals, opening on the external surface with minute absorbing orifices; these canals ultimately merge into four large trunks, communicating with a central cavity in the disc, which is the stomach of this medusa. The stomach is really or apparently divided into four compartments by means of a filmy membrane; it is usually found to contain a yellowish and almost fluid pulpy matter, which is regarded as the digested aliment, destined to supply the demands of the system through which it circulates. To do this, it traverses certain large vessels or tubes which radiate from the stomach towards the circumference of the disc, subdividing into smaller branches, and forming numerous junctions with each other, so that upon the margin there is a complete mesh of tubes."

"A marvellous creature, truly; and yet, I suppose, even now you have related little respecting it, compared with what might be told."

"A tithe, perhaps, of the information now possessed; but who shall say how much more may be acquired? But here is another sight. Just look at the under surface of this boulder, and observe these twisting tubes. Each one is the residence of a creature called the Serpula. The tube, at the pleasure of the creature, is closed by a beautiful little cone-like body, of a vermilion hue; but when this is thrust out by means of the fibre to which it is attached, the eye is delighted by the sight of the breathing organs—an exquisite feather-like structure—in full play, and sometimes adorned with the richest tints of colour. A wonderful mechanism is provided that the serpula may thus extrude its body from the tube, and another, no less marvellous, enables this sensitive creature to retract itself instantly on the approach of danger. It will be sufficient now to remark that between 13,000 and 14,000 teeth are hooked into the lining of the cell by an appropriate apparatus, whenever the latter movement is made."

"Do these creatures construct their own shells?"

to weigh only a few grains. This almost imperceptible tissue is then the solid matter of the animal, or rather the medusa itself, which may be regarded as a mass of filmy cells, in which the sea-water, by some inscrutable process, becomes efficient in maintaining the creature's vitality, and instrumental in performing the various functions connected with its economy."

"Is its structure very complicated?"

THE SEA-STAR.

posed to the sun and air, it would absolutely melt away, and show that its ordinary bulk and weight are owing to the presence of sea-water contained in numberless filmy cellules, combined with that inde-

"It is more so than you would at first suppose. The usual form assumed by a medusa is one that resembles very closely that of a mushroom; consisting, as it does, of a large, circular, gelatinous disc,

"They do, like other tube-dwellers, some of which carry on the process by means of their thread-like arms. I saw a terebella at work, not long ago, in a friend's vivarium, placing bits of beach as orderly around the edge as possible, and carefully cementing them well together. My friend had thrown into the water a few small blue beads, and the little creature actually used two or three of them, but it did not seem to be perfectly satisfied with the result, for it very speedily returned to the use of its former material. But here, look, is a singular creature, slowly creeping at the bottom of a little basin in the rock, filled with clear sea water, and in which, until the tide returns, it is imprisoned, not because it cannot escape, but because it will not voluntarily leave its native element."

"I see, it is a sea-star, some of which you told me greatly enjoyed oysters."

"It is; let us take it out and examine it more attentively. It consists of a central portion, or disc-like body, from which five rays, capable of flexion and extension, branch out; its external covering is a horny or coriaceous integument, with calcareous portions, thickly interspersed throughout its texture, giving a roughness to the surface, and forming spinous processes around the mouth, and along the rays. The integument is tinted in various species with different colours, in the present with a red pigment, doubtless one of its secretions, as is also a reddish fluid which exudes from the surface of this sea-star. The integument, horny as it is, is evidently sensitive and contractile; it can readily change its form; the rays can be bent or extended, or turned in various directions, and these motions appear to depend on the presence of fibrous bands extending along the covering of the rays from the central body. Besides the investment I have described, which protects the internal parts, each ray is further supported by a sort of rudimentary skeleton, or calcareous framework, composed of a series of distinct portions, which are fitted to each other, and united by ligament, so as to produce a succession of joints, extending down the under surface of each ray, beginning from a circular framework of the same character, which incloses the mouth."

"An arrangement worthy of all admiration. Have you paused at the close of its marvels?"

"Far from it. Just now, you saw the creature in motion; here there is a fresh series of wonders. The portions or plates of the under surface of each ray are so arranged as to admit of certain little apertures like pin-holes, between them; and these apertures form four rows, extending down each ray in a groove. Through these holes the sea-star can protrude small, fleshy suckers, or feet (each terminating in a sucking disc), which are the principal organs of locomotion, and also of securing the prey within the folds of the rays. The manner in which these suckers are protruded and withdrawn is very curious, and yet extremely simple. They are muscular and tubular, closed at their extremity by a disc; but internally, each one communicates with a sac, or reservoir of fluid, itself being muscular or contractile. When the animal wishes to protrude these suckers, it contracts these sacs, forcing the fluid into the tubes, which thus become distended, and pass through the holes; but when the sea-star wishes to withdraw them, the sacs expand, the fluid leaves the tubes, which contract, so as simultaneously to expel it, and are immediately retracted through their respective apertures.

The sacs in question derive their fluid from a system of vessels distinct, according to most physiologists, from those of the arterial system. But whether the fluid is a peculiar secretion, or merely sea-water, is a point, I believe, not yet established."

"The mouth, I presume, is seated on the under surface of the central disc."

"It is; the osseous or calcareous portions around it giving firmness to its margin, and perhaps act to a certain extent as teeth, or assist in the seizure of food. It leads into a very wide gullet, longitudinally folded, and this expands into a capacious stomach, the nature and use of which require further examination, though they are probably destined, like the intestinal canal of higher animals, for absorbing the nutritive particles of the digested food, which is taken up by a system of veins, abundantly distributed like a fine network over them, throughout their course."

The Matron.

NO. XL.

PROPER views on the subject of dress are of importance to us all, to my female readers especially. Not that young girls should make outward adornment their principal study—far otherwise; both religion and morality teach us that the inward adornments of the mind are of much more importance. But there is a medium in all things. Dress is not to be the business of our lives, neither is it to be neglected. Suit your dress to the occasion, and do not wear your best things at home when you are carrying on your daily avocations. If you do, you may be sure that when you come in contact with friends and neighbours who are more careful of their articles of apparel, you will have reason to blush for your appearance. However, you should endeavour to be neat both at home and abroad; and one of the objects I have in view is to assist you to make a neat appearance without departing from the strictest rules of economy. Winter costume is still the subject under consideration. I may lay it down as a rule that dark colours are best suited to winter. They are less affected by smoke, and they are more in harmony with the appearance of nature.

I am willing to own that, for best things, whether light or dark, the best are those that come straight out of the shop or warehouse; but for second best a great deal may be done in the way of reviving, by the handy, the economical, and the enterprising. Neckties, and trimming, for the insides of bonnets, may be of lively colours all the year round. Supposing you have ribbons that are faded and dirty: by the following process you can make them once more look nice and fresh:—

Supposing them to be of any other tint than black, I advise you first to wash them in a hot lather of soap and water, and to rinse them in plain warm water. To this add a small quantity of dye, according to the colour of your ribbon. A few drops of vitriol added to the water will freshen crimson, scarlet, or yellow. Lemon-juice is the best thing to use for pink ribbons, and pearlash for blue and purple. Squeeze the liquid from the ribbons, roll them in a cloth and wring them, spread them out, and rub them on the wrong side with a little gum water. When half dry, iron them quickly with a moderately-hot iron on the right side. If you wish to make white or pink ribbons purple after they have become soiled and dirty during the summer, wash them thoroughly, according to the rules given above, dip them in weak alum and water, and then in a dye obtained by boiling logwood in water. Do not put the ribbons in the dye till it is quite cold. Iron them in the manner already described.

There is hardly any article in which it is more difficult (for those who have constantly to make a good appearance) to be economical than in gloves. In the summer, light gloves look so nice that one is tempted to buy them; but they become soiled and unsightly long before they are worn out. To those who have by them a stock of soiled white gloves, the following receipt, which teaches them how to dye these gloves of a beautiful purple, may be very welcome. By using it they may convert things that are of no use at all into good-looking winter gloves.

Boil four ounces of logwood and two ounces of rock alum in three pints of soft water till half wasted. After straining it, let it stand till it is cold. Mind the gloves are nicely mended. Then dip a brush (about the size of a paste-brush) in the dye, and paint the gloves with it. When dry, repeat the painting. Twice will be sufficient, unless a very dark colour is required.

When dry after the second coating, rub off all the loose dye with a coarse bit of flannel; then beat up the white of an egg, and with a sponge rub it over the leather. If you should have stained your hands with the dye, wet them well with vinegar (before washing them); it will remove the stains.

Supposing you have children, and wish to have their summer bonnets cheaply converted into winter ones, the best thing you can do is to dye them yourself. First of all, boil the bonnets in logwood liquor three or four hours, occasionally adding green copperas, and taking the bonnets out to cool in the air. When you go to bed leave the bonnets in the dye. The next morning take them out, dry them in the air, and brush them. After this, moisten them within and without with an oiled sponge. All you have then to do is to send them to be blocked, and to trim them with some ribbon dyed purple, according to the receipt given above. With a nice blond cap inside, they will look very pretty, and you will have provided winter bonnets at little expense. Well-made cuffs and sleeves are next in importance.

I have recommended dark colours for the winter, but I have no wish that your dress should look gloomy, either in the winter or summer. Coloured neckties and nice cuffs, and under sleeves and collars enliven and improve the appearance, and I advise you to wear them. The sleeve, of which I give the pattern below, would look well in book-muslin, trimmed with a narrow edging.

Muslin and edging are cheap enough in this country, and attention to the rules given for needlework, and bearing in mind that the size of the needle and the cotton must be suited to the texture of the material, will secure your success in manufacturing cuffs, collars, and sleeves. But you should try to have pretty patterns for these things. Perhaps the following pattern of a cuff may be useful to you. The pattern is quite modern, and the cut decidedly pretty.

In the next chapter I shall give you some patterns of collars; and by a great variety of pretty illustrations of wearing apparel, I hope, from week to week, to be able to assist you in the important art of economical and, at the same time, becoming dress.

"SHE WON'T HEAR ME."

"I wish that you would talk to my daughter, sir. You know all the circumstances of her case, and perhaps can have some influence for good over her. She won't listen to anything that I can say. I feel that my child is on the high road to ruin, and my heart is almost breaking at her conduct and her danger, but 'tis useless for me to reason with her. She won't hear me."

What words were these to be wrung, by a daughter's obstinate misconduct, from the lips of an affectionate mother.

"She won't hear me," Alas! who then will she hear? Who, if her mother cannot, will be able to turn, even for a moment, her ear away from listening to the charming of the serpent that is drawing her nearer and nearer to his deadly embrace.

She will not listen to her whose eyes were the first that watched over her infancy, and which have grown dim with many tears shed for her sake—she will not listen to her whose heart has never beat one throb that was not true to her and her real interests—to the mother whose bosom was her cradle, and her home in her helpless years, and which yearns over her now, with unutterable love, pity, and anguish; will not listen to her who labours for her by day, and dreams of her by night—who prays for her, with one unceasing prayer, wearing the very heavens for blessings upon her child, who would wear her own life out without a murmur or regret to save her, or to do her good. This is the friend to whom the infatuated girl will not listen. And why not? What being has she found that is to be regarded in preference to her mother; for whose sake her mother is to be grieved and disobeyed—to be suffered to go all day long in heaviness, and all the night in sorrow and disquiet? To be made to weep and sigh, and to be in bitterness over the ingratitude and the insane folly of the once sweet solace and pleasure of her heart—her dear and only daughter. Who is he? What marvel of desirableness must he be?

Oh! he is "a perfect gentleman,"—a high-minded and honourable man, who sneaks in at one door of her mother's house, and sneaks out at another; who waits for her at all the corners, and dodges in and out of dark alleys to watch unseen for her coming—who incites her to all manner of degrading and disagreeable manoeuvres in order to meet or to communicate with him; who tempts her to deceive and equivocate, if not to lie outright, and to break the Sabbath, by using its sacred hours for making arrangements in regard to their secret intercourse—who has a principle which causes him to "imbibe" whenever he is so disposed, and to continue to imbibe until he has a very considerable degree of difficulty in discovering and entering his own quarters at midnight or morning; who, on the whole, is known about town as "one of 'em," a person of whom all young men warn their sisters and their cousins, and one whose attentions are sure to cause any girl to be regarded with suspicion and disrespect. This is the creature for whose sake the misguided girl is breaking her mother's heart.

Well, let her go her own way, if she will go it. If, for her mother's sake, she will not try to turn from her folly and bewilderment; if, when she knows that the truest and most tender heart that ever beat on earth for her is suffering more than words can express, suffering what causes that dear face to change faster than the years, or the gray hairs and hollows of time ever made it change, she will not be likely to heed what others may say; and she will marry the creature that seems to her heated and dazzled imagination so perfect (though to others he may look like a hairy spider on grasshopper's legs), that is, she will marry him if he so pleases, which he probably will not please, unless it be out of spite to those who have opposed his attentions to her.

Then, when her mother's sore and disappointed heart shall be at rest, when those loving eyes shall have forever done with weeping, and can look kindly on her no more—when her dear mother shall have gone where the thankless daughter can never either rejoice or grieve her more—when she lies dead and in her quiet grave, that daughter will repent of her sins.

When the man who played the mean sneak, the spiteful annoy, while he was a lover, has proved to his wife's cost that he can play the faithless and worthless (if not the harsh and violent) husband with equal ease, and she is broken-hearted, then, oh! then she will sadly and remorsefully recall her youthful days, and think of the wrongs she heaped on her poor mother. Ah! it will then be the turn of the ungrateful child to mourn and be in bitterness. Why, oh! why will she so recklessly and blindly lay the sure foundation for a weight of woe, which shall crush her when it settles back upon her heart?

Small Change.

It is his whole life, not a few incidents of it, that proves a man.

SUBTRACT from many modern poets all that may be found in Shakespeare, and trash will remain.

It seems to me that this blessed world will never want something to quarrel about, so long as there are two straws upon it.

In the morning, we carry the world, like Atlas; at noon, we stoop and bend beneath it; and at night, it crushes us flat to the ground.

How few let their passions, their resentments, die before them! How few see their vices confined, ere they fall themselves.

God's word is sometimes to us like a magic writing which has faded out and become invisible, and then at other times, the lines re-appear, and it flashes for us with a divine meaning.

Let it be understood that the end of our existence here is that we may be more godlike; and may we know that we shall become so by being more manly in the world, and that we are placed here to grow strong and noble, and not merely to enjoy.

Like provisions, dresses are coming down. The sign before the door of a mantua-maker's shop reads thus:—"Dresses made lower than ever."

MRS. SMITH, hearing strange sounds, inquired of her new servant if she snored in her sleep. "I don't know, marm," replied Becky, innocently; "I never lay awake long enough to discover."

Two Irishmen were in prison, the one for stealing a cow, and the other for stealing a watch. "Hallo, Mike!—what time is it?" said the cow-stealer to the other. "And sure, Pat, I haven't any timepiece handy, but I think it is most milking time."

HOW TO TELL A LADY'S AGE.—The following table will do it. Just hand the table to the lady, and ask her to tell you in which of its columns her age is contained. Then add together the figures at the top of the columns designated, and you have the great secret. Suppose an age to be seventeen. You will find the number seventeen only in two columns, viz., the first and fifth; and the first figures at the head of these columns make seventeen. Here is the magic table:—

This work, indispensable to the theological student, can be had complete in one volume, at 7s. 6d., or in two volumes, at 4s. each, cloth.

HARMONY.—We are sorry to say that Handel (whose oratorios have delighted you so much at the musical festival) was not an Englishman; but he settled in England after he had made his reputation. He was born in Germany, at Halle, in 1684. He was intended for the law; but music being his prevailing taste, he was allowed to cultivate it. He went early to the Prussian court, and at Hamburg he composed an opera when he was only fourteen. He afterwards made the tour of Italy, and engaged in the service of the Elector of Hanover. It was in 1712 that he settled in England. Queen Anne granted him a pension, which George I. increased. When you come to London and visit Westminster Abbey, you will see a noble monument erected to his memory. This monument consists of a statue of the great composer, represented bearing in his hand a scroll inscribed with these words:—"I know that my Redeemer liveth," together with a staff of music containing the subject of the melody to which these words are so admirably set in the oratorio of the Messiah.

SPORTSMAN.—You have formed your conclusions on insufficient ground, and the cases you speak of can only be exceptional. Not only is the grouse a migratory bird, but many other birds supposed to remain with us constantly, pass only part of the year in this country. As you dispute our authority, we refer you to Sir Richard Phillips, a scientific man of high repute, who has made natural history one of his particular studies. We give you his own words:—"The birds which pass but part of the year in Britain are the cuckoo, grouse, wryneck, stare hoopoe, thrush, ringdove, chatterer, turtle dove, grosbeaks, buntings, finches, larks, fly-catchers, wagtails, warblers, nightingales, black caps, willow-wrens, white ears, white-throats, goat-suckers, herons, curlews, snipes, rails, wild ducks, &c."

ECCELESIAST.—All the sons of British dukes and marquises are lords by courtesy, and by courtesy only, as they have no legal right to the distinction. The eldest son takes by courtesy the second title in the family. The eldest son of the Duke of Somerset is Lord Seymour; the eldest son of the Duke of Bedford is Marquis of Tavistock; but, whether the second title be, as in the first case, a simple barony, or, as in the second, a marquise, the bearers are always called "lord." The younger sons of dukes and marquises have by courtesy the title of "lord" prefixed to their Christian names, as Lord John Russell, son of the late Duke of Bedford; Lord Hubert de Burgh, son of the present Marquis of Clanricarde.

F. HUGHES.—You ask us why roast goose is eaten on Michaelmas day. We must inform you that various reasons are assigned for this practice. It can be traced through more than three centuries. The popular belief is, that a goose forming part of the royal dinner, when the news was brought to Queen Elizabeth of the defeat of the Spanish Armada, her majesty commanded that a goose should be served up on every 29th of September, to commemorate the above glorious event. But it is very possible that, as the Queen was dining on goose on Michaelmas day, the custom of partaking of this dish prevailed before the defeat of the Armada. Beckwith observes, "Probably no other reason can be given for this custom but that Michaelmas day was a great festival, and geese at that time were most plentiful." As to your question about the origin of the saying, that if you eat goose on Michaelmas-day, you will never want money all the year round, it may arise from the habit of receiving rent on this day. In the British Apollo we learn why the farmers brought a goose to the landlord. "The custom came up from the tenants presenting their landlords with geese, to incline their relenting on following payments." Another reason, in rhyme, thus accounts for eating the goose at Michaelmas:—

"For doubtless 'twas at first designed,
To make the people seasons mind;
That so they might apply their care
To all those things which needful were;
And, by a good industrious hand,
Know when and how to improve their land."

Every family in Denmark has a roast goose for supper on St. Martin's Eve, that is to say, those have it who can afford it. The harvest is later in Denmark than in England, and St. Martin's day is in about the same relation to the harvest there, as St. Michael's is to our harvest.

DELTA.—Mushrooms are excellent either pickled or stewed, and we congratulate you on finding so many near your house, but you must be very careful not to mistake poisonous fungi for mushrooms. As a mistake may cost you a very serious illness, if not your life, we trust you will patiently listen to our directions. When you have gathered what you consider a mushroom, sprinkle a little salt on the spongy part or gills; if they turn yellow it is a poisonous fungus you have gathered; if black, it is a wholesome mushroom. Allow the salt to act before you decide the question. False mushrooms have a warty cap, they are heavy, and they emerge from a kind of bag. They grow in woods, whereas the true mushrooms grow in pastures. False mushrooms have a biting, disagreeable taste; when cut they turn blue. They are moist on the surface, and generally of a rose or orange colour. The gills of the true mushroom are of a pinky red, changing to a finer colour. The flesh is white, and the stem is white and solid.

HOPE.—Your observation is quite correct, that the spread of education seems to have done little towards removing superstition. The witch who appeared in one of our police courts the other day, and who had obtained money from a lady to charm away complaints, might have figured in the dark ages. But perhaps you are not aware that even as recently as the time of the great Dr. Johnson, implicit faith was placed in the touch of the royal hand to remove the king's evil, or scrofula. The sovereign's touching for this disease is a superstition almost venerable from its antiquity. Peter of Blois speaks of it in the twelfth century. It is said to be traceable to Edward the Confessor. The practice of touching was at its height in the reign of Charles II. In the first four years after his restoration he touched nearly 24,000 persons. Pepys, in his diary relates how he waited, at Whitehall to see the king touch people for the king's evil. "He did not come, but kept the poor persons waiting all the morning in the rain in the garden. Afterwards he touched them in the banqueting house." The practice was continued by Charles's successors. Queen Anne was the last sovereign who touched for scrofula. As some excuse for the seeming presumption of supposing their touch could cure disease, we must not omit to mention that the sovereigns pronounced these solemn words when they touched, "I touch, but God healeth."

NINA GORDON sends us a little poem of five stanzas. Of this poem the object seems to be the conviction and conversion of man. "Nina's" verses are far from contemptible; and we should be sorry, by withholding them altogether, to frustrate her good intentions. As a whole, they are rather too crude for publication in our paper; but we shall favour our readers with the second, fifth, and sixth stanzas, considering them the gems of the poem:—

"When unsuspecting, young, and gay,
When peace and pleasure lead the way,
Who'll tempt a simple girl to stray?"
"Tis man!"

And when her woe-worn heart he broke,
When e'en in death his name she spoke,
In that sad hour who'll laugh and joke?"
Base man!

But oh! when death's murrering dart
Shall stop the life-throb of his heart,
Say then, who feels his conscience smart?"
"Tis man!"

In these lines there are a few absurdities, and a few grammatical errors; but these we must consider as poetical licenses, and pronounce that "Nina" has shown both spirit and talent.

UNFORTUNATE TOM.—For the sake of the ladies who are attached to you, as well as for your own, you must take a decided step. Your case resembles that of a patient who must go through a painful operation before he can hope for a cure. The painful operation necessary for you is, that of making a frank confession of the whole state of the case to your first love. If she has a true woman's heart, she will feel for you, and, forgetful of self, desire only that you should follow the bent of your own inclinations, but we consider these inclinations (under wise direction) would not lead you to the passionate woman, whose ill-placed love has made you guilty of inconstancy. On hearing that you were an engaged man, it was her duty to conquer her partiality for you. In the indulgence of her own feelings she has sacrificed others, and being evidently selfish, she is not calculated to make a good wife.

FLORENCE BELGRAVE.—We attribute no hidden meaning to the words of the song you mention. A CONSTANT READER must advertise for the situation she wishes to procure. H. R. E.—"Ladies and gentlemen" is the proper mode of addressing an audience. BRIDE ELECT.—We are of your friends' opinion, and recommend you to select a white dress, although you are to be married in the winter. A white silk looks well for years (for parties and full-dress occasions), and when soiled or faded, you can have it dyed of a dark colour. You may wear a coloured velvet mantle during the ceremony, and, should the weather be severe, your clothing may be as warm as if the colour of your dress were scarlet. You had better not fix on November for your bridal, as your suitor has mentioned December. All expenses previous to the wedding (excepting the dress, which you say your lover has proposed buying) fall on the bride's family.

DARA.—We believe every day is a lucky day on which we do our duty; but if your parents object to Friday, select another day for your wedding. Consult recent numbers of our paper, and you will find excellent receipts for improving the hair and complexion.

RUSTICS.—You may pass persons you meet either on the right or left side. On bowing to superiors, or ladies, remove your hat from your head.

POOR MISERABLE LILY, DOUBTFUL, A HIGHLAND GIRL, HIBERNIA.—Love seems more mischievous than ever, and the unhappy lovers that seek consolation by consulting us are so numerous, that we are almost bewildered. "Lily's" case interests us, particularly on account of the pious resignation she expresses. We think that by revealing to her parents the state of her heart, she takes the course most likely to secure what she so much desires. "Doubtful" will find a case similar to his own discussed in a recent number of our paper. Let him be guided by the advice there given.—"A Highland Girl" does not tell us what length of time has elapsed since her lover wrote. Much must depend on this.—"Hibernia's" case resembles "Doubtful's," and we can only give him a similar answer; but he has other sorrows besides those of the heart. He does not know what to do "in a small company." Let him learn to listen; a good listener is more rare and more welcome than a good talker. "Hibernia" must shake hands with intimate friends, not with slight acquaintances.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Persevere in the receipt given to "Es-ther" and "Annie."

ONE IN NEED OF ADVICE.—You do not say whether the man you prefer would marry you, supposing you were free. If you are convinced he would not, your preference for him is a weakness, and one that you should endeavour to conquer. Should you succeed, you might be able to return the attachment of the man who frankly and generously offered you his hand. Could you see all the letters we receive from young ladies of great attractions who get no offers at all, you would think twice before you threw away your present chance.

NED MUSGRAVE.—You will be sure to repent if you induce the young lady to marry you, and to emigrate with you, in spite of her mother's disapproval. Repentance will make her gloomy and wretched, and you will have no help nor solace in her.

NELLIE-ANTE-SIRLIE.—Your question has already been answered in our paper. In this country marriages between first and second cousins are perfectly lawful.

CARRIE RALSTON.—Chesterfield says, that "The virtue of a lover is excess," but we do not think he could have alluded to lady-lovers. Reserve is so much the characteristic of the fair sex, that we cannot advise you entirely to throw it off, even in addressing the gentleman to whom you are engaged.

RUTH.—We consider "Ruth" too young to carry on her present plan with any degree of safety. Let her lover own the state of his feelings to "Ruth's" parents or guardians, or let "Ruth" avoid his society.

MARY ELIZA, JOHNNY HYLAND.—According to modern etiquette, it is not necessary for a gentleman to take off his glove to shake hands with a lady who has her gloves on. "Johnny Hyland" must recollect that he (not his acquaintance) contemplates marrying the young lady. Let him follow his own inclinations, if he can do so without offending his parents.

JULIA JOINER.—Your lover may be "sincere," but it is evident he is not affectionate. We advise you to endeavour to meet indifference with indifference.

H. B. W.—We are much pleased with the commendation you bestow on our "French Lessons." We beg you to observe that we still continue to publish rules for pronunciation; and to these we refer "J. S." and "A Fifteen Years' French Tutor." The doubts of "D. S. J." may be solved by an attentive perusal of the earlier chapters of the French Lessons.

BRIGHTON.—For aught we know, the lady you love may be a desperate flirt; but her indignation at your having indulged in excess in wine is no proof of her being a flirt; but she must be very unforgiving if she does not overlook your fault, supposing it an exception to your general habits, and that you are not addicted to drinking. If she perseveres in her resentment, it is possible that she is making the fault into which you were led an excuse for forsaking you and encouraging some other lover; and, instead of lamenting, you may have good cause to congratulate yourself on escaping a union with a heartless, inconstant woman.

JOHN THOMAS.—You do not tell us your age, but, judging from your letter, we should say you are still very young, and not likely to be accepted by the lady with £5,000, or the lady with nothing. So we advise you to avoid the humiliation of being refused by proposing to neither.

MARY.—We think it is not probable that your vacillating lover will ever make up his mind. In the meantime, he keeps you in a state of agitation that unfits you for business, and leaves you no inclination to encourage another suitor who might make you a good husband. Take no hasty step, but by checking vain hopes, extricate yourself from this state of suspense. On your side let the correspondence cease, and use all your energies and every means in your power to become once more heart-whole.

SAUCY BROOKE.—What! you, a young woman of eighteen, you set your affections on a boy of fifteen—a mere child, who ought to be at school! The idea is preposterous. We cannot decidedly answer your question as to whether the lad of fifteen will think any the worse of you for loving him, but we can assure you we do.

A. B. Y. Z.—Moles cannot be eradicated without extreme danger.—D. M.—Cease from biting your nails, and they will grow again.—J. Rankin.—Take as much exercise as possible; but avoid the use of "glassfuls of vinegar."—Jack Rag and W. H. wish for whiskers. They must "bide their time."—A Striving Young Man; A. J. C.; Geranium; Theresa Denoyer; Mabelle; Jane Thomson, and some others, will find advice as to curling hair, &c., in previous numbers of our journal.

Respectfully declined.—J. and W. Fides; Samuel E.; T. K. F.; A Youth of Seventeen; B. Powell; Geraldine; T. Bentley; R. A.; V. North; J. C.; Jane M.; J. Thomason; H. Anderton; Minnie E.; H. D.; W. B.

* * * If those correspondents who complain of not having had replies to their letters, will favour us by repeating their questions in explicit terms, they shall receive the information they require with the least possible delay. We beg, however, to remind our readers that three weeks from the receipt of their queries is the shortest time in which they can hope to receive an answer, as we cannot prepare the supply necessary to meet the great and still increasing demand for the paper in less than three weeks.

SMILES AND TEARS:

A Tale of our own Times.

By J. F. SMITH,

AUTHOR OF "DICK TARLETON," "PHASES OF LIFE," "THE SOLDIER OF FORTUNE," "THE YOUNG PRETENDER," ETC.

CHAPTER XCVII.

The diligence of trade and noise of gain,
And luxury more late asleep were laid;
All was the night's, and her silent reign
No sound the rest of nature did invade.

DRYDEN.

On quitting the village inn, Jack Manders and his friend Caleb followed the footsteps of their guide till they reached the narrow by-lane running between Minter's farm and the old bell-ringer's cottage. This bridle-road, for it was little more, the same Mark

Rayner escaped by on the night of Lillian's abduction, soon brought them to the wall of Meldown-park, which they left to the right, and struck into the open common near the gravel pits.

A mile further brought them to the croft, from which they first caught sight of the Home Farm, its quaint old gables and bay windows clearly defined in the moonlight which flooded the landscape with its silver beams.

"There it be," said the ostler, pointing to the house.

The attention of Jack, however, was directed to a nearer object, the dog-cart drawn up close by the old pollard.

Neither the driver nor his companion was with it.

They approached it cautiously and looked carefully round them; neither of the men was to be seen.

"I told you you were mistaken," observed Caleb.

"Perhaps," replied his friend, doubtfully, for the words he had heard had made a deep impression on him; Mike's tone of voice was not easily forgotten. "We shall see," he added; "doubtless they are at the farm."

The speakers were about to turn, when a deep groan from the opposite side of the hedge startled them. The young men sprang over, and saw what appeared to be a human being, enveloped in a coarse rug, twisting and rolling on the ground in intense agony. Their first impulse was to raise him, but the wretched man proved too far gone to speak; he could only mutter a few indistinct words, which, Caleb thought, sounded like "the drink—poison!" when he fell back a dead weight in their arms.

Their guide suggested that they should give him brandy.

"Too late," said Jack, who had seen death face to face too frequently to be mistaken. "He is gone."

"What, dead!" exclaimed the ostler, in a tone of terror and surprise. "Why, it be murder, then?"

JACK AND CALEB ARE JUST IN TIME.

"Little doubt of that," observed the former; "and he who perpetrated it is not likely to leave his night's work uncompleted. Let us hasten to the farm at once, if we would prevent a second crime."

Having placed the body of Brandt upon the ground and covered it over with the rug, the two friends, horrified at the discovery they had made, started at a rapid pace towards the house.

"This way!" shouted their guide, pointing to the north side of the building; "the porch be here."

Jack Manders followed the direction of the speaker; but the quick eye of Caleb had caught the reflection of the light which streamed through the chink of the half-open shutter; and he directed his steps towards that. To tear it open, dash the curtain aside, and spring into the oak room were the acts of an instant.

Fortunately, he was armed.

The sight that met his gaze might have startled the nerves of one accustomed even to the battle-field, for there the pomp and circumstance of war—the trumpet's clang, the cannon's roar, and the cheers of the excited soldiery, drown the keen cry of agony, and rob even death itself of half its terrors. Caleb had witnessed such scenes, but never felt the blood rush from his heart as it did on his first glance into that lonely chamber, where Fiddler Dick, who had forced the half-strangled steward upon his knees, was holding back his head by the thin, gray locks, whilst Mike was in the act of drawing a knife across the victim's throat.

With a shout of terror and execration, the young sailor levelled his pistol and fired. The ball struck the aged fratricide in the back; the knife fell from his palsied hand, and a yell of pain and disappointment escaped him.

The mountebank, whose coolness and presence of mind rarely deserted him, saw at a glance that the intruder had no second weapon. It was hard, very hard, to be disappointed of his plunder, and such plunder, too; but personal safety now became the first consideration.

Releasing his hold of the half-murdered man, he darted towards the window with the agility of a wild cat; but Caleb, whose eye was quite as quick, intercepted him, and a brief but desperate struggle ensued.

"Release me!" muttered the ruffian, between his clenched teeth.

His antagonist made no reply, but clung to him with desperate determination. It was a death grapple to one if not both of them.

Twice they fell upon the floor of the chamber. The last time the sailor struck his temple against the heavy oaken table. The blow caused the lights to dance wildly before his eyes, and the pale, ghastly features of his assailant wore a mocking smile.

Caleb's strength was deserting him.

"If I could only find the knife," thought Fiddler Dick, releasing one of his hands from the neck of the young man, and feeling along the floor in search of it.

By this time voices were heard at the porch, and the noise of descending feet upon the stairs. The farm servants had been roused by the shouts of the ostler and Jack Manders.

The mountebank felt that an instant's more delay might consign him to a far worse doom than the dockyard at Chatham. With a yell of disappointment, he started to his feet, and stared for an instant round the room.

Andrew Sillex, although severely wounded, for the blood gushed fearfully from his throat, had contrived to crawl towards the chest which contained his treasured gold, and during the struggle, instead of attempting to assist his preserver, had been making desperate efforts to close the lid, which fastened with a spring.

As the assassin stretched forth his arm to secure at least a portion of the contents, the old man succeeded in the attempt, and he sank exhausted beside it.

A low chuckling laugh broke from his lips.

An oath issued from those of Fiddler Dick, as he glared with the fury of a tiger disappointed of its prey, around him; and probably he would have completed the work of death his confederate had commenced, had not the noise made by those breaking open the door of the apartment, warned him to provide for his safety. Seizing the parchment which Mike had left upon the table, he sprang through the open window and disappeared.

When Jack Manders, the ostler, and farm servants succeeded in forcing an entrance, they found their worst fears realised. The steward lay weltering in his blood; his brother dying, and Caleb bewildered and half stunned from the blow he had received, incapable of explaining the scene that had taken place.

Jack's first care was to assist his friend.

"Speak to me! are you wounded?" he exclaimed;

"for heaven's sake speak to me! This is indeed a night of terror."

"It be murder, I think," observed the ostler, pointing to the ghastly form of Andrew Sillex, whom the servants had raised from the floor and placed in a chair.

"Measter beant dead," said one of the men, "but he do bleed awful."

"What has occurred?" demanded the housekeeper, who now entered the room with her usual self-collected, quiet air.

At the sight of the partner of her crime she paused for an instant, and gazed upon him; but no glance of pity shot from her cold gray eyes; on the contrary, they appeared to express satisfaction rather than commiseration.

"I thought it would be so," she calmly added; "the gold he lived for has been the means of his punishment. But where is the murderer?"

Caleb, who by this time had partially recovered, pointed to the window, and with some difficulty pronounced the word "There."

Jack understood him, and tore aside the curtain just in time to see Fiddler Dick, who had reached the dog-cart, spring into the seat, and drive off at a furious pace across the common.

"Escaped!" he said, in a tone of disappointment. "One on 'em," observed the ostler; "but here be another."

Mike, who, during the struggle between his confederate and the young sailor, had succeeded in crawling under the heavy oaken table, was now dragged forth, and by no gentle hands. At every movement the wretched fratricide groaned with anguish; the torture he endured must have been exquisite.

"Why this be measter's brother!" exclaimed one of the servants, and his fellow labourers, not knowing what to make of the affair, began to look doubtfully upon the two strangers. The ostler being well known, they had no suspicion of him.

"Till the result of the night's crime is known," observed the housekeeper, "I will take charge of these."

As she spoke, she disengaged the keys, though not without some violence, from the grasp of Andrew Sillex.

"Pardon me," replied Jack Manders, snatching them from her, "I am the fittest person."

"You!" replied the woman.

"At your service, madam."

"And by what right?"

"Simply as his nephew. Oh! you need not look surprised," added the young man. "I am not in the least proud of the relationship."

At the word "nephew," Mike—who had been placed in a chair directly opposite the one filled by his brother, who was still insensible, although those around him had succeeded in stopping the hemorrhage—uttered a deep groan, and pronounced the name of "Jack!"

"Here I am, uncle," replied his relative. "I told you we should meet again. You see I have kept my word."

"Yes, confound you!" muttered the old convict.

"Would I had found you a better man."

"You don't know all," exclaimed Mike, with momentary strength. "I came to the Home Farm, and Andrew and that woman who hanged her own husband through jealousy tried to poison me."

"Horrible!" ejaculated Jack; "but I warned you not to trust him."

"That ain't the worst," continued the dying man. "Seeing he couldn't send me out of the world by poison, he did it as bad—managed it another way: got my ticket-of-leave recalled—sent me to the hulks."

"His own brother!" exclaimed Caleb.

"Ay, his twin; and we wor reckoned uncommonly like each other; but he wor the cunningest of the two, for he allays got the—the—"

Here a succession of violent spasms cut short the speech of the fratricide, and the upper portion of his body writhed like that of a twisted snake with agony, whilst the lower extremities remained perfectly still.

At this allusion to his resemblance to his brother a shudder ran through the veins of his hearers, for never perhaps was the likeness more apparent than at that moment, as they sat, each supported in an arm chair, one insensible and the other writhing in the convulsions of approaching dissolution.

"I didn't behave well to yer, Jack," continued the old convict, when the violence of the spasms had subsided; "but it worn't my fault. Andrew would have yer sent to sea: he said it wor safest; and yer know I allays gave way to what he said."

"I felt it bitterly at first," replied Jack; "for the captain proved a brutal tyrant."

"Hard lines," interrupted the old man, "no doubt, no doubt."

"But it turned out for the best at last. Providence raised me up friends, and I am in England again."

"In what line?" inquired his uncle, faintly.

"An honest one," replied his nephew.

"That's what we all say till we gets found out," muttered his relative. "In the police, I s'pose," he added, bitterly; "vell, vell," he continued, after a pause, and in a more philosophical tone, "bizziness is bizziness; but yer might ha' fired higher, Jack, and put me out of my mis'ry at once. Ugh! my back is broken—broken!"

"It was not I who fired the shot," observed Jack Manders; "and, badly as you treated me, I rejoice that it was not."

"Worn't it," exclaimed Mike; "who then?"

Caleb acknowledged that the act was his. The old convict regarded him for an instant with a glance of such deadly hate that the young man shuddered and turned aside.

Assistance now arrived from the village in the person of the constables and Doctor Phrase. The first care of the medical man was to attend to the steward, whose wound he sewed up, and then turned to his murderer, a brief examination of whose wound satisfied him that all human skill was hopeless.

"I knows it," groaned Mike; "I knows it."

At the sound of his voice, Andrew Sillex, who by this time had recovered consciousness, looked up and regarded the speaker fixedly—there was something horrible in the glances they exchanged.

"Sad affair," exclaimed the doctor—"sad affair."

How did it occur? Who is the guilty wretch?"

Andrew slowly raised his hand and pointed to the murderer who was seated opposite to him.

"What, your—no, no, impossible! Why, you are brothers."

"Twins," added Mike; "and uncommon like one another."

The steward attempted to speak; but Phrase positively forbid the effort, declaring that the only chance of saving him depended on his maintaining absolute silence.

At the words "chance of saving him," an expression of disappointment overshadowed the ghastly features of the assassin. The iron must have entered his soul deeply, for not even the sight of his victim's sufferings could appease the burning sense of injury and resentment.

Jack Manders turned aside with a feeling of disgust. He felt at that moment almost grateful to Andrew for the act of treachery which had removed him from the influence of so bad a man.

The steward made signs that he wished to write, and a slate and pencil were brought him. With a trembling hand he traced a few lines and handed them to Phrase, who read them aloud.

"Do all you can to save my brother."

"Does not that move you?" demanded the nephew, addressing himself to the old convict; "his heart is less hard than yours—he sets you the example of forgiveness—"

A low chuckle escaped from Mike.

"And is anxious that you should recover."

"That he may hang me," replied the former. "I know him—you don't."

The glance of hate and fury which lit, for an instant, the dull gray eyes of the steward proved that the speaker had read his motives more truly than Jack Manders had done.

Andrew wrote again—"Where are my keys?"

"That fellow who calls himself your nephew has taken them," replied the housekeeper, impatiently.

"They were safer in my possession than in yours," replied the young man; "but I have no wish to retain them. I came to the Home Farm to exact an account for the treatment I have received: Providence made my visit the means of detecting, if not preventing, a fearful crime. My uncle has only to say to whom he wishes me to resign them—I am quite ready to give them up."

"Very proper, very proper indeed," said Dr. Phrase; "hem! as my respectability is, I should say, undoubted, you cannot do better than give them to me."

The steward shook his head, and wrote hastily again. The speaker would have taken the slate from his hand, and read his wishes as he had previously done; but the wounded man would resign it to no one but Jack. The words were—

"Keep them."

Both housekeeper and doctor looked exceedingly disappointed, as the nephew quietly dropped the keys into his pocket.

Before morning dawned, Mr. Thornton—the former in his magisterial capacity—our hero, and the two friends who had remained with him at the village inn, arrived at the Home Farm, whilst a number of villagers crowded round the house.

Among the latter were Farmer Minter and poor old Simon Gee.

As the death of at least one of the parties appeared imminent, Mr. Thornton at once proceeded to take the depositions, and the first person examined was Jack Manders.

The witness stated that, having passed two men in a dog-cart, whose appearance excited his suspicion, on his way to St. Faith's, where he arrived only a few hours previous to the murder, he had started from the inn, accompanied by his friend and the ostler; that his friend had obtained entrance to the oak room by means of the open shutters, whilst he and his guide alarmed the servants, who slept at the north side of the building; he knew no more.

Whilst his nephew was giving his evidence, the steward watched him closely, listening to every word with intense interest.

"You did not actually see the crime committed?" observed the magistrate.

"No, sir."

"Are you related to Mr. Andrew Silex?"

This question had been prompted by the housekeeper.

"I believe that I am his nephew, sir," answered Jack; "but I am by no means anxious to claim the relationship."

"Why not?"

The witness remained silent.

"Then why keep possession of my patient's keys?" demanded Dr. Phrase, in a tone which indicated anything but a friendly feeling towards the speaker.

"To prevent his being robbed."

Something like a chuckle broke from the lips of the steward; Mr. Thornton smiled.

"But I have no objection to place them in the hands of this gentleman," continued the speaker, at the same time drawing them from his pocket and offering them to the magistrate.

"You speak fairly," observed the latter, favourably impressed by the frank, open countenance of the young man.

"Of course he does," replied the housekeeper, bitterly; "it is part of the scheme—it has been well planned."

"What has been well planned?" exclaimed Jack Manders, turning suddenly round, and looking her full in the face.

The woman remained silent.

The master of the Home Farm wrote once more upon the slate, which was handed to Mr. Thornton.

"The witness is my nephew. I request him to keep the keys, hold possession of the house, and remain here till I recover."

"Till when?" inquired Dr. Phrase.

"Till he recovers," repeated the gentleman.

The physician gave a dry hem, which augured anything but favourably for the recovery of Mr. Silex.

Seeing that Andrew was sufficiently strong and collected to write his wishes, as well as express them collectedly, the magistrate next proceeded to examine him; his replies, as a matter of course, being written and read aloud as he wrote it.

"From whom did you receive your wound?"

"My brother Mike."

All who heard this shuddered.

"All right," said the convict; "we are twins, and used to be reckoned—"

"Was he alone?"

"No."

"Who else?"

All waited with intense curiosity to hear the reply to this question.

"The fellow who held me whilst Mike cut my throat."

"Do you know the man?"

"No; he is not here. The young fellow in the sailor's dress came in at the window and saved me."

Every one present looked upon the old convict with undisguised feelings of horror. Although Mike had never shown any great susceptibility on the score of the opinion his fellow-creatures entertained of him, he appeared to feel it on the present occasion; he knew that he was dying unpitied, despised, abhorred, and the sense of desolation stung him.

"But yer don't know why I did it," said he, with an energy that startled them. "We are brothers, twins, and reckoned uncommon like—no matter for that now, he wor rich, and I poor; but it worn't for that, it wor all about the gal Lilly that led to it."

At the allusion to the heroine of our tale, both Mr. Thornton and the lieutenant became greatly interested.

"Will any one give me a toothful of brandy?"

said the dying man. "I should like to say out my say."

Jack Manders brought him a glass. Mike eagerly drank it off, and it served to revive his failing strength.

"I ain't agoin' to say anythink about you, Jack," he continued, looking him in the face; "it wasn't your hand as fired the shot. Vel, Andrew finds me out in my crib in London, where I was livin' respectably a'ter my misfortunes, and wanted me to take a gal and bring up for him. I consented, and did the best I could for her."

"Was her name Lillian?" inquired the magistrate.

"Lillian or Lilly, it's all the same," replied the convict. "He said that she would one day prove worth her weight in gold to him; and yet he only gave me a beggarly fifty pounds a year for her."

"And what became of her?"

"A lady as brought her—I wish I had never seen her face—told me she was a chance child; but I found out that was a lie. She promised me five hundred pounds in the event of her death, and—"

"You murdered her!" exclaimed Mr. Thornton, horror-struck at the dark scene of crime which began to be unravelled.

"No, I did not. I swopped her with Fiddler Dick for a gal as was a dyin', poor little Fan."

A shudder ran through the frame of the speaker as he pronounced the name of the dancing girl; it might have been his wound that caused him pain, or the recollection of his victim's deathbed.

"Vel, Fan died, and was buried under the name of Lilly. Lady Boothroyd paid the money. So, being low like, for Jack had left me to go to sea, I came down here. Andrew and that woman tried to pison me with a dish of musherrooms; that proved no go, so what does he do but gets her ladyship to ask some lord, I think they said he was a minister—a pretty minister!—to call in my ticket-of-leave, and I got sent to the hulks for the rest of my life. Do you wonder that it riled me—that when I escaped I came to thank him at the Home Farm?"

"There," he said, gasping for breath, "now yer knows all about it. I ain't sorry," he added, slowly, "that I wor interrupted afore the job wor done; for, arter all, we are twins—aint we, Andrew?"

"My dear sir," whispered Lieutenant Marsh, "this man's confession is most important; may I request that it be committed to writing?"

The request was complied with, and the last act of Mike's ill-spent life was to sign it.

Great was the excitement amongst the villagers who thronged around the house when, the nature of his confession had transpired, for all remembered the pretty child who had so unaccountably disappeared from amongst them. Simon Gee could not restrain his feelings, but forced his way through the crowd to the oak room.

No sooner did they hear his name than our hero and the lieutenant shook him warmly by the hand.

"My young friend here will inform you of much that you will be pleased to learn," observed the latter. "I must quit you. Should Mr. Beutly hear of your arrival," he added, in a whisper to Richard, "or meet you unprepared, I tremble for the consequences."

Leaving his fellow travellers at the Home Farm, the worthy man directed his steps towards Meldown Park.

Mr. Thornton ordered the body of the fratricide to be removed from the oak-room, to one of the out-houses, in order to await the inquest of the coroner on the following day.

"Unfortunately, sir," observed Jack Manders, "there will be two."

The magistrate looked surprised, imagining that the speaker alluded to the steward, who, although badly wounded, was not yet dead, and might possibly, he thought, recover, despite the ominous shake of the doctor's head. Andrew Silex took the words of his nephew in a similar light, and regarded him with a look of angry impatience.

"That there be, squire," exclaimed the ostler, who began to feel himself rather an important personage, in consequence of the share he had taken in the adventures of the night. "There be another on 'em," he added; "the one we found in the croft."

"A corse?"

"E's, squire, a dead un!" replied the rustic, with a shudder.

Jack and his friend at once related their finding the body of Brandt, before the vital spark was quite extinct, and described the spot where they had left it.

"Did he speak?" inquired Mr. Thornton.

"A few indistinct words," answered Caleb.

"Did you catch their meaning?"

"No, sir; the only ones I could swear to were 'the drink,' and another which sounded, I think, like 'poison.'"

The eyes of the steward and his nephew met—they shrewdly suspected the means by which the unhappy man had met his death.

At the request of the magistrate, a party of villagers accompanied the farm servants to bring the body in; the latter positively refused, even at the bidding of one they so much respected, to undertake the task alone, so greatly had the events of the night terrified them—a feeling not to be wondered at, for, with the exception of the memorable New Year's-eve, when Barney Gee and the gamekeeper met their deaths, such a circumstance as a murder had not taken place at St. Faith's within the recollection of its oldest inhabitant.

Dr. Phrase now insisted upon his surviving patient being conveyed to his bed, or he would not answer for the consequences. Andrew Silex, had he possessed the strength, would have resisted the order. It was like tearing his heartstrings to remove him from his gold. His eyes, like his affections, were riveted upon the receptacle which contained his treasure; and the thought of its passing to another gave him a keener pang than even the approach of death.

At the request of his nephew, Mr. Thornton not only affixed his seal to the chest, but consented to take charge of the keys.

"Do not leave me, Jack," muttered his uncle.

"Not another word," interrupted the village practitioner, "I must insist. It is absolutely self-murder, to—"

"Come with me," repeated the dying man, heedless of the caution. "I won't—I dare not be left alone."

"A clergyman would be a far more fitting person," observed the young man, seriously. "I am ignorant, uncle, very ignorant, and cannot speak the words you ought to hear."

"I am rich, Jack; rich and childless," exclaimed the steward.

"I do not require your gold," replied his nephew; "were you to offer it to me I would not accept it. You forget," he added, lowering his voice to a whisper which only the old man heard, "that I know the means by which you obtained it. There is no blessing upon it; crime sticks to every coin."

Andrew Silex uttered a groan of mingled rage and disappointment. It was something to which the experience of his long life was opposed, which he could not comprehend, to find the poor boy who had been trained to a career of sin—who had vainly implored his assistance, rejecting the wealth for which he had steeped his own soul in guilt.

"You do not know the sum," he murmured; and the words came hissing, like the arch-tempter's proffer, between his close-set teeth.

"Were it ten times greater it would not change me, uncle," was the unhesitating answer. "God has been merciful to you, more merciful than to your wretched brother. He has given you a few hours to repent. Use them wisely, and dispose of the contents of yonder chest for uses that may in some degree atone for the means by which you obtained them; for I repeat it, not a coin shall ever stain my hand."

"It is an honest one now," he added, in a tone of self-respect; "the past has been effaced."

And he was right; if the words were proudly, they were truthfully spoken. No human being can be considered morally responsible for his actions until good and evil are both placed before him—and for years the poor neglected boy had known nought but evil, seen nought but evil, heard nought but evil; the world had been against him, and, like the untaught savage, he had preyed upon the world. No parent's voice had told him there was such a thing as honesty, the social compact, the law of man's existence—he had never heard a prayer, till that hallowed one, fraught with divinest wisdom, fell upon his ear, uttered by Lillian in her solitary chamber.

There was something more than accident, perchance, in the words which first arrested his attention, "Lead us not into temptation."

Daily and hourly all have need to repeat them.

As the plant, rooted in some dark and noisome den, puts forth its shoots towards the solitary ray of light which penetrates its drear abode, so the heart of Jack had turned instinctively to good as soon as it perceived it; clung to it through shame and suffering, till the work of reformation became complete.

After such a triumph, he might truly say, "The past has been effaced."

The words "mercy" and "repentance," from any other lips, in all probability would have produced but little effect on the cynical nature of Andrew Silex; but, coming from one who had been doomed in infancy to a career of vice, and yet redeemed himself, and coupled with the rejection of his gold, they startled the long-slumbering conscience of the dying man, whose head sank heavily upon his breast.

"Very improper; in fact, I must say, highly improper," exclaimed Dr. Phraser, "to agitate my respected patient at such a crisis. Remove him gently," he added, turning to the servants—"mind, very gently—at once."

"Jack," said our hero, placing his hand upon the shoulder of his humble friend, "think better of it; stay with him. I don't mean for his money; no, I admire and respect you for that, but he has not long to live, and, by all accounts, has much to repent of: a few words may touch his heart."

"What can I say?" answered the young man, modestly; "you forget how ignorant I am; a clergyman is the fitting person to—"

"Was Lillian so very learned?" interrupted Richard Markham, with a smile.

The allusion was sufficient; Jack Manders wrung his hand, and, without a word, followed the servants as they carried his wretched uncle from the room.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Vain was the man, and false as vain,
Who said, were he ordain'd to run
His long career of life again,
He would do all that he had done.—MOORE.

It is not part of our creed that sorrow destroys either the physical or intellectual existence of its victims. Like the mildew on the flower, it may rob life of its freshness—palsy the energies of both heart and brain, changing the former into a living sepulchre, whose tenants are useless regrets for the past, or self-reproaches as bitter as they are vain.

Under any circumstances, the loss of his grandson would have been a terrible blow to the feelings of Mr. Bently; but, coming as it did, at the moment of success, when Richard had succeeded in unmasking the real character of Carus Kearn and proving the integrity of his father, it fell with double violence.

Still it did not kill. Death perhaps would have been mercy; it rendered the future a blank, cheerless as that sea

"Whose waters bear no living thing,
Shunned even by the sea-bird's wing,
A lonely scene, a desert rude,
A barren waste, a solitude."

The letter, written by his wife, added to the bitterness of the old merchant's self-reproaches; for, whilst appealing to his affection in behalf of their only child, it amply justified the extraordinary step she had taken in giving her consent to his daughter's marriage with the father of our hero. In the solitude of his chamber he perused and re-perused it till every word became engraved with terrible distinctness upon his memory.

As it unveils much that has hitherto been doubtful to our readers, we consider the time has arrived for imparting its contents.

It ran thus:—

"I am dying of a strange malady, which has baffled the skill of my physician, and in this world we shall never meet again. Rachel will have no mother near you to plead in her behalf, and even my memory may be a reproach, for having consented to what the world may consider an ill-assorted marriage. Richard, I did more than consent, I advised it."

"You have frequently accused me of a prejudice against your nephew, Carus. Shortly after your departure for India, I obtained proofs—I repeat the word proofs—that he was not only ungrateful to you, his benefactor, but a bad, dishonest man. Unhappily, I dare not lay these proofs before you; he bound me by an oath at the moment I detected—oh, that I could tell you all! but my lips are sealed. On the word of the wife who loved you, who never yet deceived you, who must soon answer to that tribunal where every thought is judged, I have spoken truthfully."

"I knew the pertinacity with which you adhere to a plan once formed. I knew, also, of your design of uniting Rachel with her cousin Carus, and dared not risk the happiness of our only child. Forgive me, Richard; do not let your anger fall on the head of Rachel. Let the memory of her dead mother plead for her; she will soon have no other defender."

From these passages it was plain that Mrs. Bently had detected Carus in the act of plundering his uncle and benefactor, and been bound by him, perhaps, as the means of preventing a yet greater crime, by oath never to denounce him. As to the means of the unfortunate lady's death, the doubts which veiled them may never, perhaps, be entirely raised.

After the perusal of such a letter the feelings of the merchant entirely changed. In reality, he had little if anything to forgive. The system of negative persecution adopted towards his son-in-law had led to misery. The long years of agony arising from the loss of our hero might have been spared his daughter.

When the stern man reflected on these things, it is not to be wondered that he fled to Meldown from the sight of Rachel's tears, for conscience told him he had been the cause.

Mr. Bently was seated in the library, listening to the account which the gamekeeper, Fletcher, had brought of the attempted murder at the Home Farm, when his faithful, confidential servant entered the room. The old man seemed greatly agitated; and yet a careful observer might have noted that an expression of hope, if not joy, mingled with his tribulation.

"What is it?" inquired his master. "I did not ring."

"I know you did not, sir," replied the domestic; "but a visitor has arrived at the hall."

"From London?"

"I believe he came from London last," was the cautious reply, "but he has lately been in India."

The merchant sighed at the word India—his dearest hopes, as he believed, were buried there.

"From my old friend Curry, no doubt," he said.

"I will see the gentleman."

"Certainly, sir."

Still the man hesitated, and made no attempt to quit the library.

"Did you not hear me?" inquired his master, mildly.

"I don't think the gentleman comes from Mr. Curry," observed the man; "in fact, I am sure he does not. I have seen him here before, when—"

The speaker stooped short as if afraid to proceed. The grandfather of our hero marked his agitation, and a singular feeling crept over him.

"Proceed," he said, firmly; "I can bear anything now."

"When the two young gentlemen were staying at the hall, sir."

"Marsh!" exclaimed Mr. Bently.

"I believe that is the gentleman's name, sir."

"Admit him instantly," said his master; "perhaps he brings me some token or last request from my poor boy."

The domestic hastily withdrew, leaving the merchant a prey to the wildest surmise. Intelligence had reached him that all the party had perished in the attack upon the solitary tower, still he was far from anticipating the happiness in store for him.

When the lieutenant entered the library, he was much struck by the change which little more than a year had made in the appearance of Mr. Bently: his iron-gray hair had become perfectly white, and his features lost much of that expression of firmness, not to say sternness, which formerly characterised them.

"You come to a house of mourning," observed the old man, extending his hand to him, "I might almost say of death, for life has lost its sunshine and existence—been made a blank. Who would have thought," he added, "that it was so hard a thing to die?"
